MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to make a suggestion with regard to the course of business to-morrow. On ordinary occasions, the usual practice was to take the Motion relating to the holidays before the main business of the evening. Now, although he was sanguine in the hope that nothing would occur to prevent the adjournment for the holydays to-morrow, it was plain that it would not be desirable to settle the matter before the main business of the evening was brought to a conclusion. It would be convenient and satisfactory to the House if the questions could be taken after the main business was concluded, when it might be hoped that that important question would have come to an issue on its first stage, and that they should know something of the mode in which the Government proposed to deal with its future stages.

MR. DISRAELI said, that the Government had no other wish than to suit the convenience of the House. He might say that representations had been made to him as much from one side as the other, that Gentlemen were very anxious that the usual holydays should be observed. He had thought of putting on the Paper to-night a Notice to that effect, so that the House might express an opinion upon it. He had no objection, however, to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, if it was acceptable to the House; but he must express his own opinion that there could be no doubt that the debate would conclude to-morrow.

METROPOLIS GAS BILL — [BILL 49.]

(Mr. Morrison, Mr. Locke, Mr. Gorst.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MORRISON, in moving that this Bill be read a second time, explained, that in 1866 a hybrid Committee of the House was appointed upon this subject. On its Report the Government founded the Bill of last Session, which was referred to a Committee of five, and, after a lengthened and expensive inquiry, miscarried at a time when the representatives of the companies and those of the public appeared to have come as nearly as possible to an agreement. It was therefore thought expedient that the Bill should be re-introduced this year, and this Bill was in the main a reprint of last year's Bill, with certain alterations. Very grave exceptions had been taken to certain parts of the Bill, and there had been a conference with the representatives of the gas companies of the metropolis, who had determined to offer no opposition, on condition that the promoters consented to certain changes. On the part of the promoters he was ready to consent to these changes, which involved the striking out of a large portion of new matter incorporated with the Bill. These changes embraced the clauses dealing with the amalgamation of the existing companies, the supply of gas in bulk, the substitution of permissive for compulsory powers of purchase, and the damages to be paid by a company in case of accident. There was already an Order of the House that Bills having reference to the supply of gas to the metropolis should be referred to the same Committee; three Bills had been read a second time and referred, and it was therefore desirable that this Bill should be similarly dealt with at once. He moved that it be read a second time, and to-morrow he would move that it be committed, in order to insert the Amendments agreed upon, and have the Bill re-printed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Morrison.)

MR. GREENE said, he had remained in the House for the purpose of opposing the Bill; but having heard of the arrangement he would not do so, at least at this stage.

MR. WYLD called attention to Clause 100, as follows :—

"All costs, charges, and expenses preliminary and of and incidental to the preparing, applying for, obtaining, and passing of this Act (including those incurred by the Board of Trade in relation to the Metropolis Gas Bill introduced in the first Session of Parliament in the year 1867) shall be paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works to the Board of Trade direct."

He believed the ratepayers of the metropolis would object to the payment out of the rates of the expenses incurred in promoting the Bill of last Session; and, indeed, it was improper to charge the ratepayers with the expenses of a Bill which the House did not pass. In Committee he could move the rejection of this clause.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD asked the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, Whether it was his intention to refer the Bankruptcy Bill to a Select Committee? If not, he trusted that those noble Lords who proposed to move Amendments would have them printed during the Recess, in order that they might be considered.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he stated on the second reading of this Bill, that if any of their Lordships expressed a wish that it should be referred to a Select Committee, he should be quite willing to accede to that course. He had since understood from noble and learned Friends, who took great interest in the subject, that they did not think much advantage would be gained by sending the Bill to a Select Committee, and therefore at present he did not intend to take that course. A noble and learned Friend who was not present (Lord Romilly) had been good enough to put on the Paper and have printed a number of Amendments which, no doubt, would prove of great utility, and he hoped that any noble Lord who wished to move any Amendments would also cause them to be printed, in order that the House might have an opportunity of considering them before the next stage of the Bill.

LORD CHELMSFORD wished it to be understood that he had no desire that the Bill should go to a Select Committee.

INSURRECTION IN CRETE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD STRATHEDEN rose, according to Notice, to call their Lordships' attention to the further Correspondence respecting the disturbances in Crete. He had first to direct their Lordships' attention to the "Identio Note" communicated in October last to the Turkish Government on the part of Russia, France, Prussia, and Italy. The general result of that Note had been to inflict a severe blow upon the Turkish Government, and, as regarded the Eastern question, to place Great Britain on the one side and France and Russia on the other. As that was a state of things inconsistent with the position of affairs established as the result of the Crimean War, it became an important matter to inquire how far our Government had contributed to produce it, or laboured to avert it. The question was, whether our Government had done as much as was possible to exempt themselves from all responsibility for a proceeding which, according to their own language, was both unfortunate and injurious? In a despatch from Lord Stanley to Lord Bloomfield was the following passage:—

"Her Majesty's Government had given no advice which had been disregarded. They had recommended the granting of local autonomy to Crete; and the plan of Government now proposed for that Island, if it did not amount to an entire concession of local autonomy, yet fell very little short of it, and seemed to include that which was practically the most important point—equal rights for Mussulmans and Christians. Under these circumstances, I felt unwilling to join in any representation which, however courteous and friendly in its language, bore the character of a remonstrance or protest. I saw no necessity for taking such a step, and, if unnecessary, it could only be injurious."

It was clear from that despatch that the "Identio Note" had been for some time under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, that they disapproved it, and held that the Turkish Government had not done anything to call down upon itself, deservedly, such an European reprimand. In the Circular issued on the 18th of October last by Prince Gortschakoff to the diplomatic representatives of Russia was the following passage, which sufficiently showed that the "Identio Note" was the inspiration of Russia:—

"When at last the insurrection of Candia revealed the progress of this situation, the Imperial Cabinet reiterated its efforts with the Turkish Government and the Great Powers. It addressed an invitation to the Cabinets to join with it in an exhortation to the Porte not to allow this insurrection to increase, the rebound of which might be felt all over the Christian East, and which might become the first spark of a general conflagration."

On the 31st October Mr. Elliot, our Representative at Constantinople, addressed the following despatch to Lord Stanley:—

"I have the honour to inclose a copy of the Identio note upon the affairs of Candia, which, as your Lordship will have learnt by my telegram of this day, has been sent in to the Porte by the Representatives of France, Russia, and Italy."

"The Prussian Minister has likewise received similar instructions, and will act upon them to-day or to-morrow. After alluding to the efforts of the Powers to put a stop to the effusion of blood and to diminish the horrors of war, the note goes on to declare that while the act of amnesty offered none of the guarantees which would justify its being looked upon as a serious measure, the refusal of the inquiry shows that no remedy is to be looked for to the abuses which provoked the insurrection of the Cretans, and nothing having been done to satisfy the other Christian populations of the Empire, the Powers apprehend that the obstinate resistance of the Porte may precipitate a crisis in the East."

"In this case the Porte is warned that it would ask in vain for even the moral support of the Cabinets in the difficulties which the neglect of their advice will have brought about."

"It will not surprise your Lordship that this note should have produced upon Fuad Pasha an impression of the most painful description."

"He spoke of it to me yesterday as being a direct incitement to rebellion held out to the populations of several provinces, where for some time past the ground has been diligently prepared by intriguers labouring to keep alive dissension in the Empire."

"That it is eminently calculated to produce the effect apprehended by Fuad Pasha appears to me incontestable, nor is the probability of its being taken as an encouragement to the dissatisfied disputed even by the Ministers who, in execution of their instructions, transmitted the note to the Porte, but who confine themselves to assurances that their Governments had no wish to add to the difficulties of the Turkish Empire, and that the expressions which seem equivocal are capable of explanation."

"It is, however, evident that the effect produced by the note, when it shall be made public, will be in accordance with the interpretation that can hardly fail to be put upon it in Turkey, rather than with that which may be given in the Cabinets of the Ministers at Paris or at St. Petersburg; and it will be looked upon much more as an address to the dissatisfied subjects of the Sultan than as a communication to His Majesty's Ministers."

With respect to the conduct of our Government throughout the negotiations on that subject, he could not help admitting that up to the time of the "Identic Note" their conduct appeared to deserve the highest admiration. The Foreign Secretary had resisted a variety of lures held out to induce him to enter into lines of action inconsistent with our various obligations towards the Ottoman Porte; but their merits in that respect, however great, were merely of a negative character. It was one thing to adhere to our engagements, and another thing to advance towards the accomplishment of great objects of policy; and one great object of English policy in regard to Turkey should be to prevent France from joining Russia.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Instructions to the British Representative at Paris in reference to the identic Note proposed to be communicated to the Porte by Russia, France, Italy, and Prussia."—(The Lord Stratheden.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that he did not hear the first part of the noble Lord's speech so distinctly as he could wish; but so far as he could gather, it was the noble Lord's wish to ascertain what was the present state of the insurrection in Crete and the policy of Her Majesty's Government. That policy had been throughout the same. The Government felt naturally the deepest interest in those who were suffering all the horrors of insurrection in such a place as Crete, and they had a sincere desire to put an end to the insurrection if they could do it without interfering with the just rights of the Porte. No doubt some cruelties had been committed; but he believed they had been greatly magnified. All the accounts from Her Majesty's servants abroad proved this, and although the country had been devastated, and very considerable misery had resulted from the insurrection and the efforts of the Porte to put it down, as it had a right to do, yet this suffering must be the natural consequence of any rebellion whatever. According to the reports of Her Majesty's servants, especially Mr. Elliot, our Ambassador at Constantinople, the insurrection now assumed comparatively trifling dimensions. Only a few insignificant skirmishes had taken place lately. He should not attempt to go into the original causes of this rebellion, or to ascertain the comparative blame that might be due to each of the parties. If their Lordships would read the despatches of Consul Longworth, they would see that the main point at issue between the Porte and the Candiot population was the difference of religion and race. The Cretans were certainly not overtaxed, they were under a comparatively mild Government, they were exempted from many of the laws to which other subjects of the Porte were amenable, and they enjoyed a general freedom and liberty of speech which other countries might envy. They were ruled over by a Pasha, with whom he (the Earl of Malmesbury) had been acquainted in Paris, and who was an amiable and enlightened man. He believed that the insurrection was very much to be attributed to the amiable weakness of that gentleman, who had allowed it to proceed so far that at last he was unable to put it down. In this state of things the Porte had done all that it could. It had asked the advice of Her Majesty's Government, and had appointed two Christian Governors, and the Ministry of the Porte had issued regulations for the government of the Christian population, a copy of which he had sent to this country, and which would be laid upon the table. The policy of Her Majesty's Government was non-interference, especially in the internal affairs of other nations. Having for many years asked the Porte to treat its Christian subjects with justice, the Government of this country were bound to remind the Porte constantly of these promises. It was our interest that they should be kept; but we were not bound, and it would indeed be a fatal error on our part, to encourage the enemies of the Porte under the plea of giving it good advice, or to place ourselves in a position adverse to the Porte. For this reason Her Majesty's Government had not thought it their duty to join in any Identic Notes with other Powers. There would be no objection to lay upon the table the despatches which had been lately received, and to give any information on the subject.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) had failed to apprehend the main point of the question raised by his noble Friend—namely, that, now for the first time since the Treaty of 1856, almost all the Great Powers of Europe, with the single exception of Great Britain, had been united to a certain extent in action, and to a still larger extent in the language held towards the Ottoman Empire. He understood his noble Friend to ask whether the

Identie Note presented to the Porte by the combined Powers, and which was represented by the Porte itself as a document of very serious import, had been properly resisted and opposed by the British Government? He understood his noble Friend to inquire, whether if the Government thought this Note so serious, as affecting the independence and integrity of Turkey, they took any means to dissuade the other Powers from agreeing to that Identie Note? It was an important and significant fact that this action on the part of the Great Powers had placed this country in a very undesirable position of isolation. With one sentiment of his noble Friend he was bound to express his sympathy and concurrence;—it was now thirteen months ago since he (the Duke of Argyll) had expressed an opinion that the Government had committed an error in having refused to withdraw from Crete the families of the non-combatants in that struggle. He had reason to think that some noble Lords thought he had made out his case; but no one spoke in that sense, while two or three noble Lords on both sides of the House expressed a contrary opinion. He rejoiced that, although he might be in a minority in that House, he found himself in a very large majority on the other side of the Channel. The Great Powers, it appeared, combined in recommending the Porte to stop the effusion of blood, and to seek, in common with them, a solution of this deplorable conflict by an honest inquiry into the grievances and wishes of the Candiotes. In the meanwhile they insisted on withdrawing the families of the insurgents from the calamities of war. He was aware that even a Member of the Opposition who might speak on the Eastern Question addressed their Lordships under very considerable responsibility. Every word uttered in the House was reported in the East, and he therefore wished to guard against any misconception. He had no wish to criticize the foreign administration of Lord Stanley; for he shared the impression general in the country that, on most questions, he had shown admirable judgment and prudence, and a strict regard to the true interests of England, and, while differing from him in this instance, he gave the noble Lord credit for having been animated by the most upright motives. Now, he had been represented as favouring the opinion that it would be for the advantage of Crete to be annexed to the kingdom of Greece. Such, however, was not his opinion. The Government of Greece was just now in a very deplorable condition, for he understood that within a few miles of the Acropolis of Athens it was not safe for anyone to ride or walk, on account of brigands, and that the Isthmus of Corinth had to be constantly patrolled by cavalry to secure the safety of ordinary travellers. Under such circumstances it was preposterous to desire the annexation of any territory to Greece, which was bound to put its own house in order before it could assume to annex other dominions. The advice repeatedly urged upon Turkey by Her Majesty's Government, to give Crete what is called autonomy, he believed to be the best advice which it was possible to give. What, however, was implied in such advice? We did not think of advising Russia to give autonomy to Poland, nor did we recommend the United States to give autonomy to the South. It was obvious, then, that the parallel sometimes drawn between Turkey and other States was quite fallacious. He was asked last Session how he would like England to be advised to give autonomy to Ireland or any part of the British dominions; but his answer was that whenever the Great Powers were obliged to fight on our behalf, and to sign a treaty virtually guaranteeing our integrity and independence, they would have a right to press advice upon us respecting Ireland. With regard to the refusal of the Government to assist in the removal of non-combatants from Crete, he thought that refusal had not been a frank and straightforward one, but had apparently been based on a wish to avoid the incurring of responsibility. He observed a remarkable despatch from Sir Andrew Buchanan, describing the language which he had held to the Russian Government. Sir Andrew, it appeared, on being asked by Prince Gortschakoff to represent to this Government the propriety of removing non-combatants, replied that the Government had already refused to remove women and children; but that this was a matter of less consequence, inasmuch as the American fleet could do so, and had been ordered into Cretan waters for that very purpose. He did not wish to blame Sir Andrew Buchanan, who was one of the ablest servants of the Crown, for he unquestionably held the language of his Government; but such language was not consistent with the argument used in the House last year, that the removal of non-combatants would be at variance with the duty of a neutral State, since it would relieve the insurgents from a burden which it was proper they should bear. That was a fair and logical position, but to say that we would not take such a step, but that there was the American fleet, and that we should be delighted if they did it—for this was really implied—was not a proper position to assume. The Americans had no right beyond what belonged to any other fleet, and such language amounted to a distinct intimation that the Russian fleet or any other fleet might also assist. Sir Andrew's statement, though volunteered on his part, was approved in subsequent despatches from the Foreign Office, and, indeed, he simply repeated what he knew had been the language of Lord Stanley in London. Prince Gortschakoff, very naturally, took care to make use of the observations of Sir Andrew Buchanan, and of those of Lord Stanley to Baron Brunnow, and in one of his despatches he remarked that though the British Government had not thought proper to take part in the removal, they had intimated that it was not their business to interfere with the other Powers who might do so. Thus the only overt act which had been taken by the other Powers was actually suggested by the Foreign Office, with a virtual intimation that no objection would be offered by England. He was happy to say that all the other Great Powers had taken part in the removal. The French Government sent vessels; the Americans took a few non-combatants, but then suspended operations; Russia and Italy sent vessels; and a gunboat was sent by Austria. Considering the calamities and brutalities to which these unfortunate people were exposed, and considering that Crete had at one time established its independence, and was restored to the Porte by the concurrence of all the Great Powers of Europe, those Powers had, in his opinion, come to a wise, just, and humane decision. The noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) had passed over those calamities very briefly, and it was easy to indulge in general denials, and to say that there was no truth in the reported massacres of women and children. No doubt many of the stories were exaggerations, and some of them complete fabrications; but he observed that France and other Powers had urged on Lord Stanley that, if he was not satisfied with the information he had received, a joint Commission should be sent to Crete to inquire into the facts. Lord Stanley ultimately acceded to that proposal to this extent, that he was willing to urge on the Porte to nominate a Commission of their own, to which certain names should be added by the Great Powers. The noble Lord on this as on other points seemed to have somewhat vacillated, from an evident desire to avoid responsibility and to let matters take their own course; for, when asked whether he adhered to this suggestion, he expressed a doubt whether he could by such a Commission get better information than he already received from Her Majesty's Consuls in Crete. Now, he was quite willing to take the evidence of these gentlemen, and after carefully reading the blue book his impression was very different from that of the noble Earl. Mr. Dickson, our principal Consul in Crete, who was by no means a phil-Hellenist, but was a good friend of Turkey, testified in many of his despatches to the humane conduct of some of the leading officers of the Turkish army. No doubt the responsible officers of the Turkish Government were generally humane in their conduct, but the charges of brutality were directed at the irregular troops, who were known to be such savages, and so incapable of military discipline, that their employment involved the commission of all kinds of atrocities. On this point Consul Dickson, in one of his despatches, said—

"I myself have repeatedly urged on Server Effendi, as I did with his predecessor, the expediency of disarming and disbanding the Cretan Bashi-Bazouks; for by doing so I consider that the island would be spared further devastation, and these barbarous and fanatical mercenaries prevented from perpetrating their wonted misdeeds, while the Imperial authorities would be relieved from a serious charge in their mode of conducting the war. Server Effendi replied that he was desirous of effecting this wholesome measure; but that it could only be done by degrees and with great tact and caution on the part of the Government. The brutalities lately committed on Christian women and children defy description."

That was the language of their own Consul, and, notwithstanding such evidence as that the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) had got up and told their Lordships that the war had, on the whole, been conducted with humanity. If the Government wanted further evidence would they take that of their Naval Officers on the station? At all events, when Lord Stanley said he had no independent means of knowledge, and that he was willing to trust to his own Consuls and Officers, their Lordships had a right to ely on the information which those gentlemen communicated. Lieutenant Murray, writing on the 22nd of July, 1867, to Lord Clarence Paget, said—

“The reign of terror which has long threatened us has become a fearful reality. Parties of Bashibazouks, who have given up service with Omer Pasha (not finding it sufficiently remunerative), scour the country, and put to death any man, woman, or child they find. The whole district of Lassamoss is a scene of mourning; for all the young men being in the hills fighting, their families are left without protection, and at the mercy of these ruffians.”

And then he went on to say—

“His Excellency did not deny that the massacre had taken place; but, as an extenuating circumstance, said that some Turks had been killed by Christians, which is utterly untrue, as there is not a Mussulman in the whole district outside the walls of the town. He was obliged to confess that the Government is powerless to prevent these atrocities from taking place, nor do they dare to prevent them, for the Turks now openly avow their intention of killing all the Cretan Christians.”

He would not trouble the House with further extracts. Such being the facts, in the month of July or August, the whole of the foreign Consuls in Crete united in a telegraphic message to their various Ministers at Constantinople and elsewhere requesting the immediate assistance of the fleets of their respective Governments in order to carry away the fugitives; and, accordingly, the various nations to which he had referred sent squadrons more or less strong—the French sent four vessels, the Russians two or three, the Italians one or two, and the Austrians one gunboat—and a very large number of those unfortunate persons were removed to Greece. Now, what he ventured to observe was that the only result of the conduct upon which he had animadverted last Session was this—that we had stood absolutely alone; the neutrality and independence of Turkey, if there had been a violation, had been violated by the other Powers, we looking on, and not only not remonstrating, but rather indicating our approval, only we had not had either the honour or the satisfaction of having contributed to that result. Having said so much with regard to this particular case, he would now add a few words on the subject of our general policy and the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in recommending Turkey to give autonomy to Crete. He did not think any advice given to Turkey in that tone would be of any avail. The truth was Turkey was surrounded by many difficulties and dangers, and he should not feel surprised if she did not take any advice that was given her in reference to granting autonomy to Crete. But that, in his opinion, only pointed to the necessity of another course. As the integrity and independence of Turkey were the result of a treaty among the other Powers of Europe, it seemed to him of infinite importance that those Powers should all act together, and that the worst calamities would fall on Turkey if the principle were once admitted that two or three Powers might each follow their own counsel with regard to her affairs while England stood aloof, neither approving or disapproving, but letting matters take their course. It was the great object of the treaty concluded by the Great Powers at Paris in 1856, and in the conduct of which his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) bore so conspicuous a part, that there should be joint action on the part of all the Great Powers with respect to Turkey, and that individual action should not be allowed where concert could be arrived at. But by refusing to join the other Great Powers in a matter in which they were clearly right, we had afforded a precedent and example for separate action on their part which might extend to other matters of more serious import, and thus there was a serious risk that we might place the result of the contest wholly beyond our control or guidance. He believed that nothing could be more dangerous to Turkey than the continuance of the present state of things in Crete. A great Empire, nominally one of the Great Powers of Europe, whose integrity we had guaranteed, had sent to a comparatively small island an army of upwards of 40,000 men, and a large contingent from Egypt, and yet in that small island small bands of the population in the mountains had for upwards of two years successfully maintained their independence. Was not that a contest sufficient to excite all the other Christian provinces of Turkey to revolt? That was a most dangerous spectacle to the other provinces of Turkey; and he entreated Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the other Powers of Europe, to urge with a little more insistence on Turkey the duty of taking that course, whatever it might be—and he did not express any conclusive opinion on that point—which might be found for the interests of that Empire whose integrity and independence rested upon our guarantee. He believed the present state of things was this: Omer Pasha had gone to Servia; the Turks held two or three towns in Crete; they were able to advance over the plains to the foot of the mountains, but not to enter into any of the strongholds of the mountaineers. He left their Lordships to judge what the effect of such a state of things would be upon the other provinces of Turkey if the European Powers did not insist that an autonomy should be given to Crete.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH said, that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) would lead one to imagine that this had been a bond fide insurrection of the Cretans against the tyranny of the Turks. That was not the opinion of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, and if their Lordships turned to the last Report of Consul General Longworth they would find a very different account. Consul General Longworth, speaking of Vely Pasha, said—

“It would be most unjust to Vely Pasha, on the other hand, to refuse him credit for his endeavours to promote the prosperity of the island, to civilize the inhabitants; and insure a greater measure of toleration for the Christians. He not only encouraged the building of churches, schools, and hospitals, but liberally contributed from his own funds for such purposes. He caused physicians to be brought from Constantinople that the poor might receive medical aid at the expense of the Government. He strove to advance the interests of trade, established buoys at the entrance of the harbour of Canea, introduced cranes, improved the light-house and Custom House. . . . By the whole black population of the isle he was looked up to as their best friend and benefactor. No other Turkish Pasha that I have heard of has shown so much indulgence and liberality to Christians; yet, with every claim on their goodwill and gratitude, it cannot be denied that he had for some time past incurred their dislike, and this grew finally into a feeling of hostility.”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL inquired what was the date of that Report?

THE EARL OF DENBIGH said, the date was 1858, before the insurrection; but he quoted it to show that there was no cause for the revolt. The Consul went on to show that the chief cause of the alleged difficulties was that the Cretans had been obliged to contribute to the making of roads—

“For the construction of roads all over the island, the Pasha decided that every able-bodied male inhabitant should contribute either nine days’ labour or its equivalent in money—fifty-four piastres the year. If, as has been suggested, instead of this mode of proceeding, a joint-stock company had been established, with a privilege to exact a toll, it is questionable whether the arrangement would have proved a bit more satisfactory.”

It was very clear that it had been the object of the Russian Government for a long time to bring its power to bear on the Porte for the purpose of weakening it, and so obtaining a footing for themselves in the country; and what better opportunity of doing so could there be than to try to secure for Crete what was called autonomy? All the despatches and letters that had appeared within the last few months had made it clear that the real object of Russia was to obtain Crete as a dowry for the Queen of Greece. That had been openly stated, and he believed it. He agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that we did wrong in standing aloof—in witnessing the nefarious transaction without using very strong language in deprecation of it. It was an inhuman thing to stand by and see others assisting Russia without openly condemning their conduct. The taking away of the non-combatants, although it might be justified on the score of humanity, could not be justified on the score of policy. It was clear that in an insurrection the taking away of non-combatants assisted the combatants, and was therefore a violation of neutrality. He was glad that the British Government had absolutely refused to join the other Powers in addressing Turkey. We had thereby earned the gratitude of the Porte, which had a decided right over Crete. He should excessively regret to see this country concurring with other nations in a course which should assist Russia in detaching Crete from the Empire of the Porte.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was not necessary that he should undertake the defence of the policy pursued in this question by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. But as the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had again brought that subject under the consideration of their Lordships, he could not help repeating the opinion he had expressed upon a former occasion, that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had shown great wisdom in abstaining from joining the other Powers in removing the families of insurgents from the island. He agreed with the noble Earl who had just addressed their Lordships (the Earl of Denbigh) that such an interference would have been a distinct breach of the neutrality we were bound to observe. It was naturally difficult to take a course which might lay one open to a charge of inhumanity; and therefore the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary deserved all the more credit for adhering firmly to a policy which laid him open to such a charge. What the Ottoman Empire had chiefly suffered from had been the meddling of its candid friends. The candid friends who came forward on this occasion made one very plain recommendation—namely, that the Porte should relieve itself from its responsibilities and give Crete her independence. There was a policy which was well known as the “artichoke policy,” which was that of divesting a State little by little of its responsibilities and of its outlying positions until at last the heart of the artichoke might be eaten up at one mouthful. Wishing, as we did, that the Ottoman Government should be maintained until there was some civilized and independent Government to take its place, we ought not to join in that policy — [“Hear, hear!”] — and he was very much surprised to hear the noble Duke cheering that observation, because he distinctly laid it down that the only Government that had been put forward to take charge of the island of Crete was entirely unfit to do so. If that were so, what policy did the noble Duke desire we should follow? If we were to follow the policy of inducing the Porte to give up Crete, we ought, at all events, to be prepared to suggest some independent and civilized Government that should take its place. The noble Duke said he approved the suggestion that Crete should be governed on the principle of autonomy, and be placed in the position of Moldavia and Wallachia. That was precisely what the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary recommended. The noble Duke complained that our Government had not acted in that matter in concert with the other Powers. Now, there could be no objection to our co-operating with other Powers who were taking a course of which we approved; but how could we be expected to co-operate with them if they pursued a policy which we condemned? The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary took a proper course and went as far as he could in the same direction as the other Powers; but he had refused to unite with them in departing from the policy which this country had generally observed. Acting upon that principle, he had recommended the Porte to grant autonomy to Crete; but, as continued officious meddling with the Ottoman Government would weaken instead of strengthen it, he abstained from enforcing judicious advice with a pressure which might have produced the same effect as injudicious advice. The Porte naturally claimed to be the best judge of what it was necessary to do in its own dominions. The Powers that had guaranteed the independence and integrity of the Porte no doubt felt justified in offering their advice, and it was their duty to point out the consequences that would follow the disregard of it; but if they proceeded to exercise that kind of pressure which amounted to a threat that, if the Porte did not comply with the advice, then their moral support, as it was called, would be withdrawn, they acted inconsistently with the spirit of the treaty under which the independence and integrity of Turkey was guaranteed. He trusted that this country would not pursue an indirect policy in the matter. If we thought that the Ottoman Empire should no longer be sustained, let us say so plainly. As long as we were prepared to sustain it, he trusted we should not by such indirect measures as removing the families of insurgents or applying pressure to the Porte pursue a policy which might involve this country in difficulty.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that after the very effective vindication of the policy of the Government which had been offered by the noble Earl who had just addressed their Lordships, he need not again trespass upon their time at any length. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) had put into his mouth two or three expressions he never used: he had not denied that there had been cruelties in Crete; but he said that the reports from our employés showed that they were chargeable only to the Executive. The noble Duke said it was an extraordinary thing that we had not joined the other Powers in removing non-combatants from the island; but it should be remembered that his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office was not the Minister of France, or Russia, or Prussia, but the Minister of England, and that it was to the policy of this country that he had to give effect. Unless we assumed a position in Europe which would not be recognized, how were we to regulate their course of conduct on matters of this sort? They had combined to give the Porte what advice they pleased, and we were not obliged to follow in the same course. The Government did not approve the course proposed by the other Powers, and showed its disapprobation by not joining in it, and the Foreign Secretary took the wisest course for maintaining the independence of Turkey. We should have been inconsistent in our policy, which was one of non-interference, if we had assisted in the removal of the refugees. It was a singular fact that a petition had been received from many hundreds of fugitives in Greece, praying that they may be allowed to return to Crete under protection. This showed that in flying from their country they had not bettered their condition. Of course we must take all these things cum grano salis. Fully sensible of the immense importance of maintaining the independence of the Ottoman Empire, the Government felt that the best policy to pursue with that end in view was one of non-interference, coupled with judicious advice to the Porte in respect to the treatment of its Christian subjects.

EARL RUSSELL: I must say that my opinion is entirely favourable to the conduct which Her Majesty's Government have pursued. I believe Lord Stanley has acted rightly under the circumstances. I should not like to give any abstract opinion as to the propriety of allowing women and children to be taken away from the place where an insurrection breaks out. That is a point upon which the Executive Government of the day must form their own opinion; and I think it is quite impossible for any independent person to form an opinion in regard to the circumstances of this case, and, as far as I can see, the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office formed a just judgment upon these particulars. It is easy to say that it would have been a work of humanity to have removed these persons, but it is not so in every case. The contest may be a very barbarous one, and it may be that in removing these women and children you tend to prolong that cruel contest; and, if so, it could be no work of humanity to remove them. As to the task in which the Russian and other Governments have taken a part, there has not been that relief given which one might expect; and many of these unfortunate persons are starving in Greece, instead of earning their living in their native land. If that is the case, I must say that I think it was a most unfortunate interference on the part of those different Powers, and I am very glad, therefore, that the Government of my own country have taken no part in it. As to the animus with which the advice of these Powers was given, that advice was given in an Identic Note sent and counsels proffered to the Porte. We see by a despatch, dated about a year ago, that the French Ambassador came to Lord Stanley, and told him that the opinion of his Government was that the separation of Crete from the dominion of Turkey was inevitable, and that the French Government wished to save the dignity of the Porte, and were disposed to advise that the Sultan should consult the Greek inhabitants of Crete, and ask them whether they would like to be joined to the kingdom of Greece. Omer Pasha, in recounting what took place, says that the Government of Russia had openly avowed that they wished for the separation of Crete from the Government of Turkey; and if we had joined in this Identic Note and in the counsels given to the Porte, we could not have shut our eyes to the ultimate views of these Powers, and to the fact that they meant, however courteously they might express themselves, to aim a blow at the integrity of the Turkish Empire. But when one blow had been given to the integrity of the Turkish Empire—when Crete had been separated from Turkey because there was an insurrection—who shall tell me that there will not be persons who will be skilful enough to get up insurrections in other Christian provinces of Turkey, and that the same advice may not be repeated next year or the year after, in order to separate one province after another from the dominion of the Turkish Government. I therefore say, like Lord Stanley, that I am not surprised that the Turkish Ambassador should have told him that the Sultan was determined to refuse that advice, and that he thought a concession to the extent of separating provinces from the Turkish dominion was extremely dangerous; that it would lead finally to the partition of the Turkish Empire; and that, therefore, they could not consent to it. I quite agree with my noble Friend that it was very good advice on the part of the British Government to recommend an autonomy. Now, autonomy is a very good word; but of course it means differently when applied to different provinces. In some provinces there are no Turks whatever; and when you speak of an autonomy with regard to them, you mean the Christian inhabitants of those provinces governing themselves. In Servia, for instance, there are no Turks, and autonomy would therefore mean persons of the same race and religion as the rest governing that country for themselves. But if you speak of an autonomy for Candia, you do not mean the same thing; because, together with a large population of Greek Christians, there is likewise a considerable population of Mohammedan Turks; and an autonomy for Candia would therefore mean, not that there should be one Government governing people of one race, but that there should be two Governments, one governing the Christians and the other governing the Mohammedans—the Turkish Government using the best means, through the Governor, to maintain peace and harmony between the two populations. This is a very delicate matter for a foreign Power to interfere in by advice; and I see no reason why we should interfere by advice further than to express a general opinion in favour of autonomy. If we mean, as I think we are bound, to respect the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, my belief is that the Foreign Minister of this country has acted with great prudence and discretion, and has done his duty to his own country and to its allies.

EARL GREY said, he should like some information from the Government on one point. If they were to believe the accounts which were published of what was going on in Crete, it appeared that the insurrection would have been suppressed long ago but for the open support given to the insurgents from Greece. Such conduct on the part of Greece gave undoubted cause of just complaint to the Turkish Government. The Turkish Government, if left to itself, would soon be able to stop the blockade runners from Greece by following them to their homes and destroying them, a course which they would be justified in following. He wished to know if it was the fact that Turkey was not allowed to take the only effectual means of stopping the blockade-runners; if so, Turkey was not fairly dealt with, and the Powers of Europe ought either openly to say that they meant to give up their policy of maintaining the integrity of the Turkish Empire, and to deprive Turkey of Crete; or else, in common humanity and justice, they should leave the Turks at full liberty to take the only legitimate means in their power to bring this contest to a close.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had been misunderstood. He did not mean to say that England ought to have taken part in the Identic Note, which was a very foolish one; but that any advice tendered to Turkey in favour of autonomy was as much meddling with the Empire of Turkey as would be the case in any other course which might have been taken.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that since he had given notice of his Question on that subject—namely, whether Mr. Witworth had offered to Her Majesty's Government to endow some Scholarships for the promotion of Education in Technical Science—he found that the Question had been asked and answered in a satisfactory manner yesterday in the House of Commons, and he had that morning read in The Times the Minute of Privy Council, together with an article explaining the whole transaction. It appeared from that Minute that Mr. Whitworth had offered last month—

“To found thirty scholarships of the annual value of £100 each to be applied for the further instruction of young men, natives of the United Kingdom, selected by open competition for their intelligence and proficiency in the theory and practice of mechanics and its cognate sciences, with a view to the promotion of engineering and mechanical industry in this country, and expresses his hopes that means may be found to bring science and industry into closer relation with each other than at present obtains here.”

The sum required for that purpose was nearly £100,000, which would be applied to the purpose above stated under a trust deed; Mr. Whitworth himself taking a part in the management of the trust until his death, after which it would devolve on the President of the Council or Minister of Education for the time being. Considering the largeness of the sum involved, considering also that it was given during the life of the donor, who moreover was willing to devote his invaluable time and labour to carry out the scheme, and considering likewise the results which would no doubt follow from this gift, he believed that that was, without exception, one of the most magnificent presents ever made to this nation. Much had been said lately about technical education, as to whether it ought to be extended, and the best means of doing so. Now, Mr. Whitworth was certainly one of the greatest—better judges than himself said he was the greatest—mechanical engineers of the day; and he believed that his discoveries had almost produced a revolution in the application of scientific principles to objects of civil life as well as to implements of warfare. That splendid benefaction also proved that he had accumulated a large fortune, and that he therefore possessed that knowledge and those habits of business by which alone great manufactories could be successfully carried on. Now, Mr. Whitworth had come to the conclusion that in this country science and industry were not sufficiently connected; that while we had great scientific men, and some of the best workmen in the world, there was a want of the proper diffusion of scientific knowledge, and there was not a due bringing together of theoretical and practical knowledge. What Mr. Whitworth proposed would not only give an impetus to instruction in science afforded in our primary and secondary schools, but would cause the workmen to be taught the theory of that which he was doing. On the other hand, the man of higher station and greater cultivation would be required to gain a practical knowledge of mechanical industry. Now that, he thought, indicated to the Government and the country the true course which should be adopted on that subject. In the Minute to which he had referred, an opinion was expressed that much might be done by private and local efforts towards providing for all classes in our several large centres of manufacturing industry the means of acquiring instruction in the sciences applicable to productive industry; and the Committee of Council also added that they would be glad to receive from Mr. Whitworth any further suggestions which he might wish to make, and likewise to assist him in carrying out his object. Now, at a time when he was afraid that our revenue was decreasing and our expenditure increasing, he did not, for himself, desire to recommend any additional public outlay; but there were purposes for which a moderate expenditure would be perfectly justified, and, he believed, that at the cost of a very small sum of money indeed, probably a few hundred pounds, the Government could offer very material assistance in that respect. A very infinitesimal sum would suffice to defray the cost of conducting, directly or indirectly, the examinations for the proposed thirty scholarships. He had no doubt that Mr. Whitworth's example would be followed. At present there were Professors of Civil Engineering at London University and King's College, as also in Dublin, Belfast, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Manchester. What had been done by the Government in respect to the teachers in art might be extended with advantage to the professors of science. There was a time when the Government gave a fixed salary to those art teachers, and the result had been most unsatisfactory; but afterwards a different system was adopted, under which guarantees were held out to competent teachers. The effect of that change had been that, in almost all those schools of art, the teachers were earning at least the full amount of the sum guaranteed to them, and in some instances twice and even thrice that amount. He knew not how the case stood now; but when he was himself in office the Government were not asked for a single shilling to carry out the guarantee. That was a matter well worthy the attention of the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough), and therefore, instead of the Question of which he had given notice, he would ask him, Whether the Government had communicated with Mr. Whitworth on the subject, or whether they would themselves consider how the State could, in the most efficient and practical manner, do that which the Government would, he was sure, most willingly do—namely, assist that distinguished gentleman in carrying out his magnificent project?

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he was sure their Lordships would all feel that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had not taken up their time unnecessarily in bringing that subject before them; for a gift of that nature, so munificent in its character, and reflecting such credit on the donor, was one deserving public notice in that House, and he was glad the noble Earl had brought it under their consideration. The noble Earl had accurately stated the facts as they had appeared in the public prints, although the notice of the Minute of the Privy Council had not been inserted in the newspapers officially. He himself, therefore, need not occupy their Lordships' time by narrating what had been already made public. But, for his own part, he must express his satisfaction that Mr. Whitworth had taken the course which was the true and correct course for the manufacturing interest to adopt in this country on the subject of technical education. Great pressure had of late been brought to bear upon the Government from various quarters, to induce them to take the initiative in any steps which might be requisite for promoting the general diffusion of technical education throughout the country. It was not to be lost sight of that the subject of technical education had a special and important bearing and interest upon the manufacturing prosperity of the country, and therefore he thought that, although it was desirable that assistance should be given for the promotion of this object, it would not be sound policy for the Government to step in and initiate very expensive measures on the subject. Those who sought to originate such measures were those who were interested in the manufacturing prosperity of the country. Mr. Whitworth's gift was a step in the right direction, and showed the value he attached to correct instruction in science connected with the industry of the manufacturing population. The noble Earl had stated—and the Minute of Council which had been made public had shown—the action of the Department in regard to Mr. Whitworth's munificent gift. At present the Department had only received an intimation of Mr. Whitworth's intention; and they had at present no knowledge of how he wished the gift to be administered and the exact manner of its practical application. A communication had been made to Mr. Whitworth requesting him to furnish the Department with information on this subject, and the Committee of Council had expressed their willingness to assist him so far as was practicable. They were now waiting his reply. In all probability Mr. Whitworth would wish to retain the general management of this fund in his own hands during his life-time; but he would, no doubt, be desirous that the Government should assist him by some mode of examination by which the comparative merits of the candidates for the scholarships should be tested. As soon as the Government were in possession of the precise terms of Mr. Whitworth's gift they would give the matter their best consideration, with the desire of aiding him as far as they could. As to the general question of how far the Government could assist the progress of technical education, he believed that the suggestions of the noble Earl were well worthy of attention. He thought that at a very small expense, and without going the length advocated in some quarters and by some of the deputations that had waited upon the Government on the subject, very considerable assistance and great encouragement might be given to the progress of technical education generally, following out the great principle that local exertions should be set on foot in the first instance. By giving some assistance to professors or to Colleges either now existing or which might hereafter be called into existence, he thought that considerable encouragement might be given to technical education at a very small expense; and he did not think that the public would grudge the expense. It would, however, be premature to form any decision on a subject which was now under the consideration of a Committee of the other House. That Committee would, no doubt, throw a light on the subject, and make practical suggestions which the Government would, he hoped, be able to adopt. It would, perhaps, be for the convenience of their Lordships, that he should lay the Minute of Council on Mr. Whitworth's gift upon the table.

LORD TAUNTON said, that there could be only one sentiment in the minds of the public—especially that portion of it which was connected with manufactures—as to Mr. Whitworth's gift. That very noble gift came at a most opportune time, when public attention was specially directed to the application of science to manufacturing and industrial processes. One of the advantages of the Paris Exhibition had been that English manufacturers and the most intelligent artisans had returned to this country deeply impressed with the feeling that they could not afford to throw away any advantages they could obtain, and that we were bound to educate our people as highly as those of other nations. It appeared to be admitted that many important branches of our manufactures were beginning to feel the effects of a closer competition than they had ever before experienced. It was singularly appropriate, therefore, that, at the present moment, this movement in favour of technical education should have originated from so eminent a mechanician as Mr. Whitworth. He hoped that his example would be followed, as there was every reason to suppose it would, by others, and he had no doubt it would stimulate not only the munificence of individuals, but also that of commercial bodies. It had been supposed that much might be done in ordinary schools of instruction to teach the elements and rudiments of technical education. Having been engaged in an inquiry into the present state of education of the country, he must express his opinion that the education of the children of the middle classes ought not to be of a technical, but of a general character. The general elements of science applicable to all arts ought to be taught; and a boy who had learnt these would be much better prepared to receive a technical education such as had been pointed out, than he was at present. He heartily concurred in thinking that the country was under great obligations to Mr. Whitworth for his splendid donation. The result would be much greater than the mere gift of money; because it gave the country an example to be followed, and which would in the end produce the most important benefits.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he wished to bear his testimony to the great value of the gift. He had known Mr. Whitworth pretty intimately for the last twenty years, and had had the pleasure of going down and seeing his establishment in Manchester. It was most interesting to see there the union of science with practical knowledge by which Mr. Whitworth had risen to the great eminence he now enjoyed. There were plenty of good workmen and scientific men; the difficulty was to find a good foreman, who, with the skill of the workman, united a superior scientific education. Mr. Whitworth was himself the very example of the man possessing the knowledge most wanted in this country, as he combined in the highest degree the two qualities. He admitted that it was difficult to give technical education in many branches, but an important step had been already taken by the Government in this direction. A few years ago, with the concurrence of noble Lords opposite, he commenced a system of teaching at Kensington by which shipwrights in the dockyards had an opportunity of acquiring scientific knowledge, so as to combine this with manual skill, and the plan had worked very satisfactorily. He believed an analogous system might be adopted by the introduction of scientific education in combination with manufacturing skill, though he was not an advocate for the Government undertaking technical education in all its branches.

Minute by the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council on Education respecting the Scholarships proposed to be founded by Mr. Whitworth: Presented (by Command), and Ordered to lie on the Table.

THE EASTER RECESS.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) addressed to me yesterday an inquiry, respecting the adjournment of the House for the holydays; to which I replied that it might be convenient to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that the adjournment should not be moved until after the conclusion of the debate. From what has reached me since, however, I am led to suppose that it would be for the general convenience of the House that the adjournment should be moved at once; although I would not press the Motion now if the right hon. Gentleman strongly objected to it. The Motion I have placed upon the Paper is that the House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday, the 20th of April. As far as all human arrangements may be considered certain there can be no doubt that the debate will finish to-night. It is possible that there may be two divisions; but, under any circumstances, the House will divide to-night. The ground is a delicate one to touch upon; but I am sure that, in the present unimpassioned state of the House, I may safely allude to what is likely to happen. Either the right hon. Gentleman will have a majority, or he will be defeated upon his Motion that the House do go into Committee. I wish to inform the House what will be the course of the Government under these circumstances—and, in case of a general agreement on both sides, there is no reason whatever why this Motion should not be made at once instead of amid the confusion and excitement that may prevail at the conclusion of the debate at three or four o'clock in the morning. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman is defeated, the question altogether falls to the ground. But, supposing for a moment—such a supposition, of course, appears most unreasonable—that the right hon. Gentleman has a majority, the course of the Government would be that which was clearly indicated by more than one of my Colleagues, and especially by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. What I should propose would be that I should offer no further opposition to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. I should be content that the right hon. Gentleman should go into Committee pro forma, and immediately to report Progress; because I think it my duty to facilitate in every possible manner the right hon. Gentleman in proceeding with his Resolutions. I shall be quite ready to give him a day immediately after the Easter Recess, but upon this point I am entirely in the hands of the House. It might be inconvenient, in consequence of the Royal visit to Ireland, which may detain Irish Members in that country, for the House to go into Committee upon the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions on the next day after we re-assemble; and the following Thursday has been appointed for the Budget, which, in my humble judgment, should not be deferred. It is of the utmost importance that the financial statement should be made on that day. Should, however, the following Monday, the 27th of April, be a convenient day to the right hon. Gentleman for going into Committee that day shall be at his service for the discussion upon his Resolutions, to which I need hardly say I shall give my most unqualified opposition. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the House upon its rising should adjourn until Monday, the 20th of April.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not know whether I am justified in interposing between the House and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Horsman) who had risen at the same moment, but I feel bound to make a protest against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, though upon one ground only. I do not intend to persist in my opposition should the right hon. Gentleman not be disposed to give way, nor to press the question to a division. The ground of my opposition to the Motion is that there is a manifest inconvenience in altering to-day that which was settled last night and has gone forth this morning, and has been taken for granted by many hon. Members who are not now in the House. If, therefore, there had been any feeling shown by the House against the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, I should have felt bound to press my objection. As it is, however, I by no means intend to insist upon it. I will now, with the indulgence of the House, briefly state my view as to the course that should be adopted with reference to the future progress of this question. I am bound to say that in a matter of this magnitude; if it had not been for the circumstance that by doing so we must have encroached upon the Easter holydays, I should have been more satisfied had we proceeded with the consideration of the Resolutions immediately. I should have been ready for that purpose to have made a sacrifice; but, on the other hand, I admit that such a course could not have been adopted without a great departure from precedent and from the customary usage of this House, and it would have been attended with inconvenience, especially as we must have devoted several days to their consideration. Moreover, the very last thing that I should wish to exhibit to the country would be any appearance of hurry in reference to this matter. This is a question which it is very desirable that the House should sift to the bottom, and as, for that purpose, the evenings of Monday and Tuesday next might be insufficient, and as I do not think anything would be gained by commencing the consideration of these Resolutions and then leaving off in the midst of the discussion, I am reluctantly prepared to forego the chance of making progress before the holydays. I have, of course, in the remarks I have made, been proceeding upon the supposition, which the right hon. Gentleman regards as so entirely impossible, that there might be a majority on the Motion for going into Committee. [MR. DISRAELI: I said unreasonable.] Well, we have all seen so many things happen that were strange—the right hon. Gentleman himself has seen so many things happen that were unreasonable, that I think I may venture to contemplate as a possible result the Motion for going into Committee being carried by a majority. As to the arrangements after the holydays, I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman upon this subject is altogether proper and satisfactory. I do not think it right to ask him to alter the arrangement made for the Financial Statement, which, owing to the date at which Easter falls this year, is necessarily somewhat late. I am quite satisfied, with the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, that the first day after that appointed for the financial statement shall be devoted to the consideration of this great and grave question. I have, therefore, no disposition to oppose the proposition that we shall go into Committee on Monday, the 27th of April.

Mr. HORSMAN: I do not intend to oppose the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman; but I must say that I think the course he proposes to take upon this matter is a very unusual one. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) brought forward his Resolutions, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said that a very serious and solemn issue was raised, an announcement that was followed by cheers from his supporters. But now, after the question has been debated for four nights, Her Majesty's Government come forward and state that, whatever may be the issue of the debate, and whatever the decision of the House, they will treat it with such indifference, if not with such contempt, that they will not give it even a respectful consideration. I recollect that last year when the right hon. Gentleman was out-voted on a minor question of Reform, he took two days to consider the course that the Government should take upon the matter. I think that out of respect for the House the Government should have waited to take into consideration the new position in which they may find themselves. They might have anticipated the possibility—however unreasonable it may be—of defeat; and have been prepared to announce whether they had arrived at the conclusion that it was for the public interest, and consistent with their own character, that they should carry out the decision of the House.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday, 20th April.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. CHAUFORD,

Mr. DISRAELI said, he intended to adhere to the Resolution which he had expressed with regard to the Reform Bills before the House, and not to proceed with the Scotch Reform Bill before the Irish Reform Bill had been read a second time.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

Mr. DISRAELI said, that the Civil Service Estimates would be proceeded with immediately on the re-assembling of Members after the holidays.

RETIREMENT OF FIELD OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

Mr. DIMSDALE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government intend to take any steps towards facilitating the retirement of Field Officers of the Indian Army?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that it was considered that the existing arrangements were sufficiently liberal for the purpose, and that it was not considered desirable to re-open the question.

LAND WRITS REGISTRATION

(SCOTLAND) BILL FEES.—QUESTION.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury have considered the Clauses as to fees in the Land Writs Registration (Scotland) Bill (Clauses 13, 22, 23), the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Bill (Clauses 60, 63, 102, 147, 148, 178, &c.), and the Court of Session (Scotland) Bill (Clause 13), and whether they will be amended so as to require all fees to be paid into the Exchequer; and, why some of the fees levied in Scotland by these Courts and departments were omitted from the Return, No. 223, of Session, 1867?

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH was understood to say, that he believed there would be no difficulty in making the amendment alluded to by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the second Question he was informed that there were no salaries charged by Law on the fees taken in the Courts mentioned.

BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

Mr. SERJEANT ARMSTRONG said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he sees any objection to extending to Ireland the provisions of the Bankruptcy Bill and the Judgment Debtors Bill, as presented by the Lord Chancellor to the House of Lords; and, whether he will introduce a Bill for the purpose during the present Session?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, in reply, that there was no objection that he was aware of to the introduction of such a measure; but, as the English Bill consisted of more than 500 Clauses, he did not think there would be any chance of extending it this Session to Ireland.

BOARD OF TRADE—PRIVATE BILLS. QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he wished to ask the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, Whether, Parliament having required a Report from the Board of Trade as to their opinion upon certain Bills, and the Board of Trade having reported their opinion unfavourably to them, the Board of Trade intend taking any steps to prevent the following Bills passing into Law in their present shape,—namely, the Tower Subway Bill, the Fareham and Netley Railway Bill, the Dungarvan Harbour Bill, the North British Railway (Forth River Railway) Bill, and two Isle of Wight Railway Bills?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE in reply, said, the duty of the Board of Trade was confined to making these Reports for the information of Parliament, and especially of the Committees to which the Bills were referred. Formerly, the Board of Trade made Reports on all Railway Bills; but those Reports were of little value, though they caused much expense and trouble. They were discontinued last year; and the only Reports now made were in case of Bills which, in the opinion of the Board's professional officers, were likely to affect injuriously tidal waters. The Reports were very carefully made; but, at the same time, they represented merely the opinion of individuals. It was, however, of course competent to the Committees to require the attendance of those officers for the purpose of testing their conclusions, or making further inquiries.

MEMBER FOR THETFORD—TITLES OF DIGNITY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to advise the Crown to confer a title of dignity on one of the Members for the Borough of Thetford; and whether this honour is due to any arrangements with the Government as to the Representation of that Borough?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is the habit of my hon. Friend to ask Questions which do not comply certainly with the conditions of social life and, as far as my experience in Parliament is concerned, scarcely with those of political life. I am at a loss to ascribe any definite meaning to this Question of my hon. Friend. At one time I thought that probably some one of whom he had been making similar inquiries had been practising on his frank intelligence. Then I thought it might be that he was made the instrument of bringing before the consideration of the Government the claims of some particular friend. The third interpretation I put upon it was that perhaps my hon. Friend desired to remind us that, should it be the intention of the Government to offer any advice to the Crown to confer titles of dignity, and especially the title of Baronet, there was one person who had paramount claims to such a favour. It is always my anxious desire to give the utmost information in my power to the House when any hon. Member, in the exercise of one of his most important privileges, interrogates the Government; but I will ask the House, in its candour to weigh the language in which this inquiry is made, and to sympathize with me in the trouble which grappling with so abstruse a Question entails upon me. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether it is the intention of the Government to advise the Crown to confer a title of dignity on one of the Members for Thetford, and whether the honour is due to any arrangement respecting the representation of that borough? Now, Sir, I think the House will agree that when inquiries of this nature are made of a personal and delicate kind they should at least be precise. No hon. Gentleman is justified in making such inquiries unless he is in possession of some information. How am I to understand to whom my hon. Friend refers by "one of the Members for Thetford?" I have inquired into the representation of the borough of Thetford, and find that it is represented by my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, who has recently appeared before the constituency; and therefore the only interpretation I can put upon this inquiry is that the hon. Gentleman wishes to know whether, in order to induce the Lord Advocate to stand for the borough of Thetford, I have recommended Her Majesty to confer upon him the title of Baronet. I can assure my hon. Friend there is not the slightest foundation for that impression; whatever may be the ambition of my right hon and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, it has not yet assumed the form which he evidently imagines. If the position of the other hon. Member for Thetford (Mr. R. J. H. Harvey) were not of so acknowledged a kind, I might be tempted to imagine that he had asked the hon. Member for Devizes to make this inquiry. But, as it is, I feel bound at once to state that no application has been made to me, either directly or indirectly, by either of the Members for Thetford; and that, therefore, under these circumstances it has not occurred to me to consider whether it was my duty to recommend Her Majesty to confer on either of those Gentlemen the dignity of Baronet.

ARRESTS IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. REARDEN said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, The nature of the charge under which Mr. John Downy, a merchant tailor of Dawson Street, Dublin, has been arrested and imprisoned for the last two months; whether it be true that detectives called upon him for information respecting a person named "Lennon," and on his asserting his ignorance of anything respecting the said "Lennon," they threatened to arrest him, and subsequently returned and did take him to prison; and, whether it be true that Mr. Downy's wife and eight children are reduced to a state of starvation in consequence?

THE EARL OF MAYO stated, in reply, that John Downy had been arrested simply because he was suspected of having been engaged in treasonable practices, and that the circumstances related by the hon. Member, even if they had occurred, would not in any way have influenced the case. He was informed, however, that a conditional order of discharge in the case referred to had been made out the day before yesterday.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session any Bill for the further continuance of Turnpike Trusts, of which the original

Acts have expired; and, if so, whether it is their intention to include therein, or otherwise to submit for consideration, any plan tending to the abolition of Turnpike Trusts; and at what period of the Session any such Bills may be expected to be introduced?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, a Bill on the subject was in course of preparation; but he did not think it would be wise to submit it to the House without consulting with those who had given much attention to it, nor did he think it would be desirable to bring forward a question likely to give rise to so much discussion at a late period of the Session.

ARMY—ALLEGED FLOGGING OF MULE DRIVERS IN ABYSSINIA.

QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to a letter, dated Zulla, March 4, which has appeared in the newspapers, and which states that the Turkish and Egyptian Drivers had been left for days without food or water, were flogged daily by fifties, and were finally sent off, almost in a state of nakedness, though the weather was very cold; and, whether he will make inquiries into the truth of this story, and ascertain who was responsible for the management of these drivers?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he had to state that his attention had been drawn to the subject a few days ago by the hon. Member for Derby, and he had in consequence written to Sir Robert Napier to inquire into the truth of the story. He could not but believe that the statement was greatly exaggerated.

THE PLAY OF "OLIVER TWIST."

QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to a paragraph which has appeared in several of the daily papers, to the effect that the Lord Chamberlain had refused to licence a play dramatised by Mr. Oxenford from Mr. Dickens's celebrated work of "Oliver Twist," and that all plays from the same Work were interdicted in London as being offensive to parish beadles; and, whether he approves of the Lord Chamberlain's consideration for the feelings of the parish authorities?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the fact was that, many years ago, two plays, which were supposed to be doing a great deal of harm—one of them named Oliver Twist and the other Jack Sheppard—were prohibited. The play referred to by the hon. Member, which had been dramatised by Mr. Oxenford, had been licenced by the Lord Chamberlain, who, he could assure the hon. Member, had not been petitioned by the parish beadles; consequently, the Question of the hon. Member was altogether founded in a mistake.

IRELAND—THE REGIUM DONUM. QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire a Question of which he had given him Notice—namely, Whether, in the arrangements he proposes respecting the Ecclesiastical Endowments of Ireland, he contemplates the maintenance or withdrawal of the Grant given to the Presbyterian and Nonconforming Ministers of Ireland—a Grant commonly called the Regium Donum?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot avoid, Sir, saying that I think the multiplication of Questions of this class is of a nature not very consistent with the usages of this House. When we are engaged in the discussion of a question, I think it is better that all explanations should be given within the time which is appropriated to that discussion; and I hardly know whether I am justified, after having answered the Question of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) last evening, in answering this. It would, however, be discourteous to remain silent under the Question that has been put by the hon. Member; but I hope the Answer will not be drawn into a precedent. I venture to say that I think the Question shows that the hon. Gentleman has not given his mind to the statement I endeavoured to make to the House—namely, that I do not intend to propose—and I consider it wholly beyond the limits of my duty to propose—any plan for settling or disposing of the question of Ecclesiastical Endowments in Ireland. I have ventured to state to the House, and, to a certain extent, to ask the assent of the House to certain principles and leading propositions which, it struck me, ought to be included in such a plan. The only propositions I have made applicable to the subject-matter of this Question are these—In the first place, that I consider all the principles of equity and consideration upon which I should propose and desire to deal with the Established Church must—I will not, however, say “must,” because that is not a Parliamentary word—but ought, after we have determined how to deal with the Established Church, to be applied in their full breadth to those other bodies who have Ecclesiastical interests in connection with the State. That is the first proposition; and the second is, that, by arrangements of some kind introduced into such plan, provision should be made for relieving the Consolidated Fund from payment for the purposes of religion in Ireland.

IRELAND—THE MAYNOOTH GRANT. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to advert to the Answer given him yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and for the purpose of doing so he should move the adjournment of the House. The Question he asked the right hon. Gentleman was, Whether he was prepared, in the event of his Resolutions being carried, to support the repeal of the Maynooth Grant? The Answer he received from the right hon. Gentleman was, that he should be prepared—or something equivalent to that—to relieve the Consolidated Fund of the charge for Maynooth. The right hon. Gentleman, however, was pleased to say that he would reply more fully to the Question at the close of the debate. The point, however, to which he (Mr. Whalley) wished to call attention was one that greatly affected the feelings of many persons who were watching this debate. The right hon. Gentleman would please to observe that he had not answered the Question which he had put to him. He took no interest in the question of the Consolidated Fund, or whether it was or was not to be charged with the payment of the Maynooth Grant. What he desired to know was, whether the Act for the endowment of Maynooth College, taking that institution out of the control of Parliament, was to be repealed or not? He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the courtesy of his reply; but he regretted that his feelings and his sense of duty obliged him to ask for a more satisfactory explanation. He trusted that in his reply at the close of the debate the right hon. Gentleman would specifically answer the Question, Whether or not he was prepared to support the repeal of the Act for the endowment of the College of Maynooth? He would beg to withdraw his Motion for adjournment.

RIOTS IN BELGIUM.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he could afford any information with regard to the riots in Belgium, whereby ten men lost their lives, and a large number were seriously wounded?

LORD STANLEY: The reports which I have received as to the recent disturbances ascribe them, not to any political cause, but to discontent among a portion of the mining population, caused by a recent reduction in the rate of wages. I have not heard anything about money being distributed among the insurgents; indeed I apprehend that it would be hardly proper to speak of them as insurgents; the whole thing appears not to have been so much an insurrection as a riot, though, undoubtedly, a riot on a rather serious scale.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th March].

"That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts,"—(Mr. Gladstone:)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "while admitting that considerable modifications in the Temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestablishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament,"—(Lord Stanley.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. COLERIDGE: Although I have meditated on the subject of to-night's debate from time to time as long as I have had anything which I could call a mind, and although for a great number of years I have maintained one and the same conviction, and that as strong a conviction as can be formed upon any subject, I do not know that I should have asked for the attention of the House in this debate were it not for some of the observations which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India. I agree with a great many of the principles, as far as they may be called Church principles, stated by those right hon. Gentlemen; and I am not disposed to quarrel with the terms which those right hon. Gentlemen used in stating those principles. And, yielding, as I do, to them in every other respect, but not yielding to them in the slightest degree in dutiful and humble allegiance to the Church, of which we are all members—[Laughter]—I mean all three of us—I desire to show how this matter can be approached from an English Churchman's point of view, and what a fallacy there is in the suggestion which is made that there is any inconsistency whatever in a man who hopes to die as he has lived, in full and undoubted communion with the Church of England, nevertheless desiring with his whole heart, and striving with his whole strength, to bring about the total abolition of the Establishment in Ireland. No doubt it is a common notion, which we have heard repeated several times in the course of the debate, that any man who touches or presumes to deal with the political condition and the social status of the Church, thereby deals with or touches the Church herself, and must needs be her enemy. And yet I venture to say a more baseless, groundless, utterly unhistorical notion it is difficult to conceive. Why, the Church existed and flourished ages before there were any such things as Establishments at all; she exists and flourishes at this moment in many countries—some of them colonies of our own, some of them foreign countries—in which there are no such things as Establishments. She is destined, in my belief, to survive for long ages their universal overthrow. With the doctrine, with the discipline, with the inner life and divine character of the Church, Parliament has, and can have, no claim whatever to intermeddle. Parliament did not create these things, and Parliament cannot alter or destroy them. But with the social condition, with the political surroundings, with the temporal accidents of the Church—with all that goes to make up the complicated idea which we express by the word Establishment, as it seems to me, the State has just as clear a right to deal as it has to deal with any other great institution of the country. Not more right, not less, but just the same. And wherever else this proposition may be disputed, and by whomsoever else this statement may be questioned, it cannot, I think, be questioned by any English lawyer, or disputed in an English Parliament,—and for this reason. Those of us who have the misfortune to be familiar with the text of our statute book know that the statute book opens with Magna Charta; but the first real Parliaments, and the first real statutes, date from the early years of Henry III. In the very infancy of our Parliaments—in 9 Henry III. and 7 Edward I., and in long succession afterwards—are to be found statutes of Mortmain. Read in their literal acceptation, those Acts forbid, in terms, the creation of any religious endowment in the future. No doubt there were political and feudal reasons for that interference with the rights of private property; and no doubt, also, those statutes were from time to time evaded, as they were enacted and re-enacted again and again in even stronger, more elaborate, more stringent terms. But I maintain, and I defy it to be denied, that they were from the earliest times notice to all mankind that the State of England and the Parliament of England claimed to have this matter of endowments in their own hand; that they claimed to deal, and did deal, with this kind of property more freely and more peremptorily than with any other kind of property whatsoever. Any man, therefore, in England who gave property for religious uses, whether in his lifetime or after his decease, gave it with full notice that the holding of his gift would be interfered with, if it should turn out that the holding of it by ecclesiastics was prejudicial or inconvenient to the interests of the State itself. I submit that this is the very least weight which ought to be given in any fair argument on this subject to the long succession of statutes of Mortmain. But to pass away from the statutes in the English statute book, the smallest consideration of general principles would lead one to the same conclusion. Persons who deny the right of the State to interfere with matters of this kind, do not attend sufficiently to the meaning of the words they use, and forget the very objects of society and the reasons and purposes for which States exist. I have read in a work of good authority that in Sweden, at the time of Gustavus Vasa, more than half of the real property of the kingdom was held for religious uses. Such a proportion would at once be a reductio ad absurdum of the argument for the sacredness of property so held; but I care not whether the amount was so great as one-half, because no man of sense would deny that a far less proportion would justify and, indeed, compel, the interference of the State to redress the evils which such a condition of things would, of necessity, engender. Therefore, the consideration in this case will be whether the condition of things is such as the State can approve. If not, the State has a perfect right to interfere. I apprehend that if this be the proper consideration in such cases generally, it applies with particular force to the case of the Church of England, or to the case now under discussion, that of the Church of Ireland, because both those great communities hold a large amount of property on new terms imposed at the time of the Reformation. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was quite correct in saying that there were no statutes which, in terms, transferred the ecclesiastical property in Ireland from one Church to the other; but in 1560, under the Lord Deputyship of Lord Sussex, there were passed the Act of Uniformity and the Act of Supremacy; and, at that time, the Prayer Book was set up instead of the Mass. Therefore, though, as the right hon. Gentleman said, there were no statutes transferring the possession of the property in substance, it was transferred by the statutes to which I have referred, because those statutes changed the terms on which the property was to be held. Further, the representatives of the great English families, whether in this House or the other, can scarcely dispute the fairness of the proposition which I have laid down, because there is hardly one of them who does not hold from the State grants of Church lands, not, perhaps, among the oldest, but certainly among the best and most valuable, of his title deeds. It is plain, then, that in dealing with these questions you must be guided by considerations of degree, of circumstances, of prudence, and of common sense. Arguments drawn from these considerations must be used if the Church of England were before us; and it is upon arguments such as these that, in my opinion, she could be irresistibly defended. But it is not the case of the Church of England which is before us. It is the case of the Church of Ireland; and on arguments such as those to which I have referred she is utterly and absolutely indefensible. But when we proceed to apply these principles to the case of the Church of Ireland, we are met by two objections, which, if they are well-founded, go to the root of the matter; which, therefore, with the leave of the House, I will endeavour to examine. It is first said that the principle of Establishments is attacked, and that if you give up the Church of Ireland you must give up the Church of England also. Next, it is said that there was a compact made at the time of the Union, and that a sort of understanding was come to at the time of the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act; and that what is now proposed to be done is in direct violation of what was, at all events, a moral compact between the great parties of the State. As to the principle of Establishments being attacked, I deny it altogether; because I do not admit in the sense, in the only sense, in which the words can be used so as to be any argument in a discussion of this description, that there is any such thing as a principle of Establishments at all. One can understand the principle of justice or the principle of love of your neighbour; or, taking a lower example, the principle of Free Trade, or the principle that taxation and representation ought to be correlative. These are things which are true in themselves—true in the abstract. They do not depend on time, or place, or circumstance; they are principles which ought to be observed everywhere and always. But in respect of Establishments, time, place, and circumstances, are the very essence of the question. What is fit here may be unfit there; what is tolerable here may be intolerable there; what is fit in one age may be unfit in another; what may, perhaps, be particularly suited to the condition of things in England may be particularly unsuited to the condition of things in Ireland. If all this talk about principle means only this—that, supposing an exactly analogous state of things exists in England to that which exists in Ireland, if you give up the Irish Church you are bound to give up the English Church also—why, then in fairness and candour I grant it you at once. But while the condition and the circumstances of the two countries are wholly different, what minutest step in the argument have you gained—if it is to be argument of fact and common sense—by the concession I have made? Take, again, the arguments founded on the compact at the time of the Union and the understanding at the time of Catholic Emancipation. I want to know in what sense the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who—if I may take the liberty of reminding him of it—was not so long ago a good and successful lawyer, put to the House that there was a compact at the time of the Union? He does not mean to say that anything could be done by one Act of Parliament which another Act of Parliament could not undo. He cannot gravely mean to contend that there is anything in the Act of Union which makes it different from any other Act, so as to put it beyond the competence of the Imperial Parliament to repeal it. He quoted a passage from Lord Ellenborough; but I should be very glad to know whether it was from a speech or from a judgment of Lord Ellenborough. I believe that, however sincere in his convictions, Lord Ellenborough was a thoroughly narrow-minded politician; and I have not the same respect for him as a politician that I have for him as a lawyer delivering a judgment in the Court of King's Bench. It struck me that the passage quoted by the right hon. Gentleman sounded much more like one from a speech in the House of Lords than one from a judgment delivered in a Court of Law. At all events, I am quite sure that the great men who passed the Act of Union—Mr. Pitt, Lord Castlereagh, and Lord Cornwallis—were the last men to put forward the argument that what they were doing was to tie the hands of Parliament in future. Taking the matter however, on lower ground, if it is said that touching the Establishment was no part of the measure of the Union, that is quite true. It is quite true, also, that those who passed the Union were firmly determined in this matter to keep things as they were. Again, as to what passed at the time of Catholic Emancipation, if all the authors of that measure, especially the great Lord Plunket, said, over and over again, that they believed the position of the Established Church in Ireland would be strengthened by Catholic Emancipation, I venture to think they said what was quite correct; because I believe that, but for the mitigating effect of the Act of 1829, the Irish Establishment would long before this have been swept away from off the face of the earth amidst the universal indignation of the people. So much for those preliminary objections. The question as to the Irish Church endowments is in its nature like that as to any other great features of the Constitution; for example, the law of primogeniture, the law of hereditary legislation, the law of wills, the law of entail, the law of marriage and divorce—all important laws which have been enacted within historic times, which have been altered and may, perhaps, be altered again, but which ought not to be altered without great and overwhelming necessity. They are laws as to which a heavy onus probandi rests on those who would alter them; but which it would be, nevertheless, the duty of Parliament to alter at once if, in the opinion of the great majority of the people, they came to work badly instead of well. But then it is said that we ought to abstain from applying this principle to the case of the Church of Ireland, because it is alleged that the Church of England and the Church of Ireland are part and parcel of one another, and that if we touch the one we must necessarily touch the other. Now, even if this were true, it would be no good plea in Parliament; for Parliament has already dealt with this question, and is in consequence perfectly competent, if need be, to deal with it again. I respectfully maintain, however, that the allegation is not correct. When have the Churches of England and Ireland been united? If the word “Church” be understood as signifying a religious body I apprehend that the 5th Section of the Act of Union could not unite the Irish to the English Church; and if it could unite the two, what an Act of Parliament has done an Act of Parliament can undo. If you speak of the Churches as religious bodies, I want to know when they were united, for certainly no Convocation or recognized organ of the Churches was ever consulted on the matter. Then, it is said there is a want of generosity on our part, and that we have no right in this unfair and unhandsome way to desert a weak ally. Again I say that I do not quite realize or understand this language. Rhetoric and metaphor are admirable and excellent things in their way, but they form exceedingly bad premises for practical conclusions, and we have no business whatever to look at this matter as a matter of generosity at all. The question at issue is this:—“Has the maintenance of the Irish

Church Establishment always been, and is it now, a grave and great injustice to the vast majority of the people of Ireland?” If it is we have no right whatever to be generous at their expense; for it is a mighty poor sort of generosity which is founded on injustice, and it argues some confusion of thought to use such an argument on such a subject. I venture to say that this case must be tried by the ordinary rules, and that if the Irish Church is to be defended at all it must be defended by ordinary arguments. Now, can the Irish Church be so defended? Whether it can or not, at all events, this debate has given us mighty little means of more satisfactorily answering that question; for, with the fullest recollection of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I yet venture to say that in the course of the three nights’ discussion no one has put forward a defence of the Irish Establishment on principle, and with a due consideration of the facts of the case which he had to defend. Certainly, no one has put forward a defence of the Establishment with anything like force or heart, no one above all occupying the position of a responsible Minister of the Crown. We have listened, indeed, to excuses more or less fair for not defending the Irish Church, and to reasons more or less good why the Irish Church cannot be defended; but I venture to say that we have heard nothing from any Member who has yet addressed the House which can be called a real defence of the Irish Establishment as it exists in 1868. That being so, I feel it would be a waste of time to enter at any length upon the miserable history of this strange and utterly indefensible Establishment. Those who care for it and who wish to make themselves masters of that wonderful and disgusting chapter in the history of human nature may turn to Hallam, or Burke, and to the latter volumes of Mr. Massey’s History, where they will find an account of the foundation and maintenance of the Establishment in Ireland. It is, perhaps, worth while to turn merely for a moment to those pages in order to see by what force and fraud it was originally set up. We have had letters referred to in this debate, some of which were anonymous, and most of them recently published, but I will take the liberty of reading an extract from a very old letter, which is not anonymous, and which has not yet been published. The letter was written by Mr

Edward Waterhouse, Secretary to the Irish Government, and in it he communicates his opinions on the subject of the Irish Church to Sir Francis Walsingham, afterwards Minister to Queen Elizabeth. The date is June 14, 1574, some years after Lord Sussex's Lord Deputyship. Waterhouse says—

"I am bold to tell your honour what I hear of these things, because it is meet you should know them, and because you must be the instrument to redress them. But whensoever any alteration shall happen, let all offices be given to soldiers of experience, and to none others. I would the Queen would also so bestow her bishoprics; for here is scarcely any sign of religion, nor no room for justice till the sword hath made a way for the law."

That is an interesting document, which will probably see the light before long in one of those curious volumes which are in course of publication under the direction of the Master of the Rolls. In the histories to which I have referred you may see also how, after the battle of the Boyne, the Church Establishment was supported by that long array of penal statutes which have been described as the wonder and the disgrace of this nation, and to which, as far as I know—and I am not speaking rhetorically—the history of mankind affords no kind of parallel. Let no man say it is a waste of time to recall these things because they have passed away and are forgotten. It is, indeed, quite true; and let us be very thankful for it that they have passed away; but they are not forgotten. And it is well that we, the Imperial Parliament of this country, should be reminded now and then to what ferocious lengths of cruelty political fanaticism is capable of going under the name of religion and with the sanction and applause of a whole bench of Christian Bishops; and with what infernal and persistent malignity the forms of freedom and the machinery of Parliamentary institutions may be employed to corrupt and degrade a whole people. You may read in the correspondence of Lord Cornwallis, not so very long ago, what frightful cruelties were wrought upon the fathers and the near relations of many men who are now alive, and who have heard their fathers relate them, in spite of the earnest and repeated remonstrances of that excellent and humane Viceroy, in defence of Protestant ascendancy and in the name of the Protestant Church. We do not like to hear these things talked about now, and we are heartily ashamed of them; but we keep up the institution which was their cause and is their symbol. Depend upon it, that as long as we choose to keep up that Church, so long we must expect it to cripple and interfere with our influence and prosperity both at home and abroad. Abroad it works in this way: England is the chief Protestant Power of Europe, and although, as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has pointed out, the country is withdrawing, with the general assent, under the wise counsels of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, from that intermeddling in foreign questions which was formerly the rule, still, as an independent, an impartial, and a wholly disinterested country, a great and commanding influence might belong to her in favour of toleration and liberality abroad. But no one who knows foreign people and foreign countries can be unaware that the Irish Church and the condition of the Roman Catholics in Ireland are flung in our faces with irresistible force when we would plead in favour of tolerant measures, and that the sincerity of our preaching on such matters is sorely discredited by the extraordinary contrast afforded by our practice. The first Napoleon, who was no bad judge of such a matter, considered that the state of Ireland operated to divert 30,000 or 40,000 from our army in time of war. And in more personal and more internal matters the failure of the system is the same. We know that the Church Establishment has failed altogether as a preacher of Protestantism. We have heard enough of the scandal of churches without congregations, pastors without flocks, the absence of an Irish Bible, and of a professorship of Irish, and of any attempt to educate, or instruct, or elevate the people during the long centuries which have elapsed between the time of Lord Sussex until now. All these things are traceable, directly or indirectly, to the Irish Church. They have been insisted upon again and again, with overwhelming force, by many illustrious men, and by no one more forcibly than by the late Lord Macaulay. The statements made by these men have not elicited even the semblance of an answer, because they are irrefragably true. It can hardly be denied—indeed, it is admitted by her worst enemies—that the Church of England is, upon the whole, a liberal and a tolerant institution, and that she has stood up for freedom and breadth of opinion in this country. But by the cruel necessity imposed on her by her position, the Church of Ireland must needs be as intolerant and as bigoted as she can. The reason is obvious. It is only by insisting on her difference from the Roman Catholic Church, by refusing to acknowledge a common Christianity between herself and the religion of the majority of the people, and by enhancing all the evils of that system and minimizing all the good in it, that she is able to maintain her position. And any attempt like that made by the admirable and excellent Bishop Berkeley to approach the Roman Catholics on the ground of common Christianity, and to treat them with Christian charity does but bring out in more revolting outline the glaring injustice of their relative political positions. And this is an evil for which nothing but total disestablishment can be a remedy. That being the state of the case, upon what grounds are we asked not to disestablish the Irish Church? It has been said, and gravely said, that this is a sentimental grievance; that it is not a thing of which the Irish people have any right to complain at all; that Ireland is flourishing; that the laws are fairly administered; and that the Government is not conducted in anything like a hostile or oppressive spirit. The last statement is no doubt perfectly true. Further, it is suggested that this is hardly a real agitation; that it is got up by English agitators for factious purposes, and that in the main the Irish people do not share it. Sir, if that last assertion be true, it is about the strongest argument in favour of our case which the wit or ingenuity of man could by possibility devise. As Burke says, in one of his papers on this subject, human nature must be degraded before it can be safely insulted. If it were really true that the Roman Catholics of Ireland felt the English Establishment in Ireland to be no insult and no injustice, this would show that the iron had indeed entered into their soul, and that centuries of humiliation had at last done their work. But, Sir, nobody believes this. At least, whatever else they are, the Irish are brave and high-spirited. In this, if in nothing else, they are like ourselves. Make the case our own. Should we endure it for a single year? Should we ever rest until we had got rid of what the First Minister of the Crown, not in heedless rhetoric, but with excellent reason, has called an "alien Church?" Suppose it had pleased Providence that the first Napoleon, with the whole power of Europe at his back, had at last worn us out and, instead of dashing himself against the rocks and snows of Russia, had succeeded in annexing us as a subject kingdom to his almost universal Empire. Suppose he had installed Catholic bishops in our cathedrals, placed Catholic priests in our livings, created a Catholic nobility, and governed us by a great Catholic ascendancy. Do you suppose that the people of this country would have rested before they got rid of what I find the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) in 1849 called—and I adopt the term—"a badge of slavery?" Of course we should not. And what should we have thought if some one like the noble Lord the Member for Londonderry (Lord Claud Hamilton) had got up in the House of Assembly in Paris, and said, "This is a pack of stuff. The English are flourishing; they have got their commerce and their agriculture; the law is well administered; they have toleration for their religion; nobody really complains in England; it is a thing got up by a crew of French agitators in this country for the purpose of worrying, for factious objects, the patriotic Government of His Majesty the Emperor." Of course it is idle to waste time upon arguments of this description; and I want to know why we are to stay our hands from plucking up by the roots this system—of course with the tenderest regard—[Ironical cheers].—I say with the tenderest regard to the vested interests of those many admirable and excellent people who now adorn the Irish Church, and of whom it may be said, in the language of truth and without the least admixture of flattery, that their faults are faults of the system and that their virtues are their own? We have had answers to that question, and I will deal very shortly with them. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government (Mr. Disraeli) writes a letter upon this subject—a letter which, says my noble Friend opposite (Viscount Cranborne), greatly re-assured him, and which he looks upon as the charter of the Irish Church. Now, I cannot help thinking that, though that letter has been criticized already from many points of view, the author of that composition is so myriad-minded that it admits yet of a new view. I remember that long ago, in 1852 or 1853, in the days of the Papal aggression, the noble Earl then at the head of the Government wrote a letter which was called the Durham letter, and I well recollect that the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government alluded to it. I suppose he had then gone from below the Gangway, and had ceased to use "heedless rhetoric," but he had taken to epigram. At any rate, I remember as a mere out-sider—being excessively tickled and amused by the vigorous and epigrammatic onslaught which he made upon that letter. He said of the Government of the noble Lord—and if he was here I am sure his "historic conscience" would bear out my quotation—that they were about to collapse "from a union of epistolary rashness and financial imbecility." These were memorable words. The right hon. Gentleman does himself great injustice in saying that he is heedless. Heedless is the very last thing that he ever was or could be; and I cannot help thinking that this letter, which reassures my noble Friend so much, was not a rash epistle, was not carelessly, but carefully written for an object—namely, for publication and as a manifesto. Now, will you find one single word from the beginning to the end of that letter about the Irish Church? There is a great deal about the crisis in England. There is a great deal about Church and State—I suppose in England; but of the Irish Church, which was the matter in hand, not a single syllable. There is not a word, not a letter, to justify any Gentleman on either side in accusing the Prime Minister of a breach of faith if he brought in a Bill to disestablish the Irish Church to-morrow. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman is going to do this. All that I can say is that I think my noble Friend is a little too easily re-assured. Well, then came the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. Did he say that the Government were not going to disestablish the Church? Nothing of the sort. He spent his time in a great deal of verbal criticism which, considering his high position in this House, I rather wondered he should condescend to. But there was nothing against disestablishment. Next came the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Did the right hon. Gentleman say that his Government were not going to disestablish the Irish Church? No. He said that he would not have a hand in disestablishment. He said nothing should induce him to touch it, and I quite believe him. If done at all, he said, it should not be done while he was upon the Ministerial Bench. But though from his strong feeling and manifest sincerity it would have done his heart good if he could have said, "The Government are determined under no circumstances to disestablish the Irish Church," he was too honest, too truthful, too high-minded to give utterance to a word of the sort.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Pardon me, I said, and said most distinctly, that the Government would offer every opposition to such a Resolution as that of the right hon. Gentleman; and that they would not take any part in the disestablishment or disendowment of the Irish Church.

MR. COLERIDGE: I still understand the right hon. Gentleman as I understood him before—namely, that they would offer every opposition to these Resolutions; and that, as a Government, they would take no part whatever in disestablishing the Irish Church. Of course, I have too much respect for the right hon. Gentleman not to accept his assurance that, as long as he remains a member of the Government, no such step will be taken. But I do not see in anything he has stated a contradiction of the statement I have made—that there is no guarantee in anything he has said to the House that the Government of which he is a member may not by-and-by disestablish the Irish Church. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I shall not enter into a struggle of assertion with the right hon. Gentleman, and probably the fault is mine in not understanding his explanation. We were then enlightened by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India. Did he do more than criticize the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, give a great many reasons why we should not go into Committee, and express an opinion which is, no doubt, perfectly true—that when we get into Committee we shall have to deal with a great many extremely difficult points of detail. On the part of another Member of the Cabinet the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Mayo) there has been hitherto not a little reticence. One would have thought that in his position as Chief Secretary for Ireland he would have been put in the front, but perhaps he will favour us with his views before we have done. I want to know upon what grounds you ask us to stay our hands, and say that we should not proceed to vote upon the question before us? Do you really want information? Is there any information you will have twelve months hence which you have not now? Are the 300 years which have elapsed since the time of Lord Sussex not enough? Are the sixty-seven years which have elapsed since the Act of Union not enough to give you information, and to determine your judgment? It is perfectly true that in February or March next you will have been twelve months longer in office. But what sources of information will be open to you in 1869 which do not, if you choose to look at them, now lie open before your eyes? Upon what grounds, then, do the Government of Her Majesty, the Leaders of the House of Commons, and the leaders of public opinion in this country withhold a declaration of their opinion on this subject, and object to go into Committee on a question of this kind, on which not only every Member of this House, but every reasonable and thoughtful man in the country, has long ago made up his mind one way or the other? If I am asked what I expect to get from these Resolutions, my answer is extremely short. I expect to show to Ireland that we have at last begun to look at Irish questions from an Irish point of view; that we are, at least, endeavouring to do the Irish people justice; that, if a great injustice is pointed out to us, we will have nothing to do with maintaining it because it may be accordant with real or supposed English interests or English ascendancy. I say, at all events, little enough as it may be and must be; if vested interests are, as they always ought to be, protected, it is, at least, notice to the whole population of Ireland that the days of English ascendancy are coming to an end. For when the garrison dismisses the chaplain and pensions him on full salary, it is notice that the members of the garrison are about to abandon their fortifications and come out and mingle upon equal terms with the peaceful inhabitants of the surrounding country. What may be the direct and immediate effect of the measure, he would be a very much bolder man than I pretend to be who would undertake to predict in anything like detail. I should think, in all probability, nothing very marked, decided, or striking; because I do not pretend to put this matter forward to the House as by any means a panacea. Though not yet exactly an old man, I have lived long enough and have had experience enough of life to doubt as to the merits of what is called a political panacea. Supposing the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire were passed to-night, and if a measure framed on them could be made law in the present Session, I should not be much disappointed if no immediately great effect were wrought in the condition of Ireland, or in the temper and feelings of the Irish people. It is the vice of political controversy that measures which become the subjects of it are exceedingly apt to have their immediate value and practical importance extravagantly exaggerated both by those who resist and by those who recommend them. And it is one of the commonest mistakes of youth and inexperience to expect to see the results of our labours—a fault which a few added years and a wider acquaintance with affairs sternly but inevitably correct. We learn in time, sorrowfully but surely, how little good can be effected by the highest genius and the greatest virtue in the lapse of even the longest life which is commonly accorded to mankind. But this ought to be no reason to us for a dull and stupid acquiescence in a state of things which is admitted to be bad; still less is it a reason for our doubting as to the ultimate triumph of truth and right, or any slackening in our own efforts to advance them. To us who believe in the Divine Original of Christianity, and who remember how mysteriously small a part of the habitable globe it has as yet affected, and how inadequate a proportion of the population of even Christian countries it has directly and practically converted—to us it is and can be no kind of argument at all against the truth and justice of any system, that in itself, and by itself, it fails to work any sudden miracle of change. Rather, surely, if we rightly consider it, this ought to be a motive to us for unceasing energy and untiring effort, for going on—as I believe the great German phrased it—“unhasting, unresting,” in the path of what we know or believe to be equity and uprightness; keeping fresh—if we can keep them fresh—that earnestness and enthusiasm without which nothing really great was ever yet wrought upon the stage of human affairs; keeping them fresh and tempering, but not quenching them with common sense and reasonable judgment; and being content to cast the good seed into the ground in faith, and to leave to a far higher than any human power to fix the season for the ripening of the grain, and the time for reaping and gathering into barns.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I am conscious, Sir, that I am rising at a disadvantage after the gorgeous eloquence of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge); still, I venture to occupy the House for a short time while I endeavour to recall it to some practical considerations of common sense, which seem to me to have been too much overlooked in the previous portion of this debate. Preceding speakers have approached the subject either as absolute Englishmen or absolute Irishmen. I venture to do so as belonging to a class which may, I hope, multiply every year, if the good estate of the Commonwealth is to be maintained—those whose affinities are partly English and partly Irish, and who can therefore deal with the question as themselves sympathize with either portion of the realm. More especially can I claim a personal interest in both branches of the United Church, identified as I am with one of the chief seats of education for the English Church, and also as representative of an illustrious Relative in a foundation created for the benefit of the Church of Ireland by his thoughtful munificence. In the name, then, of our common country and of our common Christianity, let me ask, what is the use of ripping up those miserable old sores connected with the times of Lord Deputy Sussex, and Waterhouse, and Oliver Cromwell? What have they to do with the Ireland of the present day—with Ireland of the steamboat—Ireland of the railroad—Ireland of the Incumbered Estates Court? Why call us back to a cautionary and separatist policy, just at the moment when the experiment of the substantia amor of two portions of the kingdom can really be tried under mutual conditions which never before existed? The legislation of Parliament, of the Parliament in which Ireland no less than England is represented, tends, and ought to tend, to the unification and consolidation of the Empire. It ought to be based on what Grattan would call the “con-corporation” of Ireland with England. But whenever an Irish grievance rises up, Irish patriots talk as if Ireland were a separate country, with interests diverse from those of the remaining realm. I ask those Gentlemen, what would Ireland gain by being separated from the United Kingdom and becoming—for that is the real drift of their agitation—a separate commonwealth, whether as kingdom or republic? How would she stand with a limit set by the sea on all sides, with little scope for manufactures from the absence of coal, and with so large a portion of her small area occupied by mountains and bogs? As far as her own means of advancement carry her, would Ireland have been more than a third-rate

Power of Europe—something no better than, if so good as, Denmark, or Portugal, or Greece? Instead of that she has been consolidated with Great Britain, and she has taken her ample part in all the internal and political advantages of the Empire. No man who looks over the list of our Colonial officials can fail to have been struck with the prevalence of Irish names upon the roll. We find there Irish Governors, Irish Judges, and Irish Ministers. To come home to England itself: out of our twelve puisne Judges, one-fourth at this moment are Irishmen. A few months ago Irishmen formed one third of the members, and the one whom we have lost was a member of that Church whose grievances are being brought so prominently forward on this occasion. The Lord Chancellor at this instant is himself an Irishman. We find Irishmen conspicuous among the merchant princes of Liverpool and Manchester. In return for this enormous balance of advantages which Ireland reaps by being one with England, we have only asked it to concede one further mark of identity—the unification of the Established Church. The fact being that the Monarchy is one, the Peerage one, and the Parliament one, so the Established Church should be one. But it is said that this would be an intolerable grievance. I ask, whose grievance would it be? It must be the grievance either of the educated man, or of the peasant, or of the Roman Catholic priest. I have disposed of the educated man. As to the peasant—supposing for him to be aggrieved—where would the aggravation be? It must be found in something which pretty continually forces itself upon his perception. Well, then, it can hardly arise from the presence each Session in the House of Lords of a Archbishop and of three Bishops of whose names he has probably never heard, and of whose existence he is not likely to be reminded once in ten years. No one would be absurd enough to contend this, although the Peerage of the Irish Episcopate is a main element of the Establishment. His grievance, if any, will be found in what he sees—the superior standing and comfort of the Protestant clergy with their houses and glebes, and churches over that of their priests—or of the Presbyterian Ministers. But this is just the point which the proposal before the House will not touch; for my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire—and herein alone do I agree with him—purposes to reserve those churches and glebes for their present occupants. There remains the grievance of the Roman Catholic clergy—and that I desire to treat with all respect. I can understand their feeling aggrieved because they do not occupy the position of social comfort and independence to which, as the clergy of so large a portion of the Irish community, they have an equitable right to expect. I admit their grievance so far. It is to be regretted that they cannot enter into possession of parsonages and glebes. But what has that to do with the disestablishment of the Irish Church? Supposing that they were claimants for its endowments I should understand the argument; but they do not demand to be raised to the position now occupied by the clergy of the Established Church; they prefer no claims for its revenues—they merely demand that the Church should be disestablished, and then that all the tithe and other revenues should be appropriated by the Government, returned to the landlords, or otherwise disposed of not to their own benefit. How can the House, so long as the Roman Catholic clergy are in this mind, take cognizance of their opposition to the existence of the Establishment as a serious argument for its downfall, when, by their own confession, their feelings are only those of disgust at seeing other people in a better position than themselves, without a purpose of bettering their own condition by the injury of their neighbours? Still, it may be argued that, in reality, they would not be coy about accepting the glebes and residences when the offer comes to be actually made, and the corollary is that these can only be provided out of the resources of the Establishment. Against this dictum I emphatically protest. It is absurd and unworthy to contend that a great country like ours is unable to do one act of justice towards a handful of clergy—some hundreds, and these celibates, and therefore easier to deal with, for their requirements must be smaller—without plundering somebody else in the process. Why, in the fervour of the first Reformed Parliament, we were able to find £20,000,000 to compensate the slave-owners in the West Indies, and yet we now haggle over the smaller sum which will be necessary to place the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland in that position of comparative ease and comfort to which they are certainly entitled at our hands. But it is urged that there is no necessity for seeking the money elsewhere, since it can be so easily obtained by despoiling the Irish Church. But besides the patent injustice of this proposal, there is a fatal practical objection to it. If we succeed in contenting the Roman Catholic clergy by this plan, we do it at a cost which will far outweigh its political advantages; for we shall equally succeed in discontenting the Protestant minority in Ireland, while we shall excite and terrify the whole Protestant population of England. We shall do all this mischief owing to the manner in which we provide a small scintilla of endowment which might, with the greatest ease, be procured from other sources. It is said, however, that the disendowment will content the larger part of the Irish people, and make them evermore loyal, and this assertion stands for all argument. But is this the fact? Has it not been made apparent that those who are most clamorous for the disestablishment of the Irish Church are also those who are most clamorous for the repeal of the Union, and who regard the one change as the stepping-stone to the other—and both, it may be, as contributions to the dismemberment of the Empire. So the concession which we are asked to make, will be a concession made to that very class of the Irish population who wilfully shut their eyes to the advantages of the incorporation of the two countries, who prefer municipal to Imperial considerations, and who rather chose to regard themselves as members of a conquered race, than of a triumphant and united Empire. If by such means we contributed to the contentment of any, it would be to that of the very class whose contentment is most dangerous to the common weal, because it means separation from England. But the advocates of disestablishment have recourse to abstract arguments, and plead that no comparison can be instituted between the Church of England and the Church of Ireland, because, while the former is the Church of the majority, the latter is the Church of the minority. But, if the Churches united, considerations of comparative numbers become local questions, and should be treated as municipal matters with a view to the varying circumstances of each district. The Church of Munster is not the Church of Leinster, nor is that again the Church of Ulster, as none of them is the Church of Middlesex or Surrey. Let the Church of Munster, then, be considered with a view to the spiritual benefit of Munster, and the Church of Ulster with one to that of Ulster. The proportion of Churchmen to Nonconformists varies in every part of England and Ireland; but the Irish Church is a part of the United Empire, and if we permit it to be disestablished, what guarantee have we for the safety of the Establishment in those parts of England where the Church happens to be unpopular or out-numbered? The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, in his pleasant way, pointed to the analogy between Ireland and Wales as both conquered countries. But, as in Ireland, so in Wales, the Anglican communion is not in the majority. It may be said that the unpopularity of the Irish Church had arisen from its having been of yore too aristocratic, and having too exclusively drawn its supply of ministers from the upper classes; while the weakness of the Welsh Church proceeded from a totally different cause—namely, the peasant extraction, the insufficient education, and the too homely ways of the clergy, which had prevented their acquiring the influence which a higher rank of men would have done as the recognized leaders of public religious opinion. But from different causes like events have accrued. The over-aristocratic Irish and the over-peasant Church of Wales had both been distanced during former generations, and now that both have awakened to a better future, each is threatened with vexatious punishment for the shortcomings of past days. The general praise accorded to the actual energy of the clergy of the Irish Established Church shows, I repeat, that, if they suffer, it will be for the faults of their predecessors. What safeguard, then, was to be found, that at no distant time the Welsh Church will not be called to a similar account. The day the Irish Establishment has gone, the Welsh Church will be trembling in the balance; and after the disappearance of the Establishment from Wales, how long does the House think that the English Church will be able to withstand the assaults of her enemies? Eager eyes are already scanning the comparative statistics of Churchmanship and Dissent in such counties as Cornwall and Lancashire. I utter this warning more as a son of the Church than as a member of the Establishment. I should belong to the Church of England even if she ceased to be established, as I should belong to the Episcopal Church of Scotland, in communion with the Church of England, if I were a resident in that country. I am attached to the Church of England apart from all question of Establishment, because of her apostolic orders and her reverence for the antique traditions of pure and primitive Christianity. I shall belong to her because I venerate and love her beautiful form of service by which she pleads her kinship to the Universal Church. But, because my attachment to the Church of England is independent of her being established, I am the more convinced that, as she possesses that great advantage, all who love should be ready to make every sacrifice in order to maintain it. There is no doubt that the whole question of Establishments will soon be ripped open. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) has contended that the defenders of the Irish Church were arguing in a circle, and had brought forward no argument which ought to convince a Roman Catholic. I now venture to produce one which has not been used before, and which I think ought to carry conviction to Roman Catholics. I appeal to their own regard for their safety; and I desire to remind them that they may be pulling about their ears more than they expect when they assail the Church of England. Christendom has, unhappily, shaped itself into many organizations—some of them more or less aristocratic or despotic, and others of a more or less democratic complexion. The Roman Catholic Church represents most completely the aristocratic or despotic form of Church organization; while the Presbyterians, and, to a still greater degree, other Dissenting Protestant bodies, are democratic. The Church of England, however, while partaking of both characters, pursues a middle path, happily removed from either extreme. A very distinguished, and certainly devoted, Roman Catholic writer on ecclesiastical matters—De Maistre—in the early part of this century dwelt upon this characteristic in a striking passage, which was once quoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, in one of his pamphlets on Church questions. His assertion was in effect that the Church of England was, so to speak, the general pacificator—the middle term among the different Christianities of the world; and that if ever Christendom was happily to be restored to unity, it must be by the agency of the English Church. Weaken, then, that communion—disestablish the Church of Ireland—what do you leave? There would be several hundred thousand discon-

ted persons let loose from that bond of session which their connection with the State has created. Do you suppose that these people would again voluntarily cleave in a moderate episcopal communion upon the well-balanced traditional platform of the Church of England? At times the pre-fervid Celtic intellect is apt to run into extremes, particularly when face to face with such a grievance as Protestants would undoubtedly possess. Is there, then, no risk that many of them will, from antagonism to Rome, rush to some development of strong democratic Christianity, while a fresh and furious "No Popery" cry from a mass of chained partisans may teach the Roman Catholics that they had done an unwise thing in urging on the demolition of the Church Establishment for the sake of a fleeting political advantage? When the intense animosity against those dioceses of the Established Church which happen to land on the other side of the Channel has accomplished its purpose, the Roman Catholics of England, as well as of Ireland, will be grievous sufferers; for they will have broken the breakwater which stands between them and the excesses of popular prejudices. I warn them in time that they will to their cost substitute the rampant "No Popery" cry for the dignified mobilisation of the Anglican Church. For these reasons I intend to vote against the Motion going into Committee in any form; for I have no wish whatever to discuss the resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. If the House shall go into Committee and consider those Resolutions, I will say "No" to them. If by any chance the ambiguous and unsatisfactory amendment of the noble Lord should become the Main Question, nothing whatever will induce me to vote for it.

MR. STANSFELD thought the issue between Her Majesty's Government and themselves had by this time become sufficiently clear. It was true the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for India, and some of his Colleagues, alluded to the resolutions of his right hon. Friend as vague and unsatisfactory; and if he remembered rightly, the right hon. Baronet went so far as to say that those Resolutions proposed the minimum of that which would be sufficient if they were successful to oust the Government, and intimated cathedrâ that to oust the Government from office was the first and great object of those Resolutions. Now, he (Mr.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Stansfeld) did not understand how the right hon. Baronet could put himself forward as able impartially to decide that the main object of those Resolutions was to oust the Government from office; and, in his (Mr. Stansfeld's) opinion, if these Resolutions, and the action of his right hon. Friend in propounding them to the House had one characteristic more than another, it was that they were specific, straightforward, and definite, and, as far as time and the practical competence of this Parliament admitted, they were Resolutions of a practical character. The Resolutions, in the first instance, laid down the principle that, for great reasons of policy, it was necessary to disestablish the Irish Church. Members of the Government had chosen to confound disestablishment and disendowment; but the House perfectly understood that it was with the political question of disestablishment that they had in the first instance to deal; and that, as his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Bernal Osborne) had said, the question of the application of the funds which might be at the disposal of the State if the Resolutions were adopted, was secondary and subordinate. The purport of the Amendment, too, had become clear, if it was not so originally. The Amendment rejected the notion of action; and so far it formed the one little bit of common slippery ground upon which the Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary had been struggling for foothold before the House. But it did more—it not only rejected action—it refused discussion. It was an Amendment which, if adopted, would have the effect of preventing the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend being read at that table, nor would any Member of the House have been able to record his vote in respect to any one of these Resolutions. And yet, though it was not, apparently, for this moribund Parliament to have an Irish policy, or to express an opinion on the Irish Church Establishment. Her Majesty's Government had an Irish policy, and that Irish policy they had propounded before these Resolutions were tabled by his right hon. Friend. And in spite of the appearance of suspended animation in the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he thought he might say that the Irish policy of Her Majesty's Government had been revived. Now, what was that policy? As far as he could judge, from the statements made by different Members of the Government, it might be described in these few words, "Catholic endowment as the purchase money of Protestant ascendancy." If that description was not correct, he knew not what meaning to attach to the words, "levelling up." Besides this, there was nothing but some poor manipulation, for the benefit of the Protestant State Church in Ireland, of the funds and revenues of that Church. The announcement of that policy was followed by the now notorious Dartmouth letter—a cry on the part of the First Minister of the Crown appealing to all the old bigotries and buried sectarian frenzies of the country to support the Government in perpetuating, if they should be able, the injustice of the Protestant State Established Church in Ireland. When hon. Gentlemen voted to-night they would vote upon a distinct issue. Those who voted for the Resolutions would do so because they were convinced that, whatever uses might afterwards be found for her revenues, the disestablishment of the Irish Church was a great measure of political justice and of urgent necessity; and because they were determined—and he trusted no others would record their votes in favour of the Resolutions—that, as far as their influence went, this Parliament should not pass away until they had recorded the expression of that conviction as well as a pledge of their sincerity in entertaining it. In order to justify the right hon. Gentleman for bringing forward these Resolutions it was necessary to satisfy themselves in the first place of the justice and the wisdom, and he might even go further and say the urgent and immediate necessity of the proposals he had brought forward; and in the second place, it was necessary to justify the method and occasion of the presentation of those proposals to the House. The first of those questions was not only the prior but the larger question. The policy of disestablishment was a policy of justice. As had been said by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) the Protestant State Church in Ireland was an institution indefensible in argument. It fulfilled none of the essentials of a State Church. He could, he hoped, understand and appreciate the feelings and sympathies of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), when he spoke of his attachment to the principle of a State Church, to which the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne) had the other night so feelingly expressed his devotion. He (Mr. Stansfeld) thought, however, that he could say something which might more or less relieve the minds of the noble Lord and of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge. It seemed to him that so far from their principle of an Established Church being at stake in the case of the Establishment in Ireland all their arguments were so many condemnations of that Establishment. Statistics in detail were impertinent upon such a question, and inquiries as to the appropriation of the revenues were utterly irrelevant in presence of the fact that the Church in Ireland was the Church of a wealthy minority of about one-ninth of the population. In virtue of that broad fact the Irish Establishment was doomed. If there were a theory upon which, in these days, they could justify an Established Church, what could it be but this, that in some sufficient sense the Church summed up the collective faith, and ministered to the religious needs of a community. Tried by that test the Established Church in Ireland stood condemned. There could no longer be a perpetuation of churches without congregations, and cures without souls. It was said that if the Church of Ireland were disestablished the Church of England would be in danger; but in reference to the English Church there were two things which he might be allowed to say. In his opinion the immediate future of the Church of England would depend upon what took place within, and not upon what took place without her pale; save that if those who resisted the disestablishment of the Irish Church should succeed in raking up the old embers of sectarian and of race enmity, in making of this a prolonged, a painful, and a severe struggle, then he thought it was possible that they might achieve that which they had before this achieved; that they might conduct their defence in such a manner, and for such a time, as to bring down ultimately ruin upon the principle and the institutions which they most valued, as well as upon themselves. Disestablishment was not only a policy of justice, but of absolute and of urgent necessity, because it became a part of the large and dominant, and, to the Irish, all-embracing question—the condition of Ireland. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had asked the other night, completing the quotation of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, if they could "minister to a mind diseased;" and there was some truth in the statement that Ireland was in a morbid condition. But what was the malady of Ireland; for, whatever it was, they must remember that they were bound over in the heaviest recognizances to find a cure for it. It was impossible to allow Ireland to be what she had been called—the Poland of the West; and there were only two courses, absolutely diverse and divergent, upon which they could proceed in dealing with the malady of Ireland. The one was that of entire suppression; while the other was diligent, impartial, and untiring search after what should be a complete remedy for the condition of the Irish people. It was said that the Irish were an unsatisfied nationality. He ought to know something upon the subject of unsatisfied nationalities, and he believed it was quite possible from present appearances, and, in spite of existing dissatisfaction, to bring the promise of future peace and union. It was a mistake to suppose that when symptoms of the spirit of nationality arose they must either succeed in suppressing them, or else must give them full sway, and allow them to lead to absolute separation and independence. What was nationality but individuality? We might respect the individuality without having to sever ourselves from the nation. We had done so in the case of Wales and Scotland. We lived in harmony with the Welsh and Scotch, because we had not imposed our Church on Wales or Scotland. And if we followed the same plan with regard to Ireland, we might expect a similar result to follow in the course of time. In the eloquent speech of the Home Secretary the other night, he had said—

“If I could do anything to bring back love and concord, Heaven knows how many sacrifices I should be ready to make to attain so desirable an object. If justice required that I should give up my dearest prepossessions, and I saw any certainty of arriving at success, I would stand aside.”

Well, the right hon. Gentleman must know that the Irish nation had asked this measure of justice at their hands, and he hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues would consider whether the time had not come when the concession should be made—when they should remove their restraining hand, and allow the people of Ireland to do that which they would do for themselves if they had the power—namely, get rid of an Establishment which, if Ireland were a separate nation, there was no sane man who could defend. It was urged that, if they removed the Establishment, they would run the risk of losing the attachment of that small minority of the people who supported them. If there was that risk, it must be encountered; for they must remember that, as the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had said on the previous evening, the disestablishment of the Irish Church was a conditio sine qua non to the loyalty and satisfaction of the great bulk of the Irish people. He could understand that the small minority who had enjoyed privileges at the expense of their fellow-countrymen might be reluctant that the latter should be put on a footing of equality with themselves, and that religious ascendancy should cease; but the Imperial Parliament ought not to be actuated by a consideration of that feeling, if it existed. He believed that, when the temporary irritation involved in the disestablishment of the Irish Church had passed away, we should have the whole population of Ireland reconciled to our rule, and the two countries would be made one, in fact and deed, as well as in name. Of the motives attributed to his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) he would say nothing in his presence; but would apply himself to the objection which had been made as to the time of bringing forward this Motion. The Motion was brought forward now because the times were ripe for it. Events in America and Ireland had pressed the subject upon their minds—showing them their danger, pointing out their duty, and giving them an additional motive for endeavouring to fulfil it. Recent events in this country had also done much to forward the question. Within the last few years, the minds of most men on political questions had advanced half a generation; and the present Prime Minister was the first to reveal to them the hollowness of Conservative resistance, and thereby to stimulate the hopes and courage and consciousness of power of “truly Liberal” politicians. But more than that—a consequence not contemplated as within the range of probability by the right hon. Gentleman—he had raised and stimulated the conscience of the country, which, when appealed to, would not respond to the old Shibboleths of party, or sectarian, or race antagonism, but would be true to the simple ideas of justice and of the equality and brotherhood of the Irish people. Another reason for their bringing the subject forward was, that they had been challenged to do so by the Government; for they were told before these Resolutions were laid on the table that Government had an Irish policy of their own, distinctly opposed to the principle of disestablishment, and he did not see why they were to be precluded from challenging that policy. He had desired to see the suffrage increased to a large extent; but he should be sorry to say that the last Parliament under the Constitution of 1832 was not competent to deal with this question as far as time would permit. If the Amendment should be carried, they would pronounce their own incompetence even to leave the legacy of their convictions to the next Parliament. When his right hon. Friend read at the table the words of his Resolutions, he spoke the doom of the Protestant Establishment in Ireland, and gave the assurance of future peace, concord, and union. Every Irishman—whether dwelling in Ireland, in the homesteads of Canada, or in the Western States of America—would feel that the day of justice too long delayed had dawned at last for the country of his birth, and that a great and crying injustice and persistent evil, the last relic of centuries of oppression and misrule, was about to pass away.

THE EARL OF MAYO: The language with which the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down concluded his speech, is the same as was uttered thirty-three years ago in this House on the same subject. Then, as now, this question of the Irish Church had become a great party cry; then, as now, the parties in the State were ranged on either side, and the same words were used as now—namely, that the Irish Church is doomed. Since then the party opposite have been for a long time—during twenty-eight years—in Office, with majorities sometimes large, sometimes moderate; but, either from a disinclination to interfere with the matter, or from a feeling that the line laid down and the principle adopted in 1835 were untenable, no action has been taken in the matter. I am rather reluctant to prophecy, but I believe it will be found in future times, when this question comes to be discussed and better known than it is now, the same result will follow; and the Protestant Church in Ireland, though it may be reformed, improved, and amended, and rendered much more in harmony with the requirements of the country and the feelings of the people, will nevertheless remain in its strength and in its purity. I am glad the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down did not repeat in the same terms the charges of inconsistency which have been brought against the Government by former speakers. He seemed to admit what I think must now be patent, to all, that the policy of the Government on this question is clear and defined, and that they believe it to be consistent with their duty, with the principles they profess, and with what they think useful and good for the country, that they should oppose any proposition for the disestablishment or disendowment of the Irish Church. I heard, with some surprise, one of the ablest dialecticians in this House endeavour last night, apparently with great pains and labour, to fasten upon the Government the charge of inconsistency in this matter. He argued that our course had been uncertain and vacillating. From the various speeches delivered on the part of the Government, he tried to argue that the Government had put forth an uncertain sound. Now, I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) through all the various events, speeches, and circumstances to which he referred; but I maintain that he utterly failed in proving that there was the smallest particle of inconsistency in the course adopted by the Government since the question was first mooted in public last year, when the Earl of Derby, in the other House of Parliament, resisted the addition proposed by Earl Russell to his Resolution in favour of a Commission. Since then the conduct of the Government has been invariably the same, and they have never lost an opportunity of declaring that it was their duty to maintain the Church of Ireland as an Establishment, and to resist all attempts to disendow it. As a proof that they entertained this opinion, I will adduce the fact that the noble Lord lately at the head of the Government agreed to the Commission moved for by Earl Russell, in the other House, on the distinct ground that the Commission was to inquire into the position and revenues of the Establishment, with a view to see how any anomalies and inequalities could be removed, and how the property of the Church could be made more beneficial than it is at present. With that view a Commission was appointed, which, notwithstanding all that has been said against it, is, I think, a perfectly impartial one. Nobody, I imagine, supposes that we ought to have selected to serve upon it avowed enemies of the Establishment, and gentlemen who had strongly declared their adherence to the voluntary system. That would have been directly in opposition to the principles on which the Commission was appointed. So the Commissioners selected were five Gentlemen professing Conservative opinions, and four Gentlemen professing Liberal opinions, all of whom had then a considerable interest in the question, and all of whom, I believe, are perfectly competent to deal with it. Sir, I feel convinced that the Report of that Commission, in its amplitude, in its importance, and its interest, will hardly ever have been excelled by the Report of any Royal Commission that Her Majesty has ever appointed; and, I believe, that all that has been said with regard to the sufficiency of the information now at the disposal of the House upon this subject is an entire mistake, and that you will find in the Report of this Commission an amount of information, and a number of facts which are perfectly new, and which I maintain this House ought to be in possession of, and have time to consider before they can possibly proceed even to deliberate upon this important question. The next event which took place was the speech which I made, and the words—imperfect words, I admit, but admitted to be quite sufficient for their purpose—used by me when the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork was before us. I then showed distinctly that, not only my own opinion, but the opinion of the Government, was in favour of maintaining the Irish Church, and that it was part of our policy and principles to resist any Motion for disendowment. I strictly guarded myself against opposing reforms or alterations which might tend to the improvement of the Establishment, or to a more useful application of its revenues; but I distinctly stated, with the assent, I believe, of every one of my Colleagues, that we should resist any attempt to interfere with the fundamental principle of the Establishment. It seemed to me that the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) were entirely contradicted by his own words. He said, “Your conduct was vacillating;” yet, he adds, that my words seemed to challenge the step now taken by the party opposite. Now, what I said was not meant as a challenge; but, if it was to be taken as a challenge, and as an expression of opinion, which it was the duty of the party opposite immediately to controvert, and obtain the judgment of the House upon, surely, it cannot be described as in any respect vacillating or uncertain. Well, a Notice of Motion was given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). It was met by an Amendment which, as I think, was perfectly clear and intelligible. That Amendment embodies a statement which, I think, nobody will be able to controvert, which, I believe, events will prove to be true—namely, that it is not only improper but impossible that the present Parliament can deal with the question. Surely, no one can say that such an Amendment is proof of vacillation. Well, then, I come to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, which, if anybody could have had the smallest doubt on the subject, was quite sufficient to convince any candid mind what the opinions of the Government are upon this question. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) is not in his place, because, when he makes these charges of inconsistency, I cannot but recollect that, while he has been loudest in his protestations against everything in the shape of Parliamentary Reform, he yet sat in two successive Governments which were pledged to the principle of Reform—nay, more, which were always bringing in unsuccessful Reform Bills; and, I cannot but recollect, too, that while he has always declared himself a strong enemy of the Irish Church, he still was, for many years, a Member of Governments, one of whose cardinal points of policy, as regards Ireland, was invariable resistance to the overthrow of the Irish Church. I say, then, that it comes with an extremely bad grace from the right hon. Gentleman, when he tries to fasten upon the Government an inconsistency which does not exist; while, looking back upon his career, we see in it an amount of inconsistency which can hardly be attributed to any other public man. There is only one other point to which the right hon. Gentleman referred the other night, and I will notice it in a few words. He stated that there was a gross inconsistency in the conduct of the Government; because, while resisting the attempt to overthrow the Irish Church, we propose to grant a charter to a Roman Catholic University. The right hon. Gentleman gave a description of that charter wholly contrary to the facts. He said that the Government proposed to place at the disposal of the Roman Catholic Bishops the whole education of the Roman Catholic laity in Ireland. Now, I contend that my proposition bears no resemblance whatever to the description thus given of it by the right hon. Gentleman. It is very easy to describe a thing as it is not ; to state a thing as it was never intended to be, and then proceed to demolish it. That is precisely what the right hon. Gentleman did. The proposal made by the Government was one to establish a University in which the lay element would not be only strong but preponderant ; in which the only ecclesiastical element was to be four prelates ; and I must say that I think the right hon. Gentleman paid a very bad compliment to the independence and intelligence of the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland if he thought that, because four Roman Catholic Bishops were placed upon a certain body, therefore the whole education of the Catholic laity was to be placed in the hands of the Catholic prelates. I repeat, therefore, that the description of the institution which we proposed to found, as given by the right hon. Gentleman, was an entire misrepresentation, and that nothing of the kind was intended under this charter. A great deal has been said to-night as to the power of Parliament to deal with the present question ; and in the eloquent speech of the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) I think a great deal of time was—I will not say wasted, because no time can be wasted in listening to anything which falls from him—but at all events, I think he expended a great deal of unnecessary force in proving that Parliament had the power of dealing with the Irish Church. Now that power, as I understand, has never been denied ; but we do say that the proposal now made is one greater, perhaps, than any that has ever been submitted to Parliament. When we remember that it is now proposed for the first time to leave a considerable portion of the United Kingdom without an Established Church ; that it is proposed, in addition, to confiscate property and revenues which for 300 years, at the very least, have been in the possession of this body ; when we remember that these revenues have been guaranteed to the Irish Church in a manner more solemn, I believe, than that in which property has ever been guaranteed to any other body corporate or any other private individual in this country ; when we see that this Establishment has been guaranteed by the Oath of the Sovereign, by Acts of Parliament spread over the whole course of the statute-book, by contracts made, and repeatedly made, with leaders of great political parties on great political emergencies ; remembering all this we say that a proposal to confiscate property and disestablish an institution guaranteed and sanctioned by all these securities is, perhaps, the most momentous step ever taken by the English Parliament. Without denying the right of Parliament to deal with the question, we say that it is a duty which, though not beyond its powers, will tax those powers to the very utmost. One word now as to the mode in which this proposal is to be carried out. The right hon. Gentleman certainly claims for a Committee of this House greater power, and wishes to impose on it larger duties, than ever before were entrusted to it. His first Resolution, as I have said, embodies a proposal which, in its fundamental principles, subverts the Constitution of the country. Now, if the Constitution of the country is to be subverted, perhaps a preliminary Resolution is as good a mode of effecting that object as any other. As to the second Resolution, however, though I am no lawyer, and do not feel competent to discuss it, I should be very glad to hear some Gentleman of the long robe get up and tell us how a Resolution of a Committee of this House can control and prevent the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown. As to the third Resolution, it is the first time that the Chairman of Committees has ever been invited to put a Motion for an Address to the Crown from the table ; and I think if the Resolutions were carried it would puzzle you, Sir, to know how to deal with it. These, however, are points of comparatively slight importance. But the right hon. Gentleman, besides the disestablishment of the Church, proposes at once to establish the voluntary principle in Ireland. Now, I maintain that the voluntary system does not exist in Ireland in any shape or form, and that the three Churches there—the Established, the Roman Catholic, and the Presbyterian—are to a great extent in receipt of endowments from the State. The Established Church is fully endowed. If the Government had not thought some alteration in respect of her endowments necessary, they would not have consented to an inquiry. The Presbyterian Church is also endowed to a considerable extent by monies voted by this House, and the Consolidated Fund bore a large portion, if not the whole, of the cost of the education of those who are destined for the priesthood in the Roman Catholic Church of Ireland. Now, I believe it was very much at the desire of the members both of the Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Churches that money was granted out of the Consolidated Fund and voted in this House for the purposes of both these Churches, and therefore it does not lie in the mouths of hon. Gentlemen, who desire now to advocate the voluntary system as the rule for Ireland, to try to weaken the principle of endowments. But I will go further, and say that the voluntary system, as applied to religious purposes, is most unsuited to the state of things in Ireland. I am sure no hon. Gentleman will attempt to contradict me when I say that, of all Christian people on the face of the globe, the people of Ireland are the most religious, and that there are none among whom religious feeling and religious observances enter more deeply into the habits of their daily life. There is no coldness or want of zeal among them. It is always stated by the advocates of the voluntary system that there is nothing which so much promotes religious zeal, but the voluntary system is not likely to be wanted in Ireland on that account. On the contrary, I believe that any system which would have the effect of bringing before the minds of the Irish people peculiarities of doctrinal teaching and controversy would not have a good effect upon the peace of the country; and if you establish the voluntary system in Ireland, so far from promoting the interests of true religion you will do nothing but increase religious rancour and strife, and make doctrinal differences a greater subject of controversy than they have been hitherto. Sir, we want nothing in Ireland which will increase the violence of controversy. What we want is a system, both in religion and Government, that will soften those asperities and heal those animosities which have so long prevailed. I believe that there is nothing which would so much tend to intensify all the prejudices which exist and increase all the animosities which we deplore as the establishment of a complete voluntary system. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) the other night quoted a very high authority on this subject, and I would advise hon. Gentlemen who doubt the truth of my remarks to turn to one of the ablest books which has been written on the Irish Church—namely, the work of Sir George Lewis—and he will find there the same opinion put forward in language far more powerful and eloquent than I could command. I do not remember his exact words, but they come to this—that the tendency of the voluntary system is to reflect on the clergy the prejudices and antipathies of the most violent of their congregation; that in every country where it has been tried it has had this effect, that it has produced in the Protestant fanaticism, in the Catholic superstition, and intolerance in both. And the same opinions have been most ably advanced by Dean Stanley in a work published not long ago. I would remind the House that this voluntary principle, which it is contemplated to extend to Ireland, is sanctioned by no experience or authority whatsoever. It does not exist at this moment to any extent in any country in Europe. It is quite true that it does exist to some extent in America, and that, no doubt, will be quoted as a precedent against me. But I would remind the House that the voluntary system there was coincident and coexistent with republican institutions; it grew up with them, and became part and parcel of them. But because it has succeeded in America, that is no reason why it is likely to succeed here. I would ask Roman Catholic Gentlemen whether the voluntary system, as far as regards the payment of their parochial clergy, has been altogether satisfactory or successful? I should be sorry to give any opinion of my own on this point; but I have often spoken to Roman Catholic gentlemen of high authority, and they have constantly admitted that the voluntary system in one respect has not worked well. The fact is that the parochial clergy in Ireland are entirely drawn from one particular class of people. Now, I should be very sorry to say that a clergy taken from the lower ranks of the people are not as useful, as devoted, and as pious as those drawn from a higher rank; but this I do say, I should think it a very great misfortune if the clergy of my own Church were to come from one class, and one class alone, and if there were not to be found in its ranks representatives of all classes. In Ireland the clergy are recruited principally from the sons of small farmers, small merchants, and traders in towns; and if the son of a Roman Catholic gentleman takes orders he is almost always to be found in the ranks of the regular clergy. Now, that which is admitted to be an evil by almost all Roman Catholics is, I believe, to be attributed to the voluntary system; and if you had a system of endowments you would find men sprung from a higher class in the ranks of the parochial and secular clergy. But when Roman Catholic Gentlemen and those who profess to speak for them stand up in this House and profess themselves, in eloquent and almost violent terms, strong advocates of the voluntary principle, I confess I listen to them with astonishment, because I cannot conceive how anyone who has made himself acquainted with the history of the Roman Catholic Church can imagine for a moment that the voluntary principle forms any part of the fundamental system upon which that Church has been established. Sir, I would remind the House that the Roman Catholic Church is a Church of costly rite and gorgeous ceremonial; a Church whose votaries and disciples have thought it their duty to give to their religious worship everything that wealth could bestow or art devise. A Church of gorgeous and stately ceremonial can never be a purely voluntary Church, and I believe that the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is in a totally exceptional position. I believe that the Roman Catholic Church has been a Church especially of endowments. What has been the course of this Church in Ireland with regard to this particular question of endowments? Everybody knows that, at this moment, that Church is acquiring property with a rapidity I believe unexampled in her history, and perhaps in the history of the world. We Protestants cannot but admire the piety and devotion which, in many instances, have thus been shown, but I would warn Roman Catholic Gentlemen and those who profess to speak the sentiments of their Church, that they are running some danger in advocating principles of disestablishment and confiscation as they do now. I look forward to the day when the Irish Roman Catholic Church, if she goes on amassing property for the next 100 as she has done in the last fifty years, will be endowed and gifted with great wealth; and if that takes place is it not probable that those great riches and endowments may at some not distant time attract the jealousy of a large and powerful party in this country, whose assistance you are now asking for the disendowment of the Irish Protestant Church, and who have always been the first to advocate and uphold the confiscation of Church property? I cannot conceive anything more probable than that, at a time not very remote, not only the possessions of the English Church may prove very attractive grounds for putting in practice the principles of that party, but that they will also be applied to the possessions of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. We shall then hear precisely the same arguments—that these endowments are dangerous to the State; that they are in the hands of men who do not use them for the good of the people; and, therefore, that Parliament has a right to step in and do what is called an act of justice in order to make a better disposition of their funds. Sir, I am not ashamed in this House to advocate the principle of religious endowments. In that respect I follow in the footsteps of Mr. Pitt, Lord Plunket, Mr. Grattan, Earl Grey, Sir Robert Peel, and Earl Russell. Every one of these advocated the principle of religious endowments in Ireland, as specially required by the circumstances of that country. Every one of them constantly opposed the extension of the voluntary system to Ireland. That was admitted in the Appropriation Clause and in every great scheme ever brought under the attention of this House. Having thus stated my opinion as to the utter unsuitableness of the voluntary system to Ireland, I would ask your attention to the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman has made. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman in his speech stated he did not think himself bound to submit to Parliament any detailed plan by which his proposals should be carried out; but he did to a certain extent shadow forth what, in his opinion, that plan should be. There was one particular, however—an essential one—on which he gave us no information. He did not state what would be the proximate amount of the surplus on which he calculated. Now, it always struck me that in proposing and agitating this great scheme of confiscation those who advocated it are bound in the first instance to show the disposition they intend to make of the enormous property it involves. This has been valued at a sum ranging from £10,000,000 to £14,000,000; and they are bound to make a disposition of it more useful and likely to do more good than the present arrangement. The right hon. Gentleman has not vouchsafed to us his opinion on that subject; but we have had various opinions put forward. According to some this surplus should go to education in Ireland. Now, if there is one thing more likely than another to raise bitter and violent contention in that country it would be the throwing down a large sum of money to be scrambled for under the head of education. The battle that would take place for this surplus to be devoted to education would in intensity and acerbity be fifty times greater than now exists in regard to the Church. There is no subject on which there is a greater difference of opinion, or on which that difference has been expressed with more acrimony, than that of public education. Then it has been suggested that the money should be devoted to the police of the country; but I apprehend that such a proposal would hardly be seriously entertained. The next proposal is to give it in aid of the poor rates, and that would relieve local taxation to a certain extent. Another proposal put forward by some of the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church is that these funds should be capitalized and given to the clergy of various denominations to be disposed of in what they call alms. I cannot conceive any proposal that would be more fatal to everything we desire to esteem or preserve in Ireland than such a proposal. Then another proposal was made, I think, by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) that this large sum should be disposed of in the improvement of land; and this seemed to meet the approval of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill)—that a large sum should be laid out in the purchase of estates, to be afterwards cut up into farms—that they should be improved, and the loss should be borne by funds to be derived from the revenues of the Established Church. The Government was to enter into a large speculative scheme connected with the land, and it was admitted at the outset that it would prove very unproductive. These were the various schemes which have been broached; and I believe that every one of them would create more heart-burning and ill-will than the existence of the Established Church is alleged to have produced. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone), though rather hazily shadowed forth, was still sufficiently precise to enable us to understand its meaning, and it really is nothing more nor less than a great scheme of confiscation. The effect of the plan would be to leave two-thirds or three-fifths of the property to the Irish Church. That would not be less than £8,000,000. By whom was this great sum to be disposed of? Under whose care was it to be placed? Was it to be allocated to the parishes or put into the hands of commissioners? Or was it to be distributed among the clergy of the Church? If the right hon. Gentleman leaves £8,000,000 in the hands of the clergy, what becomes of his principle of equality? There is another question on which great anxiety must be felt by those who wish to know how

this scheme of confiscation is to be carried out. If instantaneous in its operation, the compensation to living interests must swallow up the great portion of the revenues. If you are to allow existing interests to die out and to effect changes on the death of those who now hold office, by then sequestering the property of the Church, you will get into almost greater difficulty. You profess to begin the voluntary principle in Ireland, and allow the members of the Protestant Church to make such arrangements as they may see fit for the celebration of worship; but, at the same time, you allow revenues to go to incumbents during their life-time, and so you render impossible any voluntary arrangement, because that necessitates a large consolidation of parishes. It would be perfectly impossible, according to the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman, that this voluntary arrangement could be carried out; for it would be impossible in the many districts where the number of Protestants is small, to secure clergymen of the character and education they desire. Therefore, it appears to me that, in this respect, the right hon. Gentleman's plan is not only cruel, but most ill-advised, and would prevent the coming on of that voluntary system of which he is the advocate. The right hon. Gentleman's scheme also contemplates a large system of compensation; and experience has taught the House to look with suspicion upon these great systems of compensation. I quite admit that if this scheme is carried you must propose compensation, otherwise you would do the grossest injustice. Let me remind the House what this compensation will amount to. There are about 450 curates, most of them young men, who ought to be compensated for the loss of their future prospects. The lay advowsons are nearly one-sixth of the whole number of livings in the Church, and include some of the richest; and these would swell the compensation to an enormous sum. On what principle the right hon. Gentleman can reconcile compensating the lay proprietors of livings with forgetting the interests of the Church at large, I cannot understand. If the Church of Ireland is to be got rid of, on every principle of justice you are bound to get rid of it at once. If you do not make the members of the Church at once enter into voluntary arrangements, you will commit the greatest possible injustice. As a member of that Church, I say, if you are determined to destroy it, it would be much better to execute it at once than to put it to death by a lingering process. I have never used the "garrison" argument, and have never treated the Church as a garrison in the midst of the people. On the contrary, I believe that it is a position it has never assumed; it is one it never ought to assume; but the overthrow of the Church will in many districts eradicate everything in the shape of Protestantism. No doubt that result would recommend itself to many hon. Members, and to many people in Ireland; but who are the Protestant population? They are few, but they belong to a peculiar class—one or two squires and a few large farmers in each district. These men are not able out of their own means to establish the voluntary system, and the effect will be that these men will withdraw themselves from the country, and will abandon their estates. We have heard much of the evils of absenteeism; but the immediate effect of disendowment and disestablishment will be to create such an amount of absenteeism as never has been seen before. Landowners will not sell their estates, because they will not for many years sell at their nominal value, which will be further depreciated by this change; but they will leave them to be managed by agents. They have families to bring up, and they have settled in those districts on the faith that Parliament would maintain the Church that has been established so long; and those who know them best say that they would almost immediately withdraw from their estates. This class above all others is on terms of amity and good-will with the Roman Catholic population. The most ardent Catholic will not say that these men have in any way made themselves offensive to the mass of the population. On the contrary, their influence has been salutary and good, and they have done more than any other class to reconcile the people to British rule. The removal of this class under the proposed arrangements must inevitably result in serious evil. The other day a dinner was given to the right hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand), in testimony to a course of conduct in this House which, I am sure, everyone on this side of the House highly appreciates, and on that occasion the hon. Member spoke about the Irish Church. I quote it as a specimen of the extraordinary misconceptions which prevail in this country on this subject. Describing the Irish Church, he said—

body of the people; it is mainly supported by the labour of the many, who are poor, for the benefit of the few who are rich. It has no parallel, so far as I know, in the history of the world."

I challenge the hon. Member to show that the labour of a single poor man in Ireland is charged a single halfpenny for the support of the Irish Church. The property of the Church is not the property of the clergy or of the laity, but of the Church at large. It is derived entirely from the estates of the rich, and if the Irish Church were taken away to-morrow not a single tenant in Ireland would have his land cheaper, and not a single labourer would be called upon to pay a penny less than he does now. The hon. Member also said the Irish Church has no parallel in the history of the world. I suppose he means it has no parallel because it is not the Church of the majority; but in Wales a precisely similar state of things prevails. The hon. Member's third statement is that until this question has been settled, disaffection will continue to exist in Ireland, and the country will remain in a chronic state of insurrection. [Mr. MONSELL: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Member for the county of Limerick cheers that statement. No one knows the present state of the country better than I do, and I maintain that Ireland is not in a state of chronic insurrection. Insurrection has been tried, and has utterly failed. There is no sympathy with actual insurrection. I believe it will be impossible to prove that that amount of disaffection and discontent which I admit does exist to a great extent among certain classes of people can be traced to the existence of the Irish Church. The opinion that it can has been challenged over and over again in the course of this debate, and no one has taken up that challenge. No one has attempted to prove that Fenianism and disaffection have any connection with the Irish Church, although there have been many repetitions of the assertion that such is the case. No one has attempted to connect the Irish Church with Fenianism; for the latter comes from America. If you take the speeches of the Fenians you find that strong feelings of nationality pervade them all; the past wrongs of Ireland and the neglect of the Government are eloquently and forcibly described; Republican sentiments and principles are put forward; hatred to England is expressed in every shape and form, and even war with England is enforced as a duty. But it is nowhere declared that the demolition of the Irish Church is one of their objects, or that its existence was one of their grievances. I would merely refer to a remarkable document which was issued by the Roman Catholic clergy of the county of Meath, and in which it is declared that the Church question is not so important as the land question—that the Irish Church might be useful for a party manoeuvre, or for displacing a Government, but that as for thinking that the Irish Church was one of the standing grievances of Ireland, it was an entire mistake. It has been said during this debate that the existence of the Established Church is a standing grievance to the Roman Catholics, inasmuch as it brings to the recollection of the Irish the times of the penal laws, and when oppression reigned from one end of the country to the other. But let us see what Mr. Mitchell says—

“But this, also, is all past and over. The very penal laws, last relics of that bloody business, are with the days before the Flood. And, though it be true that the mode of planting this Established Church of Ireland—first enthroning a whole hierarchy of Archbishops and Bishops and then importing clergy for the Bishops, and parishioners for the clergy—was of all recorded apostolic missions the most preposterous; though the rapacity of those missionaries was too exorbitant and their methods of conversion too sanguinary; yet now, among the national institutions, among the existing forces that make up what we call an Irish nation, the Church, so far as it is a spiritual teacher, must positively be reckoned. Its altars, for generations, have been served by a devoted body of clergy; its sanctuaries thronged by our countrymen; its prelates, the successors of those very Queen's Bishops, have been among the most learned and pious ornaments of the Christian Church. Their stories are twined with our history, their dust is Irish earth, and their memories are Ireland's for ever. In the little church of Dromore, hard by the murmuring Lagan, lie buried the bones of Jeremy Taylor; would Ireland be richer without that grave? In any gallery of illustrious Irishmen, Usher and Swift shall not be forgotten; Derry and Cloyne will not soon let the name of Berkeley die; and the lonely tower of Clough Oughter is hardly more interesting to an Irishman as the place where Owen Roe breathed his last sigh than by the imprisonment within its walls of the mild and excellent Bishop of Kilmore. Sit mea anima cum Bedello! When Irishmen consent to let the past become indeed history, not party politics, and begin to learn from it the lessons of mutual respect and tolerance, instead of endless bitterness and enmity, then, at last, this distracted land shall see the dawn of hope and peace, and begin to renew her youth and rear her head among the proudest of the nations.”

Now, Sir, we are told this proposal is made in the interests of peace. The whole country sighs—members of all classes and of all creeds—for nothing so much as

peace; and I agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department that there is no sacrifice of opinion that he, or I, or any Member of the Government would not be prepared to make, short of an absolute abnegation of principle, to secure even partially a result so much desired. But we do not believe that these Resolutions are calculated to carry peace to Ireland. I believe that the struggle which the right hon. Gentleman has initiated in renouncing all his former opinions will be both fierce and long. I believe that no one will benefit by it but the bitterest enemies of Ireland; and that its effect will be to divide the country into two hostile camps. It will tend rather to the aggravation of the animosities, ill-feeling, and religious rancour which are already too rife, than to the promotion of contentment and peace. The right hon. Gentleman says that the hour has arrived, and that he is only obeying the call of duty. I can only say that it is most unfortunate that that call of duty should have sounded at the precise moment when of all others, for the first time during thirty-five years, it is physically impossible that any advance can be made in dealing with the question. There has been no moment, perhaps, in our Parliamentary history when, it was so entirely impossible to deal with the Irish Church. There is already so much business before the House, business that must be transacted, if at the early part of next year you wish to appeal to the new constituencies, that there is scarcely sufficient time left for us to get through it. Nor can I believe that this Parliament, which is so soon to cease to exist, is a body that can satisfactorily deal with this question. I do not deny that it possesses the right; but I maintain that the time is most inopportune, and it will be impossible for a Parliament with so much already to do to deal with a question of this sort with any probability of success. A question of such magnitude cannot be settled without an appeal to the people, and your expression of opinion will in no way be binding on the next Parliament. I oppose this Motion because I believe it to be premature, because I think it will lead to much strife, and because I know that you have not the information necessary for the discussion of a subject which, in my opinion, could not in any case be satisfactorily settled during the present Session. I feel it my duty, therefore, in common with my Colleagues, to give my opposition to Resolutions which I cannot but regard as factious and mischievous.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT said, he did not think that the proposals of the Government were at all adequate to meet the serious state of things that existed. The great evil in Ireland was the religious ascendancy of a small minority over the rest of the nation. The only cure was the establishment of religious equality. When it was stated that the existence of the Irish Church was not regarded by the Roman Catholic population as a grievance, and when it was sought to prove this assertion by showing that there was not much complaint made in Ireland against the Establishment, it should be remembered that the Irish people had not forgotten what took place thirty years ago, when they attempted to agitate the question. The fact was, that the Irish people believed that if they agitated they would be punished; and though they also knew that if they remained quiet their attitude would be construed into indifference, they preferred the latter alternative to the former. The Church Establishment in Ireland violated the very principle of an Establishment, for it had nothing in common with the great body of the people, who refused to receive its teaching. It had not answered the purpose for which it was intended. It had not converted the Irish people to the religion which it taught; but it had the effect of alienating their minds from the State, and from the belief which was supported by the aid of the State. In fact, while it had not made them Protestants, it had made them bad citizens. The noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) had said that they must beware lest they alienated an influential class, bound to this country by a sacred tie; but he should like to know what peculiar tie bound that class more than any other to this country? It appeared to him that if the Government evinced a disposition to do justice to all parties, they would hear few complaints from Ireland. Lord Cornwallis, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at the time of the passing of the Act of Union, had left on record his opinion of the party which the noble Earl had said had such peculiar claims on the country. Lord Cornwallis's opinion was, that if the Minister of the Crown mistook that violent and prejudiced party for the people, and threw himself into their hands, no advantage would be derived from the Union. Justice must be done to all, and no one had a right to complain when equality alone was asked for. In the Quarterly Review of January there appeared an article upon Ireland, one passage in which made a great impression upon him. The writer observed that Ireland was the problem of problems to the English statesman. In its future, the future of our Empire, of our race, of our civilization was wrapped up; and it was to be feared we did not sufficiently estimate the enormous interval between our relations to Ireland and those towards the dearest and most favoured dependency of the British Crown. What Parliament had refused to Ireland it had fully granted to Canada. The Irish Church was an institution for the preservation of which the penal laws had been enacted, and it was consequently associated in the eyes of the people with oppression: and as long as that Church remained it was impossible for them to turn their backs on the past—which they all desired to forget—or look with hope to the future. The postponement of Parliamentary Reform for Ireland would be a misfortune; but to postpone dealing with the question of the Irish Church would be a calamity; for such a course would convince the Irish people of the insincerity of British statesmen and of the indisposition of that House to do them justice. It would strengthen the hands of the enemies of England, add to the hopes of those whose eyes were turned towards the West, and increase ten-fold the difficulties of those who had some influence with the people, and who endeavoured to keep them within the lines of the Constitution, and to persuade them to look to that House for the redress of grievances. It was necessary that the House should act in this matter now; for unless something was done in the present Session the people of Ireland would not be convinced of the determination of the House to do them justice. It had been said that there were Leaders in that House “who would not lead, and followers who would not follow;” but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had shown himself to be a Leader who would lead, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman would find the great party on the Opposition side of the House to be followers who would follow. But if that were not so, the right hon. Gentleman at any rate, would in the next Parliament, elected by the new constituencies, be supported by a large majority, who would triumphantly carry this question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church to a successful issue.

SIR CHARLES LANYON said, he was unable to express to the House with what indignation the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had been received by his constituents, and in the North of Ireland generally. Belfast had long been remarkable for its loyalty and its endeavours to put down sedition. Could it be that the House would recompense that attachment to the Throne by the destruction of that which those loyal people valued so highly? Viewing the question without the violent political prejudices of some persons, he sincerely believed it was merely a sentimental grievance. The Resolutions would substitute for it a substantial grievance. The destruction of the Protestant Church in Ireland was merely another step gained in the ladder of Roman Catholic ascendancy, and would be followed by other agitations. In 1826 Dr. Doyle said that, if Roman Catholic Emancipation were conceded, Ireland would become contented and happy; but what had been the history of the country ever since? What did the famous Limerick Declaration say? He could not refrain from reading one or two extracts—

“A land tenure will accomplish something; removal of the Protestant ascendancy, by placing the Protestant Church in the same position before the State as the Catholic Church, will accomplish much; equality in education, and the removal of the anomaly of giving a freedom of education on the condition of people giving up freedom, will do its share, and we will hail any and all of them with thankfulness; but we feel bound to say that, when all of them have been granted, safety from foreign danger, perfect development of home resources, and we repeat, above all, the heart of this country will require nationality.”

The explanation of that nationality was given in a concluding paragraph, as follows:—

“The very nature of the remedies required to make Ireland rich and contented renders it impossible for a British Parliament to adopt and apply them; and, besides that, home aspirations and the plea for Irish intervention from abroad can never be met unless by restoring Ireland her nationality, re-establishing the Sovereign and the Lords and Commons of Ireland.”

No concessions, he maintained, would satisfy Ireland except the granting of this nationality. In 1826 the Roman Catholic hierarchy declared on their oaths that they would not exercise any privilege to which they were or might become entitled to weaken or disturb the Protestant religion and Government established in Ireland; but now their Bishops demanded the disendowment of the Established Church of that country as an indispensable condition of “social peace and stability.” Could any one doubt that the result of passing the Resolutions now before the House must be the repeal of the Union between England and Ireland? Under such circumstances, was it well to destroy the “garrison” that had been so often referred to, and which had hitherto succeeded against all assaults in maintaining inviolate that Union between the two countries, on which their prosperity depended. Earl Russell said it would be politically injurious to destroy the Established Church, because it would alienate from England many of the most loyal men, who were fondly attached to that institution. It was often urged that the feelings of the majority should regulate the action of that House, but it should be remembered that a very large majority of Protestants existed in the North of Ireland. In the counties of Antrim, Armagh, Down, Tyrone, Fermanagh, and Derry alone, which formed the principal portion of Ulster, there were 1,400,000 inhabitants, of whom 825,000 were Protestants and 575,000 Roman Catholics; so that in those six counties the former were 45 per cent in excess of the latter. He admitted that many of these Protestants were Presbyterians; but they sympathized with the Episcopalians, and were as much interested as they were in the present Resolutions. Having quoted the opinion of the late Mr. Justice Shee, a Roman Catholic, in support of the rights and position of the Established Church, the hon. Gentleman next cited the authority of Lord Plunket, the greatest Whig lawyer that Ireland ever produced, and the able advocate of the Emancipation Act. Lord Plunket said—

“If the Protestant Establishment of Ireland were destroyed, the very foundations of public security would be shaken, the connections between England and Ireland dissolved, and the annihilation of private property must follow the ruin of the property of the Church. The two countries must be separated before the Establishment can be abandoned.”

Again he said—

“I consider the safety of the State as essentially interwoven with the integrity of the Establishment. The Established religion is the child of freedom. Our civil and religious liberties would each of them lose much of their security if they were not so deeply indented each with the other. The Church need not be apprehensive. It is a plant, the growth of 300 years; it has struck its roots into the centre of the State, and nothing short of a political earthquake can overturn it. While the State is safe, it must be so. The Protestant religion in Ireland was perpetually incorporated at the Union. It forms a part of the fundamental, unalterable law of the Empire. The possessions of the Protestant clergy are their absolute property, secured to them as sacredly as the private possessions of any individual are secured to him. To subvert the Protestant Establishment is to subvert the State. I will maintain that the property of the Church is as sacred as any other."

The hon. Member for Tipperary (Captain White) the other night attributed to the ascendancy of the Irish Church the riots which he said periodically made the streets of Belfast flow with Irish blood; but that was a great exaggeration, and the true cause of those disturbances was the partial administration of the law by Liberal Governments. Let him contrast the expense incurred in maintaining the peace in two counties of nearly equal population, the one situated in the North, the other in the South of Ireland. He would refer to the county of Down with 237,000 inhabitants, and the county of Tipperary, with 249,000. In the first-named county there were 262 constabulary, who were maintained at an annual charge of £15,000, whereas in Tipperary the number of constabulary was 1,009, and the sum required to support them was £50,000 per annum. He solemnly trusted that, for the honour of the country, no such injustice would be inflicted upon the Protestants as was proposed in the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, that he did not regard this question as one of party, and no party consideration would influence his vote. It was an undoubted fact that the Irish Church was felt in Ireland as a grievance; and if he did not believe that Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions met that grievance or thought that they were framed to attain personal objects, he would not vote for them. An analogy had been attempted to be drawn between the Irish Established Church and the Established Church in Wales, but, speaking from his own experience, he could inform the House that no such analogy existed, because in his part of the kingdom the Nonconformists supported their own churches only, and those who belonged to the Church of England were content to worship in chapels which they built themselves. The Nonconformists were very numerous in Wales, but the Church of England was respected by the great majority of the people of that country; moreover, the Established Church and the Dissenters were connected by the bond of a common reformed Faith. With respect to the observations of hon. Gentlemen that the existence of the Irish Church was a sentimental grievance, he reminded the House that nothing was stronger than a sentiment of nationality; and they had recently seen in foreign countries peoples who had been ground down for centuries, animated by a spirit of nationality, rise and assert the independence of their country. As a Welshman, he felt he owed a debt to the people of Ireland. It was from Milford Haven in Pembrokeshire—a county with which he was specially connected by property and ancestry—that Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, started upon the conquest of Ireland. The badge of conquest would, he hoped, to-night be effaced. He would say to the people of Ireland "Let there be no strife between you and us, for we be brethren." In his opinion, the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a concession which would be gratefully received in Ireland; and on that ground he should vote with the right hon. Gentleman.

VISCOUNT HAMILTON said, that with a few words by way of explanation, he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The time was inopportune for any such a measure as was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). A Commission of Inquiry was at present sitting upon the subject of the Irish Church. The Report of that Commission was anxiously looked forward to, and would shortly be before the House; and to such modifications and improvements as were suggested by the Commissioners he would be prepared to give his most earnest consideration. He would, however, listen to no suggestion for the destruction of one of our most venerable institutions. Whether he looked at the time or the circumstances, the matter or the form, the spirit or intention of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, he should give them his inflexible opposition. The question was one of universal importance to Ireland; but connected, as he was, by property, residence, and feeling with the North of Ireland, he might be excused if he confined his observations to the province of Ulster. He asserted that the English Church in Ireland was a blessing to the community at large, and an advantage, instead of an injury, to the Roman Catholics. That this was their opinion was proved by the cordiality and good-will which the warm-hearted peasantry of that country—even the poorest man in the land—showed to the clergy of the Protestant Church. It had been argued that Protestantism was a failure in Ireland; but facts proved the very reverse. Hon. Members might remember in the last chapter of Mr. Froude's History of England a picture of the state of Ulster at the period to which his history referred—the savage manners and barbarous condition of the people, the bloody feuds of rival chieftains, and the general insecurity of life and property. The regeneration which had taken place had been the result of the beneficent influence of Protestantism. It was untruly said that England instituted one set of laws for herself and another for Ireland. The first Parliament summoned by James of Scotland consisted of 220 members, 100 of whom were Roman Catholic Gentlemen. How did the Church of Ulster obtain the bulk of the property which formed its glebes and estates? By the same grants and title-deeds by which the nobility and gentry of Ireland obtained their property. The latter would consider this assault on the rights of the Church as a direct attack upon their own property and rights. All the conditions imposed by the Commissioners for the plantation of Ulster had been fulfilled. Houses had been built, the land had been cultivated, and the Gospel had been preached. The country did not then possess more than fifty civilians; it supported at the present moment more than 200,000 industrious people. By what right or law did the right hon. Gentleman propose to seize the property of the Church? For himself, he would make common cause with the people and gentry of the North of Ireland in resisting so revolutionary a proposal. At the same time he was ready to give to the Roman Catholic clergy the same advantages in regard to glebes which the Protestant clergy possessed. The right hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand) was reported to have said, on a recent occasion elsewhere, that the Church of Ireland was the Church of an insignificant minority. If the right hon. Gentleman had read the history of Ireland, he would have found that this insignificant minority included men who had ruled in the Councils of the State, who had led armies to battle, and turned battles into victories. A great deal had been said about the Act of Union, and he wished to add something about the Act of Settlement. In the great conflict in which Strafford was concerned, the Roman Catholics combined with the Puritans for the purpose of impeaching Strafford. The Puritans and the Roman Catholics afterwards quarrelled, and Cromwell, who overthrew the State and the Church, crushed the Roman Catholics to the earth. Their nobility were turned out of Parliament, were banished, and became wanderers over the face of the earth. The Protestants passed the Act of Settlement, and these expatriated Roman Catholic noblemen were restored to their properties by the first Cavalier of the day, and the staunchest Protestant in the land—the Duke of Ormond. And while the properties of individuals were restored, the property of the Church was also replaced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire now proposed to do what no revolutionist had yet succeeded in doing—to repeal the Act of Union, to break down the Act of Settlement, and to uproot the plantation of Ulster. That plantation could not be charged with failure. The towns there had never lost their population, though in other parts of the country the population, unhappily, had fallen off. And yet it was from these successful districts that the right hon. Gentleman wished to take away a cherished institution. Fenianism had existed in Ireland for the last four years; but it found no congenial soil in Ulster. The loyalty and quietude of the population there enabled the Government to take away both troops and police, and send them South to the disaffected districts. And what had been their reward? Why, the right hon. Gentleman, basing his proposals upon the existence of this very Fenianism, proposed to strike down the Church to which those loyal men were so deeply attached. Our policy for Ireland should be, not to destroy, but to build up. We should not inflame and enrage the minds of one section of the community against another. He trusted that the commotion that had been excited would soon cease; that one party would vie with another for their country's good; that rich absentees would return to the land which nourished them; and that we should hear no more of absentee landlords. He hoped that the coming auspicious visit would be the commencement of a new era, and that we might soon find Ireland united and happy, and forming as contented a people as could be found in any portion of Her Majesty's dominions.

MR. CARDWELL: At a much earlier period of this debate, Sir, I should have attempted to catch your eye, and, with the permission of the House, to have put forward some arguments on this great and most important subject. I was prevented, however, by one of those accidents to which we are all liable, and which makes it impossible now that I can long trespass on the attention of the House. But, having had the privilege of taking some part in the government and administration of the affairs of Ireland, I feel that I should be wanting in what a sense of duty prescribes to me if I were not to express briefly the opinions which I entertain upon this question. I am anxious, also, with the permission of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, to address to him a few observations. In the recent speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India, he called upon us very emphatically to join in putting a clear and intelligible issue before the body of our countrymen who will have the decision of this question in their hands at the hustings; I am most desirous to close with that proposal of my right hon. Friend. But if the First Lord of the Treasury had been present when the powerful speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) was delivered, he would have heard in the most perspicuous form from him, what, indeed, he could not have failed to gather from some speeches upon his own side of the House as well as ours, that there is something wanting in this debate, in order that the new constituency—to whom, we are told this question is to be relegated—may have before them a clear and decisive issue upon which they can pronounce. We had the pleasure, in this debate, of hearing my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and likewise—to me it was a great pleasure—of hearing from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, arguments and sentiments which, though I differ from his conclusions, and dissent from his arguments, I yet rejoiced to hear expressed with all the eloquence which sincere conviction imparts, in language of clearness, of spirit, and of power. We have also heard a speech from my noble Friend who is principally responsible for the government of Ireland, to which we listened with the respect and attention that belong to his high character, and to the office which he holds. Well, have we gathered from these three voices any clear and intelligible issue? From my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs we understood that the policy of the Government consisted in the re-distribution of the funds of the Established Church of Ireland, not within the circle of the Established Church, but beyond and outside of it. We understood from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in that clear and emphatic language which he possesses, that he, at least, would not consent to anything but re-distribution within the circle of the Established Church; while, from the noble Earl, who is chiefly responsible for the Irish Government, we understood that the Government have a policy which consists in “levelling upwards.” The precise meaning of that phrase I do not understand; but I presume it means the preservation to the Church of all its existing property, and the application to other sources—and those, I presume, the usual sources—for the funds out of which other endowments are to be provided. Now, these three statements are irreconcilable with each other; and I venture to place them before the right hon. Gentleman, in order that before the debate closes, we may have the advantage of a statement from the highest authority as to what is the real policy and view of the Government. In an earlier debate, which we had upon this subject, the right hon. Gentleman, although he did not adhere to the language of his memorable speech in 1844, yet declared that he adhered to the general sentiments which that speech expressed. I was glad to hear that expression; for that speech contains sentiments in which we cordially concur, and shall be delighted, if the right hon. Gentleman now adheres to them, to give him all the support and assistance in our power. But that speech appears to me to be directly at variance with the recent letter addressed by the right hon. Gentleman to the noble Earl, who is the Chairman of the Constitutional Association, and we, therefore, think we have a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman to favour us, in the remarks he is about to make, with a clear and intelligible statement as to what really are the intentions of the Government. If the House will allow me, I will very briefly indicate the view which I am desirous of giving effect to. I think that no one can take any part in the administration of affairs in Ireland, if he has before been a stranger to that country, without feeling that the moment he crosses the Channel, he is placed in circumstances for which all his acquaintance with England, and it may be with Scotland, leaves entirely unprepared. Whether his duty be the conduct of public affairs, or whether he mixes in private society, there is the broadest contrast between what he left behind him and what he finds in Ireland. The Rhone and the Arve are not more marked in their channel by the blue waters of the one, and the snow-coloured waters of the other, than are the Roman Catholic and Protestant populations of Ireland. Do what you will you cannot fuse them; and if you will ask yourselves what is the cause of this difference, you immediately perceive that to which you are perfect strangers in this country — an uneasy sense of superiority before the law on the one side, and an equally uneasy sense of inferiority on the other. Does this arise from the possession of property? You have Catholic landlords and Protestant landlords, Catholic tenants and Protestant tenants, Catholic merchants and Protestant merchants. The difference, then, does not arise from any division in the ordinary pursuits of life. Does it arise from any determination on the part of the Government to show favour to the one and withhold it from the other? No; I fully agree with my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Mayo) that the present Lord Lieutenant is a popular Lord Lieutenant, and that his administration is free from partiality. I do not charge on gentlemen opposite any more than I should accept such a charge with regard to us, that favour is shown to the Protestants at the expense of the Catholics. What, then, is the cause? Trace it back to its origin, and you will find that the Established Church of Ireland is at once the symbol and cause of the division. It was established as a mark of superiority by Henry VIII. Protestant historians record that, at that time, it was regarded by the higher classes as a mark of the invaders' superiority, while by the lower classes it was regarded as anti-national. Protestantism, in defiance of one of its first and most important principles, offered its ministrations to the people in a language they could not understand. Then, in the time of Elizabeth, the Church was established by Parliament in which the Catholic Peers, who were in the majority in the Upper Chamber, were overcome by Protestant bishops; while in the Lower House we had representatives summoned for ten counties only. The rest, which made up the number seventy-six, being citizens and burgesses of those towns in which the

Royal authority was predominant. That being its origin, what has been its course and history? It has had able and eminent men; and of late years, I freely admit, for I have the honour of an acquaintance with many of them, nothing could exceed the virtue and excellence of their character. But whether in the evil time, or whether in the time when a more active spirit has prevailed among the clergy, its history is one and the same—it remains the Church of the few for whom it was established, and the many who were without its pale at the commencement are without it still. Is this just, or politic, or necessary? Semi-persecution cannot be wise; real persecution, however odious and detestable, may accomplish its object. It has rooted out Protestantism from Spain and other countries, and by that course you might succeed. But is it reasonable to suppose that you can admit Roman Catholics to the highest offices of the State, that you can conduct the Government through Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, that Roman Catholic Judges and jurymen may administer the law, and yet that in the most important respect of life you can refuse them the privilege of equality? Why, the thing is impossible. It has been eloquently asked whether we should submit to it, or whether any of our colonies would do so? Now, we have a case in point in our most important colony. There was a Church Establishment in Canada, and when you gave Canada a free Government you endeavoured to retain that Establishment. Did you succeed? No; after a very few years you were compelled to make over to Canada the power of dealing as they pleased with the provision for their clergy. Then we hear arguments about the Act of Union. Now, what is that but to tell Ireland how much better it would be if she were a colony; for then the government of the Church would be made over to her? Who can doubt that an Irish Parliament elected by such a constituency as you have given to Canada and Australia would soon put an end to this institution? Are you prepared to tell Ireland that by virtue of the Act of Union, and that alone, this institution is maintained? Would Scotland endure it? Remember the eloquent language in which Lord Macaulay describes the effect of the Union with Scotland. He tells you that if you had carried into Scotland the principle you adopted in Ireland, the Union, instead of being a source of strength, would have been a source of weakness, and that the power which Scotland possessed would have been not an addition to the power of England, but a deduction from it; in which case England would not have held her present high place in the estimation of the world. He closes with these memorable words,—“One such Church” (as the Irish) “is enough for the energies of any Empire.” I think it was not right to raise this question until the time had arrived when there was a possibility of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion, and I believe there is now that possibility. The noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland said there was never an occasion since the Reform Bill when there was so little prospect of bringing a question of this kind to a satisfactory conclusion. I venture to differ from him. We are told, if not that we are not competent to settle it, that at least we ought not to settle it, because the constituencies were not alive to it when we were elected. But what we are now debating is whether we shall have a clear and intelligible issue. Let us go into the Lobby on a clear issue, so that the constituencies may know what are the sentiments of each party. We think it is our duty not only to express our opinions in this Parliament; but also to take the steps necessary to secure to our successors a complete jurisdiction over the subject in the state in which we find it. We all agree that the final and permanent settlement of the question is to be referred to a new Parliament and the new constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government told us recently that he had spent half his life within the walls of the House of Commons, having entered this House in 1838. Many of us have had the same privilege and honour, and it is no small honour, for no other Legislative Assembly upon record has inscribed on its roll so many great measures as those which we have passed during the last thirty years. The first of those measures was the abolition of slavery in every part of the dominions of the Crown, and I earnestly hope that the last will be a decisive step in the course of that legislation which will tell the Queen’s Irish subjects that, whether they be Catholic, Presbyterian, or members of the Anglican Church, they shall for the future be equal in the eye of their Sovereign and of the Law.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has moved that we should go into Committee of the Whole House upon the subject of the Irish Church, in order that he may propose Resolutions which he has placed upon the table. We have not at present to discuss those Resolutions, which would lead us into matters of great detail, of constitutional interest, and of legal difficulty, which might divert us from the general topic which now engages our attention. I apprehend that, so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, there is no mistake as to his general meaning; for, although he has not yet had an opportunity of moving his Resolutions, he has expressed the outline of the policy which he proposes that this House and the country should adopt. I apprehend that I am not in any way misrepresenting his meaning, or misinterpreting his expressions—a thing most foreign from my intention—when I say that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to terminate the connection between the State and the Church, so far as Ireland is concerned, which, in neological phrase, is styled disestablishment; and that he proposes a policy, which first partially, and in the end completely, would accomplish the disendowment of the Church in Ireland. I believe I have correctly expressed what the right hon. Gentleman has stated—or rather intimated—and what, if opportunity offered, he would in more detail bring under our consideration. Well, Sir, this question having been brought before the House and the country somewhat suddenly, as all will admit, the Government had to consider what was the proper mode in which to encounter it. They might have moved the “Previous Question” to the Motion for going into Committee. That is a course which upon the same subject was, I believe, adopted by our predecessors three years ago, and it is a course which is much approved by those who have experience of Parliamentary life when they deal with difficult questions. It might have been prudent three years ago to meet this Motion by moving the Previous Question; but I think myself, considering the circumstances under which this question is now brought forward, not by an isolated and independent Member of Parliament, but by a party of considerable power, by the Leader of the Opposition in this House, and under circumstances, as it appears to us, of precipitation, and, consequently, being a question which attracts, and even alarms, the public and the House—it would have been unwise of us to have taken refuge in a course at all times ambiguous, and not altogether satisfactory.

Well, Sir, a Motion to consider the condition of the Irish Church, or, strictly speaking, to go into Committee for that purpose, we might have met with a direct negative; but what would have been the inevitable inference which would have been drawn from such a course on our part? It would have been said we were of opinion that no change, no improvement, no modification, was necessary, expedient, or desirable, in the condition of the Church in Ireland. That was not the conclusion we wished to express; that was not our opinion; and I will meet in due course the demand of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down on this subject that, so far as we are concerned, there shall be a clear and intelligible issue. But, if it were our opinion that the condition of the Church in Ireland was susceptible of beneficial changes, how could we, without exposing ourselves to the grossest misrepresentation of our views, have met the Motion with a direct negative? Who can doubt what would have been the inference drawn? In their speeches, hon. Gentlemen would have asked, "Is the old reign of bigotry never to cease? Are you resolved to oppose all improvements? Are you prepared to deny that there are any anomalies to be corrected in arrangements which were somewhat hastily settled at a period of great political excitement forty years ago? Are you doggedly determined to say that there is no possible room for improvement in the condition of the Irish Church?" We know that that would have been the general tenor of the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite; and, Sir, not only to avoid those reproaches, but because we are of opinion that considerable modifications may be made in the temporalities of that Church, highly to the advantage of the Church herself, we could not take the course of meeting a Motion of this kind with a direct negative. What was the third means open to us? To move an Amendment. An Amendment has been moved by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, which has been the object of much criticism, as has been every Amendment moved since I have sat in this House; but I am prepared to maintain that this Amendment is drawn in strict accordance with Parliamentary experience and precedent. We took that course, acting on the example of the most eminent men that ever guided the deliberations of the House of Commons; and we took it believing that it was the one most advantageous to the public interests. Now, Sir, when Sir Robert Peel was the Leader of the Opposition, of that long Opposition—the Opposition of seven years—a "seven years' war"—when the circumstances of the House were not very different from those which now prevail—when there was, as there has now been for many years in this House, a balanced state of parties; and when every year there was not one but more than one struggle for power between the great parties—on any occasion when, as on the present occasion, a Motion was to be met by an Amendment, the invariable advice of Sir Robert Peel was this:—"If you are obliged to have an Amendment, never attempt to express your policy in an Amendment. If you attempt to express it fully, you will produce a long and cumbrous document, which will open an immense number of issues, and which must bring about very protracted discussions. If, on the other hand, you adopt concinnity of expression and condensation, you will be accused of ambiguity and equivocation. The province of a party is to express and vindicate its policy in debate. Your Amendment should never be inconsistent with your policy; but you should fix on some practical point which, if carried, would defeat the Motion of your opponent." Now, Sir, I think that very sound advice, and it has been invariably followed, not only by Sir Robert Peel's friends, but by his distinguished opponents. If you look to all the Amendments drawn up upon all great occasions by Sir Robert Peel and his party, and by Earl Russell and his party, you will find that that rule has been invariably observed. Well, with this view, in drawing the Amendment, Her Majesty's Ministers fixed on two points, which they thought essentially practical—which, if the House accepted them, would defeat the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and which are perfectly consistent with the policy which I am prepared to explain, expound, and uphold. These two points had already been mentioned to the House in the observations which I took the liberty of making when the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) brought forward his Motion on the State of Ireland. I mentioned then that in our opinion, so far as the Church in Ireland was concerned it was most expedient that we should await the Report of the Royal Commission which has been recently appointed, and which has been extremely industrious, as we have reason to believe, in its labours. That Report we believed would be in our possession, I will not say in an early part of the Session, but in the spring of this year. That was one position I took up. There was another: I denied the moral competence of this House of Commons to enter on a discussion of this question with a view to its settlement. I did not, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) the other night stated—I did not resist the Motion on the ground that this was what he called a moribund Parliament. Nothing of the kind; Although this might be the last Session of the present Parliament; and although when an election takes place for a future Parliament the appeal may be made to a larger constituency, I do not for a moment bring forward those circumstances as the basis of the argument that this House was not morally competent to deal with the question. I rested it precisely on another reason. I said that when a fundamental law of the country was called into question—though technically and legally this House had a right to do anything within the sphere of the House of Commons—it was not morally competent to decide such a question, if those who had elected it had not, in the constitutional course of our public life, received some intimation that such a question was to come before it. That is what I said. It is very different from the misrepresentation—unintentional of course—of the right hon. Member for the City of London. Well, now I ask, had the country the slightest intimation during the last few years—previous to or during the period of the political existence of this House—has it had the slightest intimation that this important, this all important question—not only from its specific nature but also from the ulterior consequences which it may induce—would be brought under discussion in Parliament? I appeal to the programme of the Prime Minister of the time, which recommended a dissolution of Parliament and explained his policy to the country. There is not the slightest allusion to the state of the Irish Church in that programme. We know very well from the correspondence which has taken place between a prelate of the Irish Church—himself a man of eminent abilities and accomplishments—and the right hon. Gentleman—although the letter appeared to take the right hon. Gentleman by surprise the other night—we know that the right hon. Gentleman at the time of the dissolution had not the remotest idea that the Irish Church would become a great subject of discussion. Sir, it is impossible to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman is not sincere in anything which he writes at the moment he writes it, and I have not the slightest doubt that that was as honest a letter as even the right hon. Gentleman ever wrote. I do not throw the slightest suspicion on that letter. But, after all, what was the character of it? Is it not a record of the fact that only three years ago the right hon. Gentleman treated the question of the Church in Ireland as one which was totally without the pale of modern politics—that he thought it could never be revived or restored; that, if it were, he saw the immense difficulties arising from the Articles of Union; but that if it were revived or restored, and if these difficulties were mooted, his imagination could not conceive the possibility that in such a subject he should be mixed up. Well, that is evidence of what our leading men—men who guided the opinion not of their party only but of the country—thought of this great question. If that is not complete evidence of the view taken by Lord Palmerston and one of his chief Ministers in this House with regard to the question of the Church in Ireland and its political position, I say that no evidence can satisfy any person. Notwithstanding all this, the question is suddenly brought before us. Now, Sir, I take no exaggerated view of even the Articles of Union. I have not for a moment pretended that the Articles of Union between the two nations are irreversible. I have not for a moment pretended that the Articles of Union and the great Acts of Parliament which were passed to carry them into effect cannot by the consent of the Sovereign and of the Estates of the Realm be changed or modified. But this I will venture to say, that the Articles of Union and the great Acts of Parliament which were passed to carry them into effect are, as I think all must acknowledge, among the most solemn muniments of the nation; and I do say that it is preposterous that we should be asked to reverse such solemn muniments at eight days' notice. In the course of this debate I have heard hon. Gentlemen, referring to the Articles of Union and these Acts of Parliament, make remarks which seemed to me to strike at the root of all social security and political stability. We have been told that these Articles were negotiated between a Protestant Parliament in ublin and a Protestant Parliament in London. Sir, we cannot trifle with the story of our country in that way. What is the Bill of Rights? Are you prepared to give up the Bill of Rights because it was passed by a Parliament of borough-bongers? If you adopt the principle of analyzing so finely the constituent elements of the public bodies that have negotiated and agreed to the great documents which are the charters of the people's rights, you may invalidate our prime liberties and level blow against the security of property and order, which has hitherto been the pride and the boast of this country. Well, taking these two points we endeavoured to comprise them in the Amendment. We expressed in the Amendment the opinion that, until we had the Report of the Royal Commission, it would be inexpedient for the House to enter into the consideration of the Church in Ireland; and, at the same time, we expressed our opinion that the decision upon these great points should be reserved for the new Parliament. And when we are told that because we used the word "reserve"—a strictly Parliamentary word—we invited the next Parliament to enter into a discussion of this question. Now, you may depend upon it that the next Parliament will not much care for our invitation. If we think we are going to hookwink or lead the next Parliament, to deprive it of its fair privileges or prerogatives, we shall commit one of the greatest blunders ever committed by man. Why, Sir, in the free and frank expression of Parliamentary language, it is perfectly open to me or to anyone else to contest the moral competence of this House to do a particular act; but surely hon. gentlemen would hardly have such language used in a formal Resolution. Therefore, in that Amendment, we did not state that the House was not competent to enter into the discussion of this matter; but, instead of using such explicit language we put it in a quieter and softer phrase, and said that the discussion ought to be reserved for a future Parliament. These are the two points which were intended to be conveyed in this Amendment. According to all Parliamentary rule and precedent nothing can, to my mind, be more justifiable in argument than the captious criticism which has been directed against this Amendment—criticism founded on an assumption which no one had a right to make.

Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman,

in his opening speech, anticipated some of those criticisms, which it is unnecessary for me to notice. Perhaps I ought to notice the remarks which were made by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford. The noble Lord saw in this Amendment, of which I have given the House the plain history—I say the plain and true history—the noble Lord saw in the language of the Amendment great cause for mistrust and want of confidence. He saw immediately that we were about to betray the trust with which he deems us to be invested. The noble Lord is at no time wanting in imputing to us being influenced by not the most amiable motives that can regulate the conduct of public men. I do not quarrel with the invective of the noble Lord. The noble Lord is a man of great talent, and he has vigour in his language. There is great vigour in his invective, and no want of vindictiveness. I admit that now speaking as a critic, and perhaps not as an impartial one, I must say I think it wants finish. Considering that the noble Lord has studied the subject, and that he has written anonymous articles against me before and since I was his Colleague—I do not know whether he wrote them when I was his Colleague—I think it might have been accomplished more ad unguem. There is one thing which the noble Lord never pardons, and that is the passing of the Reform Act of last year. But I put it to the House what would have been the general state of affairs if the counsels of the noble Lord upon that subject had prevailed, instead of the suggestions which I made and which the House adopted? Now that we are free from the heat and the great difficulties and perplexities of the last Session, and can take, I hope, a fair view of what occurred, I would express my opinion—and I think it is not peculiar to myself—that we passed last year a most beneficent and noble Act. I have not the slightest apprehension—and I do not speak of my personal connection with the matter—but as the First Minister of the Crown I look with no apprehension whatever to the appeal that will be made to the people under the provisions of that Act. I believe you will have a Parliament returned to this House full of patriotic feeling and national sentiment, whose decision will add spirit to the community and strength to the State. Sir, the only objection which I have to these attacks of the noble Lord is that they invariably produce an echo from the other side. That, it seems to me, is now almost a Parliamentary law. When the bark is heard from this side the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) emerges, I will not say from his cave, but, perhaps, from a more cynical habitation. He joins immediately in the chorus of reciprocal malignity—

The right hon. Gentleman has been extremely analytical upon the Amendment of my noble Friend—the Amendment, that is, of the Government, moved by my noble Friend; and his “zig-zag” commentary, founded on the assumption of circumstances that never occurred, and motives that never influenced us, was amusing at the moment. But how far does that commentary agree with the statement—the real statement—which I have given of the cause and origin of this Amendment? The right hon. Gentleman was extremely exuberant in his comments upon my character and career. I will not trouble the House with a defence of that character and career. I have lived in this House more than thirty years, and can truly say that during that time comments upon my character and career have been tolerably free and plain. But the House has been the jury of my life, and it allows me now here to address it, and therefore here is not the place in which I think it necessary to vindicate myself. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne is a very remarkable man. He is a learned man, though he despises history. He can chop logic like Dean Aldrich; but what is more remarkable than his learning and his logic is that power of spontaneous aversion which particularly characterizes him. There is nothing that he likes, and almost everything that he hates. He hates the working classes of England. He hates the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He hates the Protestants of Ireland. He hates Her Majesty’s Ministers. And until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire placed his hand upon the ark, he seemed almost to hate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. But now all is changed. Now we have the hour and the man. But I believe the clock goes wrong, and the man is mistaken.

Let me now ask the attention of the House to the present proposition before us. If I have for a moment trespassed upon their attention they will allow me to say that it has been in fair self-defence. I have never attacked anyone in my life—[Loud cries of “Oh!” and “Peel!”]—unless I was first assailed. Now, Sir, no one can deny this, that the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman are very considerable propositions. They are vast and violent. All will admit that. [“No, no!”] Well, hon. Gentlemen say, “No;” but to disestablish an institution that has existed 300 years; that is in the possession of property; that is certainly supported by the sympathies of a great portion of the population of the country—surely to propose to subvert such an institution—without now going into the merits of the case—surely that is a vast and violent change. Well then, the first question I will ask is, “Why this change?” and upon that point we have had no satisfactory answer. We are told that there is a crisis in Ireland, and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) the other night, with, I must say, one of those characteristics which he invariably displays, but in an agreeable manner, that of misrepresentation, said that I denied that there was anything critical in the state of Ireland, and that Ireland was, so far as my opinion was concerned, in a perfectly satisfactory state. Why, Sir, I never said that Ireland was in a satisfactory state. In a great debate like this the House will, I am sure, be indulgent to me if I touch upon some of these topics. I denied that there was an Irish crisis according to the interpretation of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. The right hon. Gentleman, when the late Parliament was dissolved not four years ago, was of opinion that the Irish Church was a question totally out of the pale of modern politics. He seemed to shrink from the profanation of the idea that he or any human being could ever disturb it; and yet he is the man who now comes forward to abolish that institution. Well, I must look to the grounds upon which he founds such a violent proceeding. He said there was a crisis in Ireland; and, as I thought at the time, with dangerous candour, he analyzed that crisis and gave its causes and its elements. And what were they? Fenianism was one. Fenianism when he was a Minister was rampant and mysterious, and the more dangerous because it was mysterious. Fenianism now is not rampant; I think we have gauged its lowest depths, and we are not afraid of it. That is one of the evidences and elements of his crisis. Does it not seem rather strange that though Fenianism was so critical

When he was a Minister we heard nothing of the crisis; but when I am a Minister, and Fenianism is so subdued, it is made the principal argument for a revolution. Well, what was the second element of the crisis, right hon. Gentleman? He said there was a startling and dangerous emigration from the country. I never liked the emigration from Ireland. I have deplored it. I know that the finest elements of political power are men; and therefore I have not sympathized with the political economists who would substitute entirely for men animals of a lower organization. I never heard an opinion of that kind from the right hon. Gentleman. I have always understood that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends looked on "the depletion" of Ireland not without satisfaction. But as I know, that the emigration from Ireland has lasted now for a considerable number of years, during most of which the right hon. Gentleman was a leading Minister of the Crown, and yet he never said that in consequence of that emigration the state of Ireland was critical. And I know that now when I have the honour to be a Minister of the Crown, and view still with anxiety the emigration from that country—though I have the satisfaction of seeing that it is reduced—the right hon. Gentleman says this also is an element in the crisis of Ireland. Well, then, how am I to understand that the second element of the crisis is one which can really be advanced as an argument in favour of a great revolution? Then, Sir, another element of the right hon. Gentleman was education. The people of Ireland were so educated that you must destroy the Irish Church. Well, the people of Ireland have been educated a great number of years, thank God! and I wish the people of England had been educated as well during that period. I am not aware that the education of the Irish people during the two short years we have sat upon this Bench has aggravated the Irish crisis. I believe that the education of the Irish people has been very advantageous to them; and I am not aware that I have been one of the Members of this House who have done anything to restrict that education. As for the fourth cause of the crisis, I should have thought that having passed a Reform Bill last year, it was a reason why we should have lost no time in passing a Reform Bill for Ireland. Instead of doing that we are to acknowledge a crisis. I say, under these circumstances, I was certainly justified in utterly repudiating the principle upon which the whole policy of the right hon. Gentleman is founded—namely, that there is a crisis in Ireland; but the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) is not justified in saying, from my adoption of that argument, that I assert that the state of Ireland is perfectly satisfactory, that nothing need be done, and that the whole agitation is a delusion. As I cannot admit that there is a crisis in Ireland, according to the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, I will state my view of the condition of Ireland. I do not think there is an Irish crisis; but if there be one, it is not occasioned by any of the causes mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. But I say, and I have said it very often, that the condition of Ireland is, on the whole, not entirely satisfactory. The general proposition the right hon. Gentleman has placed before us is the foundation of what I look upon as a great change, and I may say a revolution in our policy; and the circumstances on which he based it ranged over 700 years. The premises from which the right hon. Gentleman drew his deductions were 700 years. Well, how can we, when a great statesman comes forward on a sudden, like a thief in the night, and recommends a course so vast and violent that as yet we have got as it were only into the ante-chamber of the great discussion it will involve—I say when the right hon. Gentleman brings forward such vast premises, and draws his conclusions from them, what can we do, in the first instance, at least, but take general views? If a man tells me that my country is in a critical state, in consequence of the misgovernment of 700 years, as a sensible and prudent man I must take general views; but I form those general views within a limited range. I do not take for comparison the state of Ireland and its people when they were under the tender mercies of Fitz-Stephen's knights, or of those other ancient, historical characters, whom I may have to touch upon, with the permission of the right hon. Member for Calne; but I take a more limited and practical view. Is the condition of the Irish people now worse than it was before the Union? So far as my researches inform me, I find the people of Ireland are in a much better position. They are in the enjoyment of social and political rights they did not then possess; they are better fed, better clothed, and better paid than they were. So much for the working population. The middle class are more wealthy, and more enterprising; and the landlords, upon whom such attacks are made, have an advantage which English landlords do not always have—they get their rents paid. Is the condition of Ireland worse at this moment, when we are called upon precipitately to take this serious step, than it was during the revolutionary war? Were the people, then, better clothed and better fed? Were their wages higher or as high? We know they were not. Take the time when the tithe-proctors were fighting the people. Was the condition of Ireland then to be at all compared with its condition now? Is it not an absolute fact that the population of all classes in Ireland at this moment are more prosperous, wealthier, in the enjoyment of political and social rights which their ancestors and predecessors did not enjoy fifty years ago? Is it not true that the working population are at this moment in the enjoyment of a higher rate of wages, and consequently in a higher state of social enjoyment, than at any previous period of their history? Well, Sir, that has been urged—it has never been answered. The Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, in a statement full of accurate information and weighty argument, placed that before the House, and not a single Gentleman opposite, for a moment, impugned the accuracy of his facts, or the soundness of his conclusions. Well, how are we met? A statesman who, in this position of affairs, makes the enormous sacrifice of all the convictions of his life, tells us that the state of Ireland is so critical that he must do that which, only three years ago, when mentioned, struck him with such inexpressible horror, he said the question was without the pale of political debate. I want to know on what ground he does this. The candid ingenuity of several Gentlemen opposite gives us the ground—the evils of Ireland. We have proved that the country is richer, the people more prosperous, the landlords have their rents, the middle class are perpetually engaging in speculation and shares, and the working population have doubled their wages. Since that has been proved and acknowledged even, by hon. Gentlemen opposite, because it could no longer be denied, the whole thing, this wide-spread discontent, this constant disaffection, and the perilous position of the Church in Ireland, is explained by the fact, the recent discovery, that the evils of Ireland are not material evils—that they are moral evils, that they are sentimental evils. We are called upon now to argue the question not as, in recent times, when we had to discuss the political and material condition of Ireland, but we are asked to take a vast and violent step, because the people of Ireland are suffering under a moral, or, as it has been styled, a sentimental grievance. Well, Sir, I am not the man to despise a sentimental grievance. I think he takes a very contracted view of life and of human nature who despises the sentimental grievances of a nation; but when we have to deal with sentimental grievances, and when, in consequence of sentimental grievances, we are asked to make very material changes, I think every candid mind will agree that we ought to proceed with caution. Though we may be ready to make great sacrifices to soothe the pride and gratify the feeling of race, still to take some precipitate step and fail in accomplishing our desire would be disastrous to the State and humiliating to the statesman. Now, what are those sentimental grievances of the Irish people? I am not conscious that I have ever been deficient in sympathy for the Irish people. They have engaging qualities, which I think every man who has any heart must regard. But I must say nothing surprises me more than the general conduct of the Irish people on this subject of sentimental grievances. They are a race who are certainly among the bravest of the brave, most ingenious, witty, very imaginative, and therefore very sanguine; but for them to go about the world announcing that they are a conquered race does appear to me the most extraordinary thing in the world. Every one of us, nations and individuals, are said to have a skeleton in the house. I do not say that I have not one—I hope I have not. But if I had I would turn the key upon him. But for the Irish ostentatiously to declare that they are a conquered race is very strange. If they really are a conquered race, they are not the people who ought to announce it. It is the conquerors from whom we should learn the fact; for it is not the conquered who should go about the world and announce their shame and humiliation. But I entirely deny that the Irish are a conquered race. I deny that they are more a conquered race than the people of any other nation. Therefore, I cannot see that there is any real ground for the doleful tone in which they complain that they are the most disgraced of men, and make at the foundation for the most unreasonable requests. Ireland is not one whit more conquered than England. They are always telling us that the Normans conquered Ireland. Well, I have heard that the Normans conquered England too, and the only difference between the two conquests is that, while the conquest of Ireland by the Normans was only partial that of England was complete. But then they tell us that was a long time ago, but since then there was that dreadful conquest by Cromwell, when Cromwell not only conquered the people but confiscated their estates. But Cromwell conquered England. He conquered the House of Commons. He ordered "that bauble" to be taken away, in consequence of which an hon. Member, I believe of very advanced Liberal opinions, the other night proposed that we should raise a statue to his memory. But Cromwell not only conquered us, but he forfeited and confiscated estates in every county in England. Well, Sir, then we are told that the Dutch conquered Ireland, but, unfortunately, they conquered England too. They marched from Devonshire to London through the midst of a sullen population. At least this must be said for the Irish—they fought like gentlemen for their Sovereign; there is no disgrace in the battle of the Boyne, nor does any shame attach to the sword of Sarsfield. I wish I could say as much for the conduct of the English soldiers at that time. Therefore, the habit of the Irish coming forward on all occasions and saying that they are a conquered race, and, in consequence of their being a conquered race, they must destroy the English institutions, is a most monstrous thing. Then we are told that the Church in Ireland is a badge of this conquest. Well, Sir, I will not go into the question as to the origin of the Irish Church. I hope that nothing shall induce me to enter into a controversy as to whether St. Patrick was a Protestant or not. But I ask this question from this conquered race—how can they attain an eminent position in every country where wars are successful—why is the Church of Ireland more a badge of conquest to the Roman Catholics of that country than the Church of England is to the Dissenters? There is this difference, Sir, according to their own story, centuries almost have elapsed since the Roman Catholics were in possession of the churches in Ireland, while in England there was a great change within comparatively modern times; the fact being that one may meet almost any day in England the descendants of some one or other of the ejected ministers; but we never meet a burly Nonconformist who tells us that he is a member of a conquered race, and that he regards the Church of England as a badge of conquest. The Dissenter disapproves of the Church, and he hopes some day to terminate its existence as an Establishment, but he considers himself to be on perfectly equal terms. As far as their relation to the Church Establishment is concerned, what difference is there between the Roman Catholics of Ireland and the Nonconformists of this country, who are among the most wealthy, influential, and intelligent of Her Majesty's subjects, scores of whom, moreover, occupy seats in this House at the present moment? If there is any difference, the feelings of the English Dissenter ought to be more bitter than those of the Roman Catholic. That is, therefore, another point—namely, so far as sentimental grievances are concerned, of which I really do hope we shall hear no more.

Now, Sir, I come to a more practical part of the question. [Cheers.] I understand that cheer. But we shall never come to a solution of any of these questions unless we first arrive at clear ideas of what we mean. You wish to convey in that cheer that I have been speaking on subjects not germane to the question in hand. My answer is that it is impossible for anyone to grapple with the real points before us unless we clear the atmosphere of these nebulous illusions. Unless we get rid of "conquered races," of "badges of conquest," and things of that kind we cannot realize what it is we have to do. We must be very cautious in respect to the great question now before the House and the country when we find it started by a man so eminent as the right hon. Member for South Lancashire on premises so utterly and absurdly fallacious. I say that it is not right to disestablish the Irish Church; and of this I am quite certain that it never can be right to argue that question on an assumed and fallacious crisis, which any man who has any knowledge of life knows has no existence. I have brought the discussion to this point, and I want now to ask the House to consider how we who sit on this Bench have dealt with those grievances of Ireland on which I have touched. I say that during the period when I have had any lead in public life—now, I am sorry to say more than twenty years ago—I have acted conscientiously on one principle alone, and there has not been a Gentleman on this Bench, or on the opposite Bench, when we were Opposition, but gave me on that point unswerving and complete sympathy and adhesion. In what I recommended to be done I had the sanction and support of all my Colleagues now in the present Cabinet, of all who sat in a responsible position on the Bench opposite, and, I can say, even the sanction of the noble Viscount the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranborne). What was the policy we pursued with respect to Ireland? Our policy was one of conciliation. Most of us entered public life when there had been the fiercest acrimony between Irish parties. Some hon. Gentleman now sitting in this House can hardly realize the sentiments then entertained towards one another by Irish Members of different religions, and English Members of different parties who sympathized with their co-religionists. But about twenty-five years ago English statesmen had arrived at a conclusion, advantageous both for England and Ireland, that we should have a policy of conciliation, and that we should endeavour, as far as we could, to remove anomalies, soften asperities, and encourage between the two religions and races a more living and direct sympathy. The principles of our policy were, first, in Ireland to create and not to destroy; and, secondly, to acknowledge that you could not strengthen the Protestant interest in any more effectual way than by doing justice to the Roman Catholics. On those principles we acted. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) in a speech which he made last night, and which the House heard with that interest with which it always welcomes the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, alluded with pride, and with justifiable pride, to what he had done with regard to the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains in the army. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, though he took that course spontaneously, did so entirely with the sympathy of his Colleagues. The House will remember that much discussion occurred on a recent occasion respecting the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains in gaols. That measure was not proposed by us, but the Government of that day were in great distress concerning it; and we supported them although they were opposed by many of their own party, and although many on this side of the House disapproved the course they took. We, however, were convinced that course was based on right principles, and it would not have been adopted but for our assistance, to which a speech of unrivalled power by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) largely contributed. On a subsequent occasion we had before us the oath to be taken by the Roman Catholics. I have seldom considered a question which occasioned me more anxiety and pain; but it was brought to a satisfactory conclusion greatly by the influence of hon. Gentlemen on these Benches; and the oath which was ultimately adopted, with slight variations, by Parliament was drawn by the present Lord Chancellor of England, who, I believe was never suspected of being false to the principles of Protestantism. Through all these endeavours to carry out a policy of conciliation I have invariably been supported by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In the same spirit we have brought forward a proposition to grant a charter to a Roman Catholic University. I need not comment upon the “zigzag” criticisms of the right hon. Member for Calne; but I understand our proposal has been commented upon during my absence this evening. Sir, I believe that proposal was perfectly consistent with the principle we have laid down that in Ireland the wise policy is to create and not to destroy, and to strengthen Protestant institutions by being just to the Roman Catholics. Sir, I believe the proposal to grant a charter to a Roman Catholic University was conceived entirely in that spirit. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say “Take hold of Trinity College; appropriate its property, destroy its constitution, tear its charters to shreds: that is the way to conciliate the people, that is the way to reconcile parties and creeds in Ireland.” But that is not the policy which I and my Colleagues conceived. We have determined to create and never to destroy in Ireland. There has been too much destruction, I say; therefore, we shall maintain all we have said in supporting our proposition for a charter. I do not wish to conceal that it is one which I believe responds to the legitimate demands of the Roman Catholics. It will, at the same time, maintain that great University of Dublin, which is one of the greatest Universities in the country. No one will question for one moment but that there is a want of educational means for the higher classes of the Roman Catholic population in Ireland, though people may differ as to the way by which it should be satisfied. I say it is so to satisfy that want by a mode which creates and does not destroy. That is in accordance with our uniform policy, and in conformity also with the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have hitherto pursued with the same integrity of purpose and sincerity of feeling as we believe we are able to claim for ourselves. And why have hon. gentlemen opposite pursued this policy with ? Because the experience of the past has taught us that it was wise to do that which would of all things tend to effect a reconciliation between creeds and classes, and put an end to the unsatisfactory state of feeling in Ireland. We have been subjected to the usual taunts ; nothing is so easy as to say that we do this thing to win the Catholic vote, that we do another to obtain a majority or maintain a position. But whether in Office or in Opposition it has been the same ; and these taunts pass by us without the slightest effect upon our course. The same taunts, indeed have been levelled at our opponents, but never by me. Well, let us look at this policy as applied to the Church in Ireland, which is the question before us. We have attempted to conciliate creeds. We have endeavoured to bring about a state of society by which every man in Ireland should feel that he was in a position of the same equality as he would enjoy in England. Whether the measures were proposed and passed by us or by our opponents, I do not think that policy has hitherto been unsuccessful. There has been a difference in the tone even of the members of this House as compared with what it was a quarter of a century ago. But of this House there has been a very great change. But what is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman ? He comes forward to propose a change which will at once outrage the feelings, and touch in their dearest sentiments and interests a large and very influential portion of the population of Ireland. Year after year we have in this House endeavoured to secure to the Roman Catholics, and especially to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, the full and free exercise of their religion. There is a Gentleman opposite, however he may be, who does not in his heart know that to be true. I am not referring to a Session. I am not referring to a Parliament ; but I am referring to the long, and patient, and continuous policy which we have pursued even under the unfavourable circumstances and discouragements of Opposition — the policy that the Roman Catholics should have a full and free exercise of their religion ; and although it entailed upon us much prejudice and misapprehension among friends whom we respected and regarded, we were firm to that policy, because we believed it to be right and wise, and that it would lead to that general sympathy and conciliation to which I have adverted. But what does the right hon. Gentleman propose ? Have the Protestants of Ireland no interest in their faith ? Have they no regard for their Church ? Has their history not identified them with that institution ? Have the Protestants of Ireland no sentimental feelings which are to be regarded ? And what are we to think of the statesman who, having, as I suppose, sanctioned the policy which I have indicated, comes forward at this moment to introduce to us not merely a measure but a policy which must restore all the acrimony of which we had hoped to get rid—which must revive all those inveterate and rancorous feelings which we have sought to eradicate — which places all classes and creeds in an adverse position, and renders that country again the scene of every hostile passion, of every sentiment which is opposed to that political tranquillity which all great statesmen have striven to produce ? Now, I say with regard to the Church in Ireland, that if this policy of conciliation had been pursued, I cannot doubt that we might have come to conclusions which would have greatly facilitated the objects that we wished to accomplish. The reform in the Irish Church, which took place in the year 1833, was effected by the Earl of Derby. It has been criticized of late years as a measure the arrangements of which were deficient in completeness. But in my mind it was a measure which showed the vigour and determination of a real statesman. When we consider the state of affairs at that time as regards the Church in Ireland with which Lord Derby had to deal, I think we must admire the determination and the grasp of his conception. But there is no doubt that some forty years have elapsed since that period, and those forty years have brought not only with reference to the Church in Ireland but to the Church in England and many other institutions, very instructive results. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne the other night—I just mention this in passing—said there was an inconsistency—that was the gravest charge which he brought against my noble Friend—an inconsistency between my noble Friend's Amendment and his speech, because my noble Friend stated that he was ready to alter, or was prepared to consider the alteration of, the status of the Church in Ireland. I was informed to-day by a Friend that when Lord Derby proposed his great change for the reformation of the Church of Ireland it was opposed, because it was said he had altered the status of the Church in Ireland. But now we know better than they did forty years ago. We know that Lord Derby never in that sense altered the status of the Church. The Church, as an Established Church, was not at all affected by the legislation of Lord Derby; and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) will just remember that the use of the word status may be such as he might not adopt. I myself said the other night, as I say now, that I think you might elevate the status of the unendowed clergy of Ireland. But I do not mean by elevating their status that revolution in their position which the right hon. Gentleman chooses to fix upon my noble Friend. My opinion is that if this system of conciliation, founded on the principle that in Ireland you ought to create and not to destroy, had been pursued, you might have elevated the Irish Church greatly to its advantage. You might have rendered it infinitely more useful—you might have removed circumstances which are not favourable to its reputation; and, at the same time, I do not think it impossible that you might have introduced measures which would have elevated the status of the unendowed clergy of Ireland, and so softened and terminated those feelings of inequality which now exist, so that you might have had the same equality in the State in Ireland which you have in England. There is perfect equality in the state of the Dissenter in England, although his is not an Established Church. That state of things might exist in Ireland if you had taken measures which would, among a sensitive people, have prevented a sentiment of humiliation. Saying thus much, allow me to add that the policy recommended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire involves issues in my mind much more important than the government of Ireland. And I would ask the House for a moment to consider what would be the effect of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman upon the property of the country? Now, I am not going to impress upon the House the importance of respecting a prescriptive title of 300 years. I recognize fully that there is a difference, so far as the State is concerned, between public and private property. But the various shades between them, although they are numerous, blend, and dangerously blend; and it is of much importance that when you deal even with public property you should deal with it in a manner so thoughtful, so learned, and so wise that you should not endanger the principle of private property. All that I pass aside, and I leave it to Gentlemen on both sides well to weigh what may be the consequences of interfering with a prescriptive title of 300 years. What effect it may have on the estates of the great City companies I stop not to inquire. What effect the principle by which it is recommended in Ireland may have even upon the estates of private individuals whose property has arisen from the plunder of the Church I stop not to ask. I believe there are abbeys in Ireland, and there are many in England, that are no longer enjoyed by abbots. I do not dwell upon these things. I remind the House on the general consideration not to forget them. I view with great jealousy the plunder of a Church; because, so far as history can guide me, I have never found that Churches are plundered except to establish or enrich oligarchies; and although it may be a very Liberal movement to attack an ecclesiastical institution, I have never found that the consequences were in favour of liberty or enlightened feeling. But what I want to impress upon the House is this—that there is a new view of the case with regard to the question of property in the course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. The principle of property is contested in the age in which we live. I am not alarmed by that, because I think the principle of property may be established on the strongest and soundest arguments that the human intellect can conceive. But we cannot shut our eyes to what the hon. Member for Birmingham calls “the spirit of the age,” and which entirely influences him in the advice which he gives to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. In the present day the principle of property, even of private property, has been contested, and Ireland, unfortunately, is not an exception to the countries in which that political dogma has been promulgated. Observe what the proposition of the right hon.

gentleman involves. I can understand a man, for example, taking up this position—"Three hundred years ago the Churches of Ireland were ministered by priests of the Roman Catholic faith, and were filled by communicants of the Roman Catholic creed. You ejected our ministers 300 years ago; you expelled our congregations and drove them to a distant part of the island—now our opportunity is come, the hour and the man have both arrived; now we will regain what we have lost, and the Protestant populations and the Protestant ministers shall leave the churches." That, undoubtedly, would be a violation of property, the prescription of the Protestant population of three centuries' duration would be violated; and to that degree the principle of property would be outraged. But, then, the principle of property would be vindicated in a much higher degree by the principle of restitution, and so it might be contended that there was no violation of property at all. These persons might say, "We are only restoring property to the original owners, and we announce it as a principle so sacred that even 300 years of abuse shall not prevent us from acknowledging its sacredness." But the right hon. Gentleman does nothing of the kind. He goes to the Church of Ireland, he takes all its property, and he does not tell us what he is going to do with it. There is no restitution to palliate or excuse the proceeding; it is sheer confiscation. And, therefore, I say that the principle proposed for your sanction in this scheme, by which the right hon. Gentleman can bounce upon all the property of the Church in Ireland, and not tell you what he is going to do with it, is an outrage and a violation of the principle of property, a man which nothing greater or more enormous can be conceived. In a parenthesis the right hon. Gentleman told us that the property would be preserved and only used for Irish purposes. Well, as was truly said by my right hon. Friend, what are those Irish purposes? Reduction of the duties upon whisky would be an Irish purpose; is that what he means? I hope the House of Commons will not consent to move in the dark on such an important subject as this. I say that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman as explained in his speech does involve an attack on the principle of property, which never yet has been—I will not say mooted in Parliament, but which has scarcely found place in the speculations of the most abstract philosophers. For, although there have been propositions before now to attack the property of national institutions, no proposition of this kind has ever been made by a Minister of the Crown, or one standing in the responsible position of Leader of the Opposition; no one has ever yet attempted to attack the public property of this country, who has not at the same time indicated to the country with what intention he lays hands upon the property which he was thus appropriating. Knowing what we all know, that the plunder of Churches, which are the property of the people, has never yet produced anything for the people, I say that we ought to look carefully at this proposition, which leaves us entirely in the dark. I say we ought to look with the greatest jealousy on such a proposition. I cannot under any circumstances—whatever you may do with the property of the Church of Ireland, which I hope we shall succeed in preventing your touching at all—I cannot under any circumstances agree that it should be appropriated to what in Liberal language is called a secular purpose. A "secular purpose" is always a job. Church property is the property of the people, set apart for a specific purpose—namely, their spiritual instruction. There is a great lack of funds for spiritual instruction. The religious education of the people has been much neglected in this country, owing to the great plunder of the Church, and the plunder of the Church has invariably been the appropriation of public property to private individuals. I trust, therefore, that we shall hear no more of that.

There is another subject to which before I sit down I must call the serious consideration of the House. I feel that I have unfortunately somewhat trespassed upon their attention; but the House is generous, and it feels that this is an occasion on which it is scarcely an intrusion on my part to crave their indulgence. I have to place before them one of the greatest issues ever offered to their consideration, and that somewhat suddenly. The conflict has come upon us when we little expected it, and it is necessary that the House and the country should understand what they have to decide. The right hon. Gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Cardwell) was nervously alive upon that subject. He said, "We must have a clear and intelligible issue before the country." Well, so far as I am concerned, the issue shall be clear and intelligible. I have touched upon this question with regard to Ireland by itself, and I have shown how completely contrary to the policy which the wisest statesmen have pursued, even at great personal sacrifice, for a quarter of a century is the policy suddenly recommended to us by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. No more conciliation; no more hope of reconciling creeds and classes; no more hope, by prudent arrangement, of securing in a country of anomalies, no doubt, and full of historical difficulties, what I thought we were arriving at, by achieving that equality in the State which the subjects of the Queen enjoy in England. All that is past. The great philosophers and physicians of the State are of opinion that such equality can only be accomplished by outraging the dearest feelings and invading the interests of a population not inconsiderable, very influential, and the most important portion of the Irish people. The policy of conciliation, sanctioned by Peel, supported with admirable eloquence by Graham, from which Palmerston did not recoil, to which Lord Russell gave his adhesion, and in which I once thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite would have worked with me—it is gone. For Protestant ascendancy, which really no longer existed, is to be substituted, I suppose, Papal supremacy. All that we have attempted for years to accomplish is to be obliterated, and Ireland is still to be the scene of faction—is still to be the difficulty of England. That is what you are bringing about at a moment when we seemed on the verge of accomplishing what for a quarter of a century we have been labouring for. I have asked the House to consider the altered circumstances of the case, and I have begged the House to reflect for a moment on what might be the influence on property of the policy recommended by the right hon. Gentleman. I now come to another and more important ulterior consequence. If that policy is carried into effect, the connection between the State and the Church in Ireland ceases; the Government of Ireland is divorced from the principle of religion, which hitherto has been acknowledged as a part of our national policy. Now, what is meant by the union between Church and State? In this crisis, I say, it is of great importance that we should fully understand what we mean by a connection between Church and State. I will give my version of it. I understand by it that authority is to be not merely political;

that Government is to be not merely an affair of force, but is to recognize its responsibility to the Divine Power. Sir, we have discarded the divine right of Kings, and properly discarded it, because the divine right of Kings led to the abuse of supernatural power by individuals; but an intelligent age will never discard the divine right of Government. If Government is not divine, it is nothing. It is a mere affair of the police-office, of the tax-gatherer, of the guard-room. Now, Sir, any man who has had any experience of affairs knows this—that every year Government becomes more difficult. It is its connection with the religious principle—it is not the guard-room, it is not the police-office, it is not the tax-gatherer—which enables it to rule the nation. You must educate the people; you must reform the criminal; you must establish asylums to meet all the wants of injured and suffering society. These are the duties of Government. In their performance, the Government is perpetually applied to, is perpetually called upon, and how are we to perform those offices unless we are in connection with religious bodies? It is the principle of religion which makes a Government sensible and conscious that it has to perform these duties, and, having to perform these duties, it requires an agency by which it can accomplish them. I am totally at a loss to see how we can connect Government with religion except by an Establishment. One of the things which the right hon. Gentleman who preceded me wanted was an intelligible issue. I give him a clear and intelligible issue. I want to know how we can connect the Government with religion except by an Establishment. It is very true that, in a country like England, where we have the advantage of complete toleration, we may have an Establishment which is not the Church that represents the entire majority of the country: but we cannot judge of the influence of an Established Church by the mere influence of its ministers or by the number of those in communion with it. We must recollect the influence which the existence of such an Establishment has on those who are not communicants with that Church. The great sectarian parties of this country, so full of learning and spirit, so highly disciplined and organized—what would they have been without the Church of England, the archetype which produced that great competition of charity which is the characteristic of the age and the century in which we live? Well, if you admit this principle you ought to hesitate very much as to the course you are taking. What are you doing as regards Ireland? Are you prepared to say that the Government in Ireland shall be a Government disconnected from the principle of religion! Are you prepared to say that? If you are not prepared to say that, how is Government in Ireland to be connected with the principle of religion? Tell me that. Will you endow the Presbyterian Church in Ireland? Why, all the objections which you allege against the Anglican Church will equally apply to the Presbyterian Church. Its population is not more considerable. Well, will you connect with the State the Roman Church? ["No!"] You say "No!" We know there are some persons who say "Yes!" But you are right in saying "No." There is no doubt it is utterly impracticable. The United Kingdom is a Protestant kingdom. The people of the United Kingdom are a Protestant people. They defend and cherish a Protestant Throne; and any attempt in Ireland to establish a Roman Church in connection with the State is a dream which no practical man would allow himself to indulge in. Well, if you cannot establish the Kirk, if you cannot establish the Church of Rome, then, if you are going to destroy the Protestant Episcopal Church, you come to this point—you will have a Government in Ireland that is not connected with the religious principle. This appears to me to be a logical consequence; and, at this moment, if you believe with me that the union between Church and State is a great security for civilization and for religious liberty ["No!"] I say if you agree with me in this—I am only trying to do as the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) asked, to arrive at a clear and intelligible issue—you must acknowledge that there is no possible means by which you can maintain that union but by maintaining the Church in Ireland. Reform or modify her if you will, make her more efficient if you can, but unless you are prepared to give up the connection between Church and State, which is the connection of authority tempered by the civilizing power of religion, you must maintain the Church. You cannot stir from that position; you must accept one of these two alternatives. Sir,—in connection with the point—comments were made in the course of this varied debate, by, as I understand, the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) to-night, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, and by the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) who sits opposite me, to a letter which I wrote, and to which I will draw the attention of the House, if it will permit me. The right hon. Member for the City of London said I wrote a letter to the clergy, telling them that the Church was in danger; they have all preached in consequence, and this has produced a considerable effect. Now, there was a letter written once by a Prime Minister to a clergyman. He did not say the Church was in danger. The letter was written to the Dean of Durham, and it called out "No Popery." I think that must have misled the right hon. Gentleman. My letter was not written to a clergyman, but to a layman. It was not sent to The Times newspaper, as the right hon. Member for Calne said, nor to any other newspaper.

MR. LOWE: The Member for Calne never said so.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Member for Calne said it was sent to The Times, and that he read it in The Times.

MR. LOWE: I said it appeared in The Times. I never said that the right hon. Gentleman sent it to The Times.

MR. DISRAELI: No; you only said that it appeared there the same morning as the Amendment of my noble Friend.

MR. LOWE: I did not say that. On the contrary, I said it appeared the morning before the Amendment appeared.

MR. DISRAELI: You mis-dated the letter, you mis-quoted the letter, and you misconceived the letter. I am now speaking upon the connection between Church and State. That letter exactly expresses the feelings which influence me at this moment; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne says that I wrote a letter trying to excite the Protestant feelings of the country, let the letter be judged by what it contains, and by nothing more. What was said by the right hon. Gentleman was totally inconsistent with what was said by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter respecting this letter. There is nothing about Protestant feeling in it; and with regard to the right hon. Member for the City, who says I wrote a letter declaring that the Church was in danger—the City churches may be in danger—but he totally misunderstood what I wrote. I did not say that the Church was in danger. I said the State was in danger. Terminate the connection between the State and the Church;

divorce authority from the religious principle; you will find the State in danger, not the Church, when it thus loses the high sanction and the high influences which animate a nation. I ask again, is it or is not true that if the policy of the right hon. Gentleman is adopted you terminate the connection in Ireland between Government and the Church? Is it or is it not true? Let us have a clear answer to that. [Opposition Cheers.] You admit it. Can you resist the consequences of your admission. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] Your "Hear, hear!" will some day be remembered by yourselves with astonishment and perhaps remorse. There is more in that "Hear, hear!" than you, or than England conceives. You will terminate the connection between Church and State in Ireland;—why should you stop there? If the "hear-hearers" are to have their way, I can completely understand the policy that is brought before us. But what I want is that the House of Commons and England should understand what is the clear and intelligible issue the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford is so anxious to ascertain. Well, if you adopt the principle of separation between Church and State in Ireland, there is no reason why you should not adopt it in Scotland. [Mr. CRAUFURD: Hear, hear!] I like to hear that cheer. There is nothing that advances discussion more than the spontaneous sympathy of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Church of Scotland has in its communion only a minority of the people; and I want to know upon what principle you can maintain the Kirk in Scotland if you do not maintain the Church in Ireland; Well, then, it is admitted that the majority not being within the pale of the Scottish Kirk, Scotland also may follow the policy of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. Why stop at Scotland? Are you prepared for the ulterior consequences of this policy? That is what I want to have thoroughly understood by the people of this country. Let there be, as the right hon. Member for Oxford says, "a clear and intelligible issue." Well, the Church falls in Ireland, it falls in Scotland; but it is never to fall in England, because the right hon. Gentleman says there are millions upon millions of Churchmen in England. That is rhetoric, it is not reason. Why, the hon. Member for Birmingham, that great master of the mind of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—we have heard of "educating," why he, too, can educate—that hon. Gentleman will take the Census Returns, and with that analysis which his shrewd intellect is so well able to regulate and control he will prove that it is a very clear conclusion from the statistical documents in his hand that the union between Church and State—that union between authority and religion which has humanized authority, civilized this country, and secured to us civil and religious liberty—cannot be maintained. I am sure that hon. Members will not object to my stating at some length my opinion upon this subject. The question is only now at its commencement. Years will elapse before it is decided. It is very easy for the right hon. Gentleman to propose Resolutions; but he must allow us to try, especially as I was challenged on the subject to-night, that a clear issue should be put before the people of England. Now let us look at the case of England. Here I have a letter written to me by a dignitary of the Welsh Church, a proctor in Convocation, one who I think must be a respectable and cultivated gentleman, because he is a friend of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. He has been a great supporter of the right hon. Gentleman at Oxford and in a county with which he is intimately connected, and, though in a state of great distress on account of the state of affairs, he still regards the right hon. Gentleman with feelings of affection. In this communication he begs to call my attention to the immediate effects of the policy of that distinguished statesman, whom he still regards with feelings of personal affection. He begs to call my attention to a Welsh Reform meeting—[Cries of "Where?"—] held in Hope Hall, Liverpool, attended by delegates from twenty-two places. ["Oh, oh!" and a laugh.] Oh! I assure you it was a real meeting. It was a Liberal meeting—perhaps on that account the hon. Gentleman opposite doubts whether it could be a real one—and it was numerous attended. The writer of the letter is a dignitary of the Welsh Church, a most respectable man, an M.A. ["Name!"] The right hon. Gentleman may have the name; but in discussion we have agreed not to give the name of every gentleman who sends us information. The meeting was called in consequence of the new policy, and the chairman, Mr. Owen Williams, in the course of his speech, maintains that the Welsh have a grievance to be redressed almost as great as this of the Irish Church.

"It was absolutely necessary," he said—

"That they should step aside and form a solid front. They had a Church question to deal with as well as the Irish people; and he did not see why Wales should be contented any longer to carry the burden put upon her. The Welsh had their Church question also; and it would be impossible for" myself, "Mr. Gladstone, or Mr. Bright to settle the Irish Church question without feeling at the same time that the present state of things in Wales could no longer exist."

He ends in this way—"The Welsh had also to deal with a land question." This shows the progress of the public mind—

"It was almost impossible to obtain freehold land in Wales, where the population had doubled itself during the last thirty years. He could see no justice in that state of things. He could not see why the great landowners should become the possessors of all the improvements effected by commerce, industry, and skill."

At the close of an excellent speech, the chairman intimated it was probable the next meeting would be addressed by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. This was the letter sent to me. I will not pass it over to the right hon. Gentleman because he had one handed to him the other evening, and he will not desire another. I have quoted it to show you the consequences of the new policy. Whether the policy is right or wrong is another question; but do not let the House misconceive the crisis which has arrived. Well, then, we come to the question of England. I believe in Wales there are very few benefices in which there is a majority of Churchmen; and I ask the House, on what principle can you refuse to apply to Scotland and to Wales the same principle you are applying to Ireland? I ask you, how can you meet the question of England? Let not hon. Members around me say there are millions and millions in England who are members of the Established Church. That does not answer the stern conclusion from the Census Returns—namely, that in England the majority of the people are not members of the Church. Well, then, are you prepared to say, notwithstanding that, that the civil authority shall not be divorced from religion? I know very well the difficulties we have to contend with now. I know very well what are the powers that are now, and have been for some time, meeting together and joining to produce the consequences which some anticipate, and which I hope may yet be defeated. No man can have watched what has taken place in this country during the last ten years without being prepared, if he be of a thoughtful mind, for the crisis of this country. I repeat the expression that I used in my letter to my Lord Dartmouth, that the crisis of England is now fast arriving. High Church Ritualists and the Irish followers of the Pope have been long in secret combination, and are now in open confederacy. [Laughter.] Yes, but it is a fact. It is confessed by those who attempted to prevent this combination, to mitigate the occurrence, to avoid the conjuncture which we always felt would be most dangerous to the country. They have combined to destroy that great blessing of conciliation which both parties in the State for the last quarter of a century have laboured to effect. I am perfectly aware of the great difficulties that we have to encounter. I know the almost superhuman power of this combination. They have their hand almost upon the realm of England. Under the guise of Liberalism, under the pretence of legislating in the spirit of the age, they are, as they think, about to seize upon the supreme authority of the realm. But this I can say, that so long as, by the favour of the Queen, I stand here, I will oppose to the utmost of my ability the attempt they are making. I believe the policy of the right hon. Gentleman who is their representative, if successful, will change the character of this country. It will deprive the subjects of Her Majesty of some of their most precious privileges, and it will dangerously touch even the tenure of the Crown.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help, Sir, making the observation—and I trust it is one at least as much within the bounds of Parliamentary courtesy as some to which we have recently listened—that there are portions of the discursive speech of the right hon. Gentleman of which, with every effort on my part, I fail to discern the relevancy; and that there are other portions of it of which it does not seem to me a severe judgment to say that they appear to be due to the influence of a heated imagination. Sir, I can assure the House that, at this hour of the morning, I shall endeavour to confine myself to the main issue, and shall dismiss with a very few words of observation subjects that in the treatment of the right hon. Gentleman occupied a considerable time. His elaborate justification of the Motion of the noble Lord by reference to precedents, I think, does not call for detailed reply, inasmuch as he was mistaken in all the references that he made. He said it was intolerable to meet a Motion on the Irish Church by the Previous Question, but he forgets that he met it so himself last year. And when he said it had been met in that manner on the part of his predecessors he forgot that, on the three successive occasions on which, during the Government of Lord Palmerston, the Irish Church question was advanced it was met by that Government concurring in the precept of the right hon. Gentleman, but avoiding his practice—by the direct negative which he seeks to avoid. I will not enter either into the elaborate personal invective delivered by the right hon. Gentleman against the noble Lord (Viscount Cranborne) and against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. The right hon. Gentleman says that his pacific character is well established, and that he never in his life attacked a man by whom he had not been attacked before. Sir, I leave these observations of the right hon. Gentleman to speak for themselves, and I do not for one moment envy him whatever benefit he can derive from them. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has an extensive knowledge of history; but the whole of the historical portion of his speech I shall succinctly and cursorily dismiss, because the right hon. Gentleman deals in such propositions as this—that the Norman conquest of England was similar in its operation and effect to the English conquest of Ireland; and not this only, but likewise that as Ireland was conquered after the Revolution of 1688, so England itself was conquered in order to bring about that Revolution. It would be an unpardonable abuse of the time of the House if I were to suppose it could be necessary to enter for one moment into a detailed analysis and confutation of a statement like that. Before I proceed to co-operate with the right hon. Gentleman, as I shall most cheerfully do, in endeavouring to attain that clear and satisfactory issue which he so much desires, and to which I will try a little to contribute, I will say a few words with reference to what has occurred in the course of the debate. I am bound to admit the general fairness and moderation with which the debate has been conducted. I think that I who appear here as what is called the assailant of the Irish Church, after having in my early days held opinions strongly in favour of its maintenance, cannot in fairness do less than allow that, with the exception perhaps of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who threw a few stones at me out of the glass house in which he dwells, nothing could give less ground for complaint than the tone which hon. Gentlemen have adopted in referring to the inconsistency of my present as contrasted with my previous career. Naturally, however, there has been criticism upon the Resolutions, and in the debate one point in particular has been dwelt upon on which I conceive that I ought to have previously given an explanation, brief, but important in its nature. In the speech that I made in proposing that the House should resolve itself immediately into a Committee, I ventured to express an opinion that so far as I could forecast the shape which a measure for the disestablishment of the Irish Church was likely to take, it would issue in something like this:—that of the total actual present value of the entire property of that Church at the moment when the change took place no less than three-fifths, and possibly between that proportion and two-thirds, would remain in the hands of the members of the Communion now established by law in Ireland, and would remain in their hands with the perfect good-will of the whole of those among whom they dwelt. Now, Sir, if the House will forgive me, I will give in a very words the sort of rough computation upon which I founded that statement. These will not be supposed to be official figures. Official figures do not exist; and although I do not possess the means of comparatively accurate investigation which are at the disposal of the Government, still in dealing with these large sums I have availed myself of data which I believe are worthy of credit. I believe that the value of the whole capitalized revenue of the whole Established Church may be not unfairly stated at £13,000,000; that the value of the outstanding perpetuities not yet purchased up by the lessees would be about £600,000; and that a fair estimate of the value of churches and parsonages, with the immediate appendages, would be no less than £2,500,000. If that be so, it gives a total of £16,100,000 of which three-fifths would be £9,600,000. Now, Sir, if the clerical life interests were recognized, that, I believe, could not be done at a charge of less than half of the capitalized revenue, or £6,500,000. I ought to have stated that by clerical life interests I refer to incumbents, to beneficed clergymen, inasmuch as there are life interests of a minor character which would have to be considered. There are many lay interests of a minor kind, such as those of organists, clerks in possession of freeholds, and so on, which would not be extravagantly estimated at £500,000. The price of advowsons belonging to members of the Church might be fairly taken at another £500,000; and if the churches and parsonages were left—although it is not part of my duty to propose anything on the subject—in the hands of the present possessors, that would be £2,500,000 more, making a total of £10,000,000, which would be £400,000 more than three-fifths of the whole value of the property. I have said this to show that I did not speak altogether without consideration. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India threatens me, when we get into Committee, with an indefinite number of what he calls categorical questions. My right hon. Friend is perfectly at liberty to put to me as large a number of those questions as he pleases; only, I hope he will allow me to exercise a certain amount of discretion, as to the answers I will give him. It appears to me that I have gone far in the declaration I have made, and further I do not intend to go. But it is requested that I should make an explanation on a point which has been misunderstood in a manner which appears to be singular—I mean the nature of the third Resolution. The strange construction appears to have been put, and put even by Gentlemen in office, on these Resolutions, that they were intended, by the sole act of the House of Commons, to arrest the action of constituted legal powers, such as those which the Irish Church Commissioners exercise, and such, above all, as the Crown makes use of in the exercise of its patronage. Now, if hon. Gentlemen will take the pains to refer to the Irish Church Temporalities Act of 1833, they will find that my third Resolution is little more than a copy of words there used; but on account of my determination to proceed in the most scrupulous and respectful manner, it is not simply a copy, but an expansion of the words contained in that Act, and which recite the surrender by the Crown of its interest and patronage as being the ground on which Parliament proceeded to enact the suppression of several bishoprics. Therefore, admiring as I do the salutary rule and practice of this House—to decline entertaining Bills affecting even to the extent of a hairbreadth, the interest and Prerogatives of the Crown, without the Crown's consent;

Mr. Gladstone

I, on that account, proposed a Resolution, which forms, as I conceive, the only manner in which I, as a Member of the House, could constitutionally signify my respect for the Crown, and which invites the House to address the Crown to give that consent, without which we do not and cannot, under our salutary rules, act in our legislative capacity in matters affecting the Crown's interest and Prerogatives. The third Resolution is simply a preliminary to the introduction of a Bill, and nothing else in the world except such preliminary. A complaint was made by the Secretary of State which surprised me; for he said I had not stated what would be the legal condition, except as to property, of the Irish Church, if the plan I propose were adopted. I certainly did say, in terms the most definite that I could use, that the Established Church of Ireland was to be placed in a state of freedom as entire and absolute for the regulation of its own religious concerns as any Dissenting body. I hope that that explanation is satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman, who, not having heard any observations on that point, gave vent to his imagination, and supposing that something of the kind was meant, called attention to the horrible consequences which would follow such a state of freedom. "What a state of things will follow," said he, if there be no Royal supremacy, no jurisdiction of the Crown or of the Courts, these people will actually, if they think fit, alter their own articles of belief." But that was not all, and I call the particular attention of the House to what follows, because I think it is one of the most striking parts of the whole debate. My right hon. Friend said that if the people of England, now members of the Established Church, and under the coercion of the State, could only get sight of the Irishmen altering their articles of belief, the desire to do the same would become so violently infectious that all the members of the English Church would be crying out to be disestablished that they might follow the example of the Irish Church. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE was understood to dissent from this.] My right hon. Friend at least said that enough of them would follow the example to cause the ruin and fall of the Established Church in England. The ancient poets have represented that when the followers of the god Bacchus, in a state of violent excitement, went dancing into a country, the whole of the population were invariably smitten with the contagion, and began dancing too. Now, it appears that my right hon. Friend is afraid that all the Irish Churchmen will immediately begin to cut their capers by making new Church constitutions; and so delightful will this process be found that the English people, with all the substantial advantages of Establishment, will not be able to resist the soft infection, and in this way it appears my Motion is to lead to the downfall of the English Establishment. I think that argument of my right hon. Friend sufficiently answers itself. I am bound to say that I think the Irish Protestant Churchmen have been exceedingly ill-used in this debate, and, worst of all, they have been most ill-used by their friends. The noble Lord who spoke last night (Lord Claud John Hamilton) said the Protestants of Ireland were now loyal, but if their Church were disestablished there was no saying what they might do. Their loyalty, then, is a conditional loyalty, dependent on possession of special and exclusive privileges. That is the loyalty of the Irish Protestants, as described not by me but by their friends; but, Sir, I must not say all their Friends, for I feel bound to make an exception in favour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Attorney General for Ireland), who asserted the direct contrary, and said the loyalty of the Protestants would continue, no matter what befell. Perhaps we may take this as a sign that the contagion imagined by the right hon. Baronet is not as catching as he supposed. Still, we are told by some of the Friends of Irish Protestants that if they are put on an equality with their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen in matters of religion we are not to count on their loyalty. My answer to that allegation, argument, imputation, calumny, or call it what you like, is simply this: I do not believe it, I am bound not to believe it—courtesy permits and justice compels me to state with plainness my utter disbelief in it. Sir, the true answer to these apprehensions of my right hon. Friend is this—that there are in the world, known to history, known to experience, known to every man of common sense, plenty of those bodies who have undergone the process of disestablishment. There are the Episcopalians in Scotland, there are the Episcopalians in America, there are the Episcopalians in all, or nearly all, our colonies, who, strange to say, have gone through all these horrors which are described to us in such lively terms. “Disestablishment! a portentous word, describing a thing still more portentous!” says the right hon. Gentleman. Yes; and what is he doing in Jamaica? Why, his Government is under a pledge at this moment to introduce a Bill to Parliament for the purpose of disestablishing, as far as depends on the Imperial Parliament, the Church now established in Jamaica. Such disestablished bodies not only now exist, but they exist in comfort, they exist in prosperity; they pursue their way calmly and peaceably; they meet their religious controversies and difficulties not as well as we do, for the right hon. Gentleman, in the last flight of his imagination, has given us one of the most doleful descriptions of the Church of England which I ever heard in all my life, with his “combination between High Church Ritualists and Roman Catholics.” I here will say that I must retort on the right hon. Gentleman the charge that our arguments and our statements are dangerous to the Church of England; for if the result of the Establishment of the Church of England is that she is at this moment in the position which he pictured in that last most highly-coloured passage of his speech, I must say, I think, that a stronger argument for her disestablishing and for sending her forth into the free air of the wilderness of voluntarism cannot possibly be conceived. It is the Government, therefore, who, by their arguments, are throwing doubts on the principle of religious Establishments. Then, the right hon. Gentleman says that there is no crisis at all in Ireland; that there is nothing at all to warrant special action at this time; and, by the way, there is one doctrine of his which, although it touches history, I cannot pass by without notice, and that is his doctrine of fundamental laws. He says that when an alteration of a fundamental law is submitted to Parliament, then it is necessary that it should first go to the people—that is to say, that there should be a dissolution—in order that a new Parliament may be elected with the subject of that fundamental law in its view. Well, I believe, Sir, that the fashionable phrase to describe the party of the right hon. Gentleman, who, a few years ago, were Protectionists, who since then have been Conservatives, who, during our first Reform Bill, were Tories, and who, last year, were, I think, neither Tories, Protectionists, nor Conservatives—I believe that the fashionable name for them this year is “Consti-

nationalists," and it is under that name the right hon. Gentleman produces this most extraordinary doctrine. I recommend the right hon. Gentleman, in his Irish studies, to read the debates on the Act of Union with Ireland, and he will find that Mr. Sheridan vehemently opposed the Act of Union, and set up this doctrine: he said, "You have no right in entering into Union with another country to alter the fundamental laws;" and he got a pretty good beating down from Mr. Pitt. I wish it were in my power, but the lateness of the hour prevents me, to exhibit in its true colours the ultra-democratic—the more so than democratic—the anarchical nature of the doctrine. The First Minister of the Crown asserts that subjects of secondary magnitude may be dealt with by Parliament, but that when there is any subject which touches the fundamental laws, then it is their duty to go back to the people before they have the moral authority to deal with it. I do not think it necessary to dwell upon that statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I was sorry to hear it once in the speech of a Prime Minister—twice, I am sure, it will never be. [Mr. ISAAC: I said it before.] Yes; but I did not the opportunity of following the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, because, unfortunately, he followed me, or would have done the very limited justice of his opinion which I have now endeavoured to do. The right hon. Gentleman says that there is nothing distinct in the present political condition of Ireland at the present moment in a sense and of a nature to justify the Motion which I have made. When I presented to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, and to the mind of the House, that aggregate and combination of circumstances which, taken altogether, constituted the political situation of Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman pursued the process of pulling them asunder, and then arguing from each singly that it does not constitute a crisis, leaving it to be inferred that nothing in the nature of a crisis can result from their combination. He says, with regard to Fenianism, "Why, did you not deal with this crisis in 1866, when you were in the Government?" That reminds me that the right hon. Gentleman has been so liberal to me in the historical notice which he has given the House of my life. He stated, not very long ago, that for a quarter of a century during which I had been in power, and in power for the purpose of dealing with the Church in Ireland,

Mr. Gladstone

I did nothing towards that object. Well, for nine years out of the last twenty-three, I held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and during one only of those nine years—namely, in 1866, I had the responsibility of being the Leader of this House. The right hon. Gentleman says, "Why did you not deal with the Irish Church in 1866, when you asked for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act?" My answer is, "For a perfectly plain and simple reason." In the first place, circumstances were not ripe then as they are now. [Ironical cheers from the Ministerial Benches.] Circumstances, I repeat, were not ripe, in so far as we did not then know so much as we know now with respect to the intensity of Fenianism. Nor was there any Member of that Government who would have been for one moment justified in giving the official account of Fenianism which has been given within the hearing of us all during the last few weeks by the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland. But while that was the first reason, it was not our only reason. A second was, that we were occupied with the Reform Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] I say it was totally impossible for us, situated as we were in respect to Reform of the Constitution of Parliament, to apply ourselves to a consideration of the Irish Church. And not only was it totally impossible, but it would have been an insult to the common sense of the noble Lord, who seems to jeer at that statement, if we had requested him, even with his great capacity of mind, to apply himself at the same time to the question of Reform and to that of the Irish Church. The situation of Ireland is this. We have had the guarantees for personal liberty suspended for three years; and the country is in the occupation of an army and of a police organized as an army with reference to that suspension. Now, that is a state of things which, in itself constitutes and proves the existence of this critical condition. It is a state of things which, as I have heard said, is next to war; and in which the enormous power of this country keeps down and suppresses the elements of disaffection. What those elements are I take from the statement of the Minister of the Crown who represents the Irish Department. I have not added one syllable to them; I have not sought to colour them. But if the power from without keeps down the principle of disaffection, sedition, and disloyalty in Ireland, I want to know whether that is a condition in which it is safe for this country to continue? The right hon. Gentleman says, "Oh, but their material condition is improved." Certainly, their material condition is improved; and it is the very fact that, while their material condition has improved to such a degree that it can be perceived—I do not say to a great degree, but to a sensible degree—the political disaffection which lies beneath has become more deeply rooted and more widely extended among the classes described by the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland; it is this very fact, I say, which makes the picture of Ireland so formidable, and which imposes upon Parliament the duty of no longer flinching from looking the circumstances in the face, and meeting them. When we examine the condition of Ireland, what do we see? We see the religionists of the country divided into three classes. There are the ministers of the Established Church, who have, not for their fault but their misfortune, much pay and little work; there are the ministers of the Presbyterians, who have little pay and much work; there are, lastly, the ministers of the Roman Catholics, and of the minor Protestant sects, who stand in precisely the same category, and these have no pay at all and much work. That is the religious condition of Ireland. Is that a satisfactory state of things? Are we prepared to take the political chances of the future with that state of things staring us in the face? Of course, if a Gentleman has a conscientious belief that the maintenance of a certain Church Establishment is, under all circumstances, an unconditional matter of duty, to him I do not address myself. But that is not the belief of the great majority of the House. The great majority of the House believe, I apprehend, that the connection of the State with religion is necessarily modified by the varying condition of men's minds from time to time and from age to age, both as regards the advantage of the connection, and likewise as regards the divisions of religious belief. And it is, in my opinion, impossible to justify the maintenance of an Establishment which we have ceased to maintain as the exclusive representative of religion, and which we maintain now, I fear, on the far narrower ground of a kind of traditional monopoly that never can be understood, and that always will be resented by the people of Ireland. Well, Sir, I want to know how the Government propose to meet this serious wrong, as I am sure the large majority of the House believe it to be. The right hon. Gentleman wished for a clear and intelligible issue. Now, I will first take the side of the picture presented to us by the right hon. Gentleman, before showing the reverse of the picture. The right hon. Gentleman terrifies us by pointing out that if we disestablish the Church in Ireland we shall dissociate the State from the principle of religion, and lead to disestablishment in Scotland, in Wales—as he assures us on the authority of Mr. Owen Williams—and lastly in England. Now, there is no concealment about our intention. We do propose to sever the Establishment from the State; but if I am asked whether we shall thereby sever the principle of religion from the State, my answer is, that when you have a state of things such as that existing in Ireland, an Establishment cannot be maintained without a violation of what the bulk of the people believe to be the principles of civil justice, and that in that case the extinction of the Establishment and not its extension is the way to give a true religious character to a country. The right hon. Gentleman threatens us with the progress of this devastating principle in other countries, but my answer is that we must judge the case of each country upon its own merits. We do not say—and I certainly do not think—that the cases mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman are in substance analogous to the case of the Irish Church. No argument from a country where the maintenance of an Establishment seems to be just can for a moment avail to warrant it in a country where it is unjust; and I believe the worst enemy of the Church of England, or of the Church of Scotland, or of the Church in Wales, could not suggest a course more detrimental to the interests of those Establishments than the line of argument taken by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, who really seem prepared, if the Irish Church is disestablished, forthwith to lead an attack against Established Churches elsewhere. Such is my answer, and I hope it is a clear one to the objections of the right hon. Gentleman. I now proceed to ask what, in the face of this state of things, is the position of Her Majesty's Government? And this is open to manifold constructions; for, judging from the speeches of Gentlemen opposite, there is an appearance of considerable discrepancy. Let me first, however, refer to what the right hon. Gentleman the Secre-

ry of State for the Home Department called a letter of mine, which he was pleased to read. Sir, I have done my best to obtain the original of that letter from which the right hon. Gentleman read the extract. The editor of the newspaper (The Morning Herald) to whom it was addressed has, in a most courteous manner, done what he could; but I am sorry to state that he has not yet been able to send me the letter. All I can now say is, that it does appear to me to have been rash of the right hon. Gentleman to trust himself to found a Parliamentary attack on a few lines extracted from a letter, he himself never having seen that letter, and having no opportunity of judging of the rest of its contents. As to the matter of the letter, I will simply say that the portion of it which refers to the Act of Union has reference also to an idea which I did entertain at the time it was written, and only abandoned with reluctance. It was not the idea which hon. Gentlemen opposite suppose. Those hon. Gentlemen—if they will forgive me the expression—appear to be under a gross delusion as to the Act of Union. They always talk of it as if it ascribed to the Irish Church the possession of property; but there is not a syllable about property in the Act of Union. I had it in my mind—I am not ashamed to confess it—the last fragment of the Irish Church which I was inclined to preserve. Notwithstanding the sneer pronounced by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) on ecclesiastical Establishments—and I think there was truth in it—I am not ashamed to avow that I regretted the diminution of the House of Lords of the number of those who were there by merit—some of my friends now near me know that such was my feeling—and I did think it would be desirable to keep in that House a certain number of the Irish Bishops. If asked when the Irish question would assume the importance it has now assumed, I would have said, perhaps not for five, perhaps not for ten years. Therefore, though this question had not then entered the domain of politics, I thought it my duty to give notice to my constituents of my feeling on the matter. Was the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary prepared to give notice in 1865 of his sentiments on another subject? [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY made some observation across the table which was inaudible in the Gallery.] The right hon. Gentleman says he has been elected since. That is perfectly true, and let him take the benefit of it. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY made another observation, which also was inaudible in the Gallery.] That is a matter which I think would admit of some little discussion; but if he says that he thinks he could have been elected for the University of Oxford in 1865 as the advocate of household suffrage, with my knowledge of that constituency during a period of sixteen years, I must say that such a supposition is contrary to my experience. The right hon. Gentleman says that it is the glory and the privilege of the State to maintain the light of the Reformation in Ireland. That sounds all very fine, but that is not the only glory and privilege of the State, because we are paying some £30,000 a year for the maintenance of Maynooth College, whence something like 100 priests are sent forth annually to teach the people that the Reformation is no glory and no light, but that all the glory and the light are in the Roman fold and the Roman pastor. The anxiety of the right hon. Gentleman to maintain this glory and privilege of exhibiting the light of the Reformation is not in the slightest degree incompatible with his seeking another glory and privilege in 1868 by proposing to endow from the purse of the people of this country a Roman Catholic University in Ireland. There are considerable deductions from that kind of glory and privilege which the right hon. Gentleman has described. However, glory and privilege is the motto of the right hon. Gentleman; but what is the motto of the Prime Minister? I must refer to that which was pointedly brought into view by my right hon. Friend near me, the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), and which was, I will not say sedulously, but unfortunately and accidentally avoided by the Prime Minister in his speech. There is no injustice at all in referring to the speech of the Prime Minister in 1844, for the plain and simple reason that the right hon. Gentleman, I think with great courage, considering by whom he is surrounded, has distinctly stated twice over in 1868, in the midst of many apologetic expressions, that the sentiment of that speech was right. Now, what was the sentiment of that speech? I have read it lately, and have not forgotten it. Many hon. Members may have read it, but those who have not have a treat to enjoy. I speak seriously. The right hon. Gentleman disparaged the speech; but a more closely woven tissue of argument and observation has seldom been known in the debates of this House; and the right hon. Gentleman does not now shrink from the substance of it. I will not quote from the speech, but I will describe it in a single word. The whole of that speech referable to the Church of Ireland may be fairly summed up in the single word "Destruction." Now, I appeal to any man, and to any of the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman, if they have that speech in their memory, whether that is not a fair description of it. Here, then, are two undoubtedly important declarations separated by an immeasurable interval; but there is also a third. There was the declaration of the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he said in his official statement on behalf of the Government—

"There would not, I believe, be any objection to make all Churches equal; but the result must be secured by elevation and not by confiscation." Therefore, in the midst of glory and privilege, on the one side, and destruction on the other, there comes the equality of Churches by elevation. In my desire to contribute to this plain and intelligible issue, I should like to invite the attention of the House for a few moments to the meaning of that word "elevation." Then came the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, applying ice from Wenham Lake to the sentiments which, like lava from Vesuvius, flowed from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, surveyed us mortals from Epicurean heights, and described, with the most perfect absence of passion—I will not say of enthusiasm—the destinies, one more deplorable than the other, which might befall the Irish Church. Perhaps the noble Lord, when we come to discuss the first Resolution in Committee, will more fully develop his views. But there is a mode of harmonizing the three statements which have been made upon this question, though they are apparently remote from one another. The right hon. Gentleman is enigmatic; but, like the hieroglyphics and cuneiform inscriptions on ancient monuments, his meaning yields to faithful comparison and research. To-night the right hon. Gentleman discusses the principles on which the Irish Government has been carried on, and by which it appears he was about to obtain some astonishing result, if he had not been stopped by my Motion, and by a conspiracy, I think he made out, between the High Church Ritualists and the Pope.

The principle is this—to strengthen Protestants by doing justice to Roman Catholics. He quotes as an instance of his anxiety to assist in this work the passing of the Roman Catholic Oaths Bill in 1865. He did not prevent the passing of the Bill. No; and I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman in that year repented of what he had previously done. It was a tardy concession after long and repeated resistance by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends; and now, forsooth, they claim some special credit for the passing of a measure with regard to which all that can be said is that, at a given moment, they ceased to resist it. The right hon. Gentleman says that our measure is destructive, and that he wishes to create. Will the right hon. Gentleman allow us to translate into plain and simple language the whole of these dark and ambiguous declarations, in order that we may place the views of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government beside ours, and upon that juxtaposition we may raise the satisfactory issue so much desired? There was a principle which the right hon. Gentleman once called "the Pantheistic principle." In the speech in which that expression occurs the right hon. Gentleman said—

"You and your Erastian principles are crumbling into dust. Will you adopt the Pantheistic principle? I have unfaltering confidence in the stability of the Church; but the danger which threatens it is—What? Nonconformity? No. It is the connection between the Church and the State. This places it under the control of the House of Commons, which is not necessarily of the same communion. Leave the Church to itself, and it will shrink from no contest."

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"I believe the question to be, Will you sever the Church from the State, or will you endow the Roman Catholic Church? For my own part, I believe the Protestants of Ireland would say, 'Sever the connection between Church and State, and do not endow the Roman Catholics.'"

"Then we come," says the right hon. Gentleman, "to this further consideration—are we to recognize the Pantheistic principle?" It is fair to interpret a man's language by other language of his own, and what I understand the right hon. Gentleman to mean when he says he wants to create, and not to destroy, is that he wants Parliament to adopt the Pantheistic principle. That is a very hard word for some of our constituents; but its meaning is clear, beyond dispute. The intention and desire of the Government, including the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who stands up so strongly for the honor and privilege of defending the Church, to set up alongside of the Establishment her Established Churches — Presbyterians and Roman Catholics, and lesser bodies, all endowed out of the Consolidated Fund. That is the only intelligible policy which can ascribe to the Government, and I ask, Is the country prepared for such a policy? Something of this kind might have been done at the time of Mr. Pitt, or even at a later period. It was earnestly desired by the Liberal politicians of that day. But look at the singular fact that seems to cling to the party of the right hon. Gentleman—that they always endeavoured to adopt and wear the cast-off robes of the Liberal party. That which the Liberal party desired and strove for a generation ago, and that which they prevented that party from passing, they afterwards took up and strove for when it had been abandoned by the Liberal party and by the people. That policy of the Government is one that cannot and will not be adopted by the people of this country. It is detested in Scotland; it is not desired by England; it is repelled and rejected by Ireland. Were we to join him in giving effect to such a policy, the only result would be, that we, in common with them, should be involved in the shipwreck of the plan. The sentiments and convictions of the Three Kingdoms are so opposed to it that it is a vain scheme, to be entirely dismissed. This is the point at issue—that the Church in Ireland shall cease to exist as an Establishment, though with every softening measure that a due regard to proprietary and vested interests, and I would add even to feelings, can suggest. It is totally impossible to proceed only by way of internal reforms, which may diminish abuse, but will really increase the great abuse. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) spoke of the value of the clergy to Ireland as a resident gentry. But supposing that, such are the essentially false elements in the position of the Irish Church radically considered that efforts at reform will only deteriorate in one sense what they may mend in another. I recollect the solemn appeal made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, and I have not striven in any way to depreciate the gravity of the question. It is impossible that any person having official responsibility can take upon himself a greater charge than when he presumes to recommend to the House a change such as this. Will the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck)

and the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) allow me to offer them some apology for the conduct of the Liberal party on this question? They have hardly done justice to the Liberal Government and themselves, and those who have acted with them. The Liberal party did make one very limited, but very serious and earnest effort to deal with the Irish Church. It was on an exceedingly narrow issue—that of the Appropriation Clause; but narrow as it was it was too wide not merely for their Parliamentary interests, but for the then feeling of the country. Let us consider what happened from 1834 to 1838. They fought that question steadily. It is quite true that they put Sir Robert Peel out of Office because he would not adopt it; but it is not true that they dropped it in consequence of obtaining his place. The very first effect of their taking up that question was the secession of a powerful section of the Cabinet. Their opponents in this House, of whom I was one, were sustained by the House of Lords, and not only by the House of Lords, but by the constituencies. Therefore, in that they were fairly beaten, and, having been fairly beaten they are not justly to be blamed because they have not incessantly renewed the agitation of that question. But we agree that the memory of that defeat should make us cautious in again taking to so serious an engagement. I quite agree with my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Roebuck) that it is of vital importance that, entering into this matter, we should to the best of our power go through with it. I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India that the great question should not be huddled up into the form of an abstract Resolution; and if he and also my learned Friend reply to me as he may justly, that mere words are but light and trivial and may well beget suspicion rather than remove it, I point to the second and third Resolutions as unequivocal proofs and guarantees that as far as we are concerned, and so far as those with whom I have had the honour and privilege to communicate are concerned, it is our intention not to mock the people of Ireland with idle words, but, while avoiding any unreasonable demand on a Parliament which has but limited time at its disposal, we do ask from that Parliament so much at least of action as shall serve to show its sincerity by practical proof, by clearing the ground for decisive action in the next. That is my answer to my hon. and learned Friend in reply to a question which I admit to be just and warranted by the circumstances—an answer which I hope he will appreciate. I am myself jealous of all professions in this matter which cannot be accompanied by that which shall be a substantial earnest of my intentions. So viewing the proposal, so avowing that we think that the time has come for this great and beneficial change to be brought about in Ireland, we commend it most earnestly to the acceptance of this House, as a step that is alike needed for the honour of Parliament, for the satisfaction and contentment of Ireland; and even if Ireland were likely to be satisfied and contented without it yet required for the purpose of removing a stain from the name and good fame of the State, of the Law, and of the people of this country.

MR. NEWDEGATE stated that he should vote against going into Committee. He wished it to be understood that he would not consent to the transfer of any portion of the Church property for the benefit of any other religious body.

INDIA—IRRIGATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the very unsatisfactory manner in which certain joint-stock companies had, for the last eight years, performed the functions entrusted to them of supplying irrigation to public lands in India — from their own funds—so far as the pecuniary results of their operations had been communicated to Parliament. The Question he had to submit to the House was, Whether the Secretary of State for India ought to be permitted to advance to private adventurers enormous grants of public money for the prosecution of schemes which were hopelessly discountenanced by all financial societies and bankers? He thought he should be able to show in the two instances to which he would refer that, while schemes involving an outlay of something like £4,000,000 had been undertaken by private adventurers within the last few years, for their sole profit, these works had been aided by profuse grants of public money without any sufficient security for ultimate re-payment. This course had been pursued, too, at a time when the Financial Secretaries whom we had sent out to India during the last few years had been cudgelling their brains to devise new taxes to impose upon the people of India, and although the Governor General had protested in the most emphatic manner against those adventurers being assisted in enterprizes which created great complications, and embarrassed the general policy of the Government. The House would recollect that, at the commencement of the Session, he (Mr. Smollett) asked the Secretary of State for India whether he was a party to the offer to purchase the stock of a company called the East India Irrigation Company at par, with the full knowledge that that stock had for the last two years stood at 25 per cent discount, and had become almost unmarketable. The right hon. Baronet gave him an evasive answer, stating that an offer somewhat in the terms indicated had been made, but that he could not then tell precisely what it was. The right hon. Gentleman further said, upon that occasion, that the offer could not have been an exorbitant one, inasmuch as it had been declined. He (Mr. Smollett) demurred to the opinion that the offer could not have been exorbitant because it was declined. He admitted that the offer was refused; but why, he asked, was it refused? Because certain astute gentlemen in the City of London were prone to regard the Secretary of State as being made of very soft and squeezeable materials, when they found him offering a high price for stock which was practically unsaleable in the market. Those astute gentlemen were not deceived. The Answer of the right hon. Baronet was very evasive; because he forgot to mention the fact that he had been for two months negotiating a large loan of the public money to those adventurers. Now, as he was one of those who considered that to lend the public money to such persons was a much greater act of impropriety than if the Government had purchased the whole concern outright, he had felt constrained to bring the matter forward and, if he did not obtain a satisfactory explanation upon this matter, he was determined, if that moribund House would give him any support, to press the Motion he was about to make to a division. The principle of conceding to private adventurers the public duty of carrying out improvements on the lands of the Government in India was one which had only been admitted in recent times. About fourteen years ago, some unscrupulous adventurers at Bombay proposed to embark in works of this nature, but the Marquess of Dalhousie, the then Governor General of India, set his face against the project. Indeed it was the opinion of all practical men, excepting some scheming engineers, that concessions to private adventurers for the carrying out of works of this character were simply mischievous, and should always be discountenanced. No one had enunciated this proposition more forcibly or more frequently than Sir John Lawrence. If he (Mr. Smollett) were permitted to give his own opinion upon the matter, having had some experience of such works, he would say it was absolutely impossible for any company of adventurers of the City of London to carry on enterprizes of this character to a successful issue. The necessary arrangements which they involved could only be made by the Government establishments on the spot, acting under definite rules and definite powers. From his own experience of the country, he felt certain that it was impossible for any body of men in London to organize a collection of water-rates or water-cesses from 500,000 or 600,000 poor cultivators in India. That collection could only be made by a Government establishment armed with adequate authority. But he would not argue this point at length; for the experiment had been tried on a large scale, under the most favourable auspices, and it had proved a gigantic failure, and would, he believed, never be repeated. An impulse was given to the adventures of these joint-stock companies by the publication, in 1854, of a Madras blue book, purporting to be the Report of the Public Works Commissioners at Madras. That book was composed very much in the style of a romance, and in fact it was a romance. The Commissioners reported on all the irrigation works which the Madras Government had been engaged in during the previous twelve years, and asserted that, though some of them were failures, they had in the aggregate given an average return of 100 per cent from the date, not of their completion, but of their commencement. They selected for special laudation the prosperity of the irrigation works on the Godavery, and stated that, although they had cost £200,000, and took four years to construct, they had yielded a return of £300,000, in some mysterious manner, during the process of construction and before irrigation was applied to the soil, thus re-paying the cost of construction and placing £100,000 in the Government Exchequer. But the Commissioners went on to state of this work that if the Government only charged one-tenth of the value of the water it supplied for irrigation purposes, it would continue to receive a profit of £300,000 per annum, upon an outlay of something less than that sum; while the people whose lands were irrigated would be benefited to the extent of £3,320,000 per annum by the increased value of their produce. When calculations of this sort—calculations not merely of grandeur, but approaching to sublimity—were published by the Madras Government, it was not to be wondered at that the cupidity of certain gentlemen in London was excited, and that they should yearn to embark in enterprizes like those to which he had referred, which seemed to offer such stupendous returns from a comparatively insignificant outlay. But the Madras Government, he regretted to state, continued to publish the most deceitful statements of profits derived from irrigation works in India. He held in his hand a Return which had been placed on the table of the House at the instance of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith)—a Return of the Works of Irrigation executed in the Madras Provinces during recent years. It appeared, according to the statement contained therein, that the whole cost of one of these works was about £23,000, and that the Returns in the years of 1858-9, amounted to £159,000, being a net profit of 664 per cent, and in 1859-60, £175,000, or at the rate of 720 per cent per annum. Now, he (Mr. Smollett) took the trouble of sending to Madras to ascertain whether those Returns were true or false, and, in reply, he was furnished with official documents, informing him that they were entirely false and fallacious. Without pursuing this particular subject, the unravelling of which would consume much time, he should pass on to the consideration of those particular works which were the immediate objects of his Resolution. These schemes, although they were both under one management, coached by the same financier, yet, as the accounts were kept separate, he should treat them separately. The first of those works was the Madras Irrigation Works, which came into being in the following way:—At the end of the year 1858, a deputation of adventurers waited upon the then Secretary of State for India, at his office in Cannon Row; they brought a prospectus with them, which purported to show that the proposed works would yield at least 100 per cent per annum, and, that as the Government were then busily engaged in the effort to suppress the rebellion in India, and therefore could not turn their attention to the carrying out of those works, they were ready to invest £2,000,000 which they had at their command in their execution. This deputation represented that before spending so large a sum of money for such a purpose it would be absolutely necessary that they should obtain a concession from the Government, and a contract by which their rights would be defined. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), who was then Secretary of State for India, received that deputation of adventurers with great unction, and lent a willing ear to their proposals. Now, if Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to appoint him (Mr. Smollett) Secretary for India—and greater numskulls than he was had been appointed to that office—he would have treated that deputation in a very different way from that in which the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn had dealt with them. He would have told them that if their prospectus were true, and that by an outlay of £2,000,000, they would become the greatest millionaires in the City of London, he should require from them a very large bonus indeed for the concession which was to place them in that condition. On the other hand, he would have told them if their prospectus were false that the matter required the most mature con-

consideration of the speculators, and that this question should be well-considered before they again applied for assistance to the Government. That would have been business-like advice, but noble Lords and right hon. Baronets were not men of business. The noble Lord told them he was ready to use any influence he possessed to get them the concession, and under the auspices of the noble Lord this concession was granted gratuitously, and the required contract was entered into. According to the terms agreed upon, the Company were to enjoy this concession for a period of twenty-five years—to draw and enjoy all the profits of the works up to 25 per cent per annum. The Government were kindly permitted to enjoy any profits above that percentage, and to have the right of purchasing back the concession at the end of the twenty-five years by buying the whole capital stock of the Company at the average price at which the shares had stood for one year previous to the offer of the purchase. In addition, the Indian Government granted a supplemental concession, by which they had charged themselves with the payment of 5 per cent upon the first £1,000,000 spent on those works, and this was not to continue merely for a year or two, but was to be continued until the speculation yielded more than that amount. In May and June, 1859, Sir Charles Wood, who had succeeded the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, as Secretary of State for India, went even further than the noble Lord, for he offered, on the part of the Government, to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the first £1,000,000 proposed to be invested, not from the date of its being spent on the works, but from the date at which it was paid into the public Treasury. Although, up to that time the credit of the adventurers was below zero, yet as the credit of the Government stood high, the whole £1,000,000, or nearly so, was in a short period paid into the public Treasury, and the Company then broke ground in the district of Kurnool, in the Presidency of Madras. Amongst the first works executed was that of a stone weir across the river Toombodra. But it was found to be so faultily constructed that the Company were compelled to remove it. They made channels into which the water would not flow; because their engineer appeared to be ignorant of the fact that water would not run up a hill. No blunders of this sort were, however, allowed to transpire. On the contrary, it was stated from the very commencement that these works were proceeding in a most favourable manner. He (Mr. Smollett) had long taken a great interest in works of irrigation in India, and from the beginning he had not hesitated to express the opinion that those particular works would come to grief. He had believed that the project was a great swindle, and he now knew it. On the 22nd February, 1865, he asked Sir Charles Wood, the then Secretary of State for India, how the Company was progressing; and the reply he received was that the Company were carrying on their works prosperously, having expended about £700,000, and dug channels and irrigation works extending sixty or seventy miles. Sir Charles Wood added, however, that he regretted to state that as yet no profits had accrued—there never were any profits from this sort of works—but that he still had every expectation that the money advanced by the Government would be recovered, for he was credibly informed that there were 10,000 acres of land then under irrigation. In 1866 Sir Charles Wood was pitchforked into the House of Lords, and his mouth-piece in this House was the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) who was then Under Secretary for India. He (Mr. Smollett), put a number of questions to the Under Secretary upon the subject; but when a man had a very shaky case he was generally very taciturn in answering Questions; and the hon. Member for Halifax, who was a perfect master of fence, gave the shortest and most curt replies. On the 11th May, 1866, the hon. Gentleman stated that the works were going on successfully; that £200,000 had been advanced by Government in interest; that the total sum expended had been £1,214,000, but that there had been no profits. The 10,000 acres of land, of which so much had been said fifteen months before, had vanished. From the terms of this Answer he felt persuaded that something was in preparation, and he was not deceived; for, on the following day, a notice appeared in The Times' City article, that this prosperous Company had entirely collapsed. Astonished at the announcement, he asked the hon. Member on the 15th of May whether the statement was true, and he replied that it was perfectly true. The Company had announced that they were not prepared to advance the second £1,000,000, on the faith of which amount being forthcoming the Government had given the guarantee on the first £1,000,000, and that they could not sell a single share in the City. They, therefore, requested that they might be aided from the public purse to carry on their joint-stock speculation. The Secretary of State for India, finding himself in this unpleasant predicament did the best he could under the circumstances. He offered, in lieu of a guaranteed stock, to give the holders of this security £1,000,000 of Government paper, with 5 per cent interest, if the Company would hand over to the Government of India the works which nominally belonged to them, but which had really been executed with public money. But those crafty gentlemen declined to accept that offer. And why? Because the chairman, the directors, and the secretary were well-paid officers, and they knew they would have lost their salaries if they had assented to the transfer. They therefore declined to do anything of the kind, and again demanded to be subsidized with cash. The Secretary of State foolishly yielded to their demand, and the Under Secretary informed the House on the 15th May that a contract had been signed that afternoon before he came down to the House, by which the Government undertook to find £600,000 of the public money for the support of this private adventure, from which the shareholders were to derive 25 per cent profit, and the Government to get nothing. It was a very strange proceeding, to say the least of it. The money was to be advanced in the shape of debentures for five years, at 5 per cent interest, secured upon works which up to 1865 had not returned 1s. profit; which had yielded no receipts up to the present time, and which, from private accounts he had received from Madras, he believed never would return a profit. He would undertake to say that if the Secretary of State had advanced £600,000 on debentures to the London, Chatham, and Dover Company, financed by Peto, Betts, and Co., he would have made a better speculation than in advancing the money to the Madras Company. The reason the Secretary of State for India was able to do those things was because that House took no interest in the finances of India. Those things were done in secrecy and silence. This was a gross job. It was perpetrated on the very day the Question was to be put to the Secretary of State, and it was only known to the country when the jobbery was consummated. By the end of 1871 no less a sum of public money than £2,250,000 would have been advanced upon this private adventure. The Government had become responsible for £1,000,000 sterling. They were paying 5 per cent interest on this sum, which would amount to £600,000 at the end of 1871, and by that time they would have besides advanced £600,000 on debentures secured on works that do not yield 1s. profit. The Resolution he intended to propose would stigmatize that transaction. He would now turn to the East India Irrigation Works, the twin adventure with the Madras Works. The East India Irrigation Works were certainly in a better category than the Madras, because some effort was made to start it on the principle of a real and bona fide joint-stock company; 50,000 shares of £20 each were taken, making a paid-up capital of £1,000,000. Of that sum about £740,000 had been expended in works, and £150,000 had been spent out of capital to pay interest on advances for calls made to carry on the works. It was, however, unguaranteed; and unguaranteed works had always a shady look on the Stock Exchange. Monied men disliked amazingly enterprizes which it was said would yield 100 per cent per annum, and consequently the stock had always been at a small discount. The discredit of the stock gradually increased till 1866, when it reached 25 per cent, at which price he believed it was in the market in May, 1866. On the 15th May—the funds of the Company exhausted and its credit shattered—he (Mr. Smollett) enquired of the Under Secretary of State what arrangement he proposed to make with the adventurers? In reply, the hon. Member for Halifax explicitly stated that there was not the smallest intention on the part of the Secretary of State either to purchase the works or to supplement the Company with Government money, and for the obvious reason that it was an unguaranteed company. From the terms of that Answer he believed that the Company would be left to stand or fall according to its own resources, or he should have brought the matter before the House, but he was deluded and befooled. Twelve months after there was a new Government, and a new Secretary of State for India came into office, who was as unscrupulous in dealing with the finances of India as his predecessor. He (Mr. Smollett) found that an offer was made by the Government to purchase the works; not at the price they bore in the market, but at 25 per cent above it, and when that was not accepted, a negotiation was entered into for granting a sum of money to this Company, in the same manner that was adopted in the case of the Madras Company. The offer was made in this way. It appeared that on the 16th of May, 1867, the Governor General wrote from Simla a despatch, which was signed by every member of his Government. In that despatch Sir John Lawrence stated that he had never concealed the fact that he looked on concessions granted to private parties for irrigation purposes as mischievous; that they gave rise to the greatest complications. Unless the Government had an absolute control, it was impossible to carry on the works. He had supplied the Company, he said, with upwards of £100,000, otherwise the works would have come to a perfect standstill, and the establishments have been dispersed over the country. The time, Sir John Lawrence said, had arrived when something should be done in the matter; and as the Company was in a state of utter ruin, having no credit in India or England, he thought the opportunity was favourable for the Government to propose mutually advantageous terms with them. Sir John Lawrence's proposition was that the Secretary of State should endeavour to purchase the stock at par, and give the directors £50,000 by way of bonus, to enable them to wind up creditably. That, in his opinion, was a munificent offer. It was, in fact, an offer to put £250,000 into the pockets of the shareholders, with £50,000 more if they accepted the offer. The letter containing the proposal came to the India Office towards the close of last year, and he would do the Secretary for India the justice to say that he appeared to have acted with a great deal of forethought and honour in that particular instance. The right hon. Baronet kept the despatch a profound secret, thus preventing the jobbing which might have occurred on the Stock Exchange (at that time the stock was at 25 per cent discount), and he only communicated the offer to the public through the medium of The Times newspaper on the 18th or 19th of November. The effect was electric. The stock immediately jumped up to par, which was tantamount to putting £250,000 into the pockets of these adventurers. Surely the munificent offer of the Government ought to have been accepted with gratitude, and accepted as it would have been, if the right hon. Baronet the

Secretary of State for India had had the courage of a mouse, and had declined to enter into negotiations with these adventurers—if he had told them, “This is our offer; it is the only one we will make, so you may make up your mind.” Had he done this, they would have accepted the offer. But Parliament was sitting at the time, and the right hon. Baronet entered, unfortunately, into negotiations with the directors. Public and private interests were brought to bear upon the right hon. Baronet, and no doubt a great deal of “lobbying” went on. Afterwards the right hon. Baronet was induced to give way and to offer other terms which he will possibly explain to the House—terms which the Company consider more advantageous to their interests than an absolute purchase. Independently of any public or private pressure, letters were inserted in the public prints setting forth the claims of the Company to compensation. On the 13th of January a letter appeared in The Times, from the practised pen of a gentleman who was supposed to exercise a great deal of influence in Indian matters, and who was known in Manchester as a great authority upon all matters connected with irrigation and the spending of money—he meant General Sir Arthur Cotton. That letter was written in a tone of arrogance which deserved exposure; and he would endeavour to expose it. The munificent offer of the Government was actually denounced by General Cotton as a conspiracy to defraud the noble band of adventurers of the profits to which they were legitimately entitled—as a plot, boldly contrived to drive away all interlopers from India, and to reverse the policy inaugurated by Lord Canning. Now, who was the arch plotter; who the base conspirator?—why, the Governor General of India, a man whom Sir Arthur Cotton spoke of with scorn, describing him as the last possible Viceroy of the “Old Indian School.” Sir Arthur Cotton proceeded to assail the Indian Secretary and his Council in similar terms of abuse; he spoke of them as worn-out and contemptible functionaries, whose existence could not be prolonged beyond the present spring; men who must be forcibly removed and their places filled by gentlemen whom he almost designated gentlemen of the “Young Indian School,” men who looked up to Sir Arthur as “their guide, philosopher, and friend.” God protect an office filled with pupils of Sir Arthur Cotton! And why was all this vituperation levelled at Sir John Lawrence? Simply because that high functionary had made a suggestion which had had the effect of putting £250,000 into the hands of the shareholders. This was the head and front of his offending. But Sir Arthur knew well the faint-heartedness of the Home Government of India. The gentlemen of the India Office quailed under his castigation. They kissed the rod he had applied so mercilessly to their posteriors, and they gave these adventurers better terms than the Governor General had proposed. Acts of such great impropriety and injustice ought not to be tolerated. He had shown that works that were brought forward as calculated to pay cent per cent had not yielded anything for the last five or six or seven years, and that they were brought forward in the first instance under false pretences. He had also shown, in the course of his speech, that the first works, which were declared to be works brought forward by private enterprise, had cost the Government £2,250,000, for which they had no security but the works themselves, which were either valueless or were works from which, if they should ever prove remunerative, the private adventurers would receive dividends at the rate of 25 per cent, while they had been constructed without the expenditure of a shilling raised at the risk of the speculators. With reference to the East India Irrigation Works the offer to purchase stock at par had never been withdrawn; and probably, at no distant day the Government would take the works at that or at a larger price. He thought these were acts of great impropriety, and therefore he should move the following Resolution—not an abstract one, but one which went direct to the point:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the advance of £600,000 of public money on loan to a private company of adventurers styling themselves the Madras Irrigation Company, granted on the 15th day of May 1866 for their sole benefit, and likewise the offer of a large loan on similar terms announced by the Secretary of State on the 20th day of February last as contemplated to be given to the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, are acts of impropriety, are mischievous in policy, and should be discontinued.”

He offered that Resolution, not in the spirit of party or of faction, but in the interest of honesty and straightforward dealing, of which he saw very little in the conduct of these adventurers. He offered it also to protect the just power of the Governor General of India, whose suggestions and recommendations had been set aside to suit the private policy of these people; and he proposed it in the true interests of the India Office, which was surrounded by jobbers, from whom the Council of the Secretary of State were unable to free themselves, and whose importunities they could not resist.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, the advance of £600,000 of public money on loan to a private company of adventurers styling themselves the Madras Irrigation Company, granted on the 15th day of May 1866 for their sole benefit, and likewise the offer of a large loan on similar terms announced by the Secretary of State on the 20th day of February last as contemplated to be given to the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, are acts of impropriety, are mischievous in policy, and should be discontinued,”—(Mr. Smollett),

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he regretted that the hon. Member had changed the terms of the Resolution he had placed on the Paper. He regretted that the hon. Member had done so without giving notice of his intention to call attention in such a specific manner to the transaction which he had in the first instance referred to—namely, the loan of £600,000 to the Madras Irrigation Company. He regretted it the more because the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was not in the House, and he had some reason to believe that that hon. Gentleman was under the impression that this particular transaction was not to be called in question.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he had acquainted the hon. Member for Halifax with his intention of bringing in the matter under the notice of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that if that were so it was not his hon. Friend's fault that the hon. Member for Halifax was absent. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) could only say that he was less able to give an explanation of the transaction than the hon. Member for Halifax, under whose authority and that of Earl De Grey and Ripon the loan was made; but he believed that the circumstances were substantially as follows:—The Madras Irrigation Company was originally established as a company guaranteed by the Government. It was formed for the purpose of undertaking a work of very great importance to the interests of India, and the House should bear in mind that the work performed by these Irrigation Companies ought to be measured, not by the amount of the return they immediately produce, but by the amount of the benefit they confer on India by the accomplishment of works of an important kind for the improvement of agriculture and the better sustentation of the people. That was a point which the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) had too much overlooked. Now, looking at the matter from this point of view, it was not so necessary for the Government to ask whether this or that work would be immediately remunerative, as it was to ask whether it was a work which it would be desirable to encourage, for the general interests of the country committed to their care. There could be no doubt that it would have been well worth the while of the Indian Government to incur considerable loss in the direct pecuniary expenditure, for the sake of accomplishing great works which would be advantageous to the country. No one, for instance, would have found fault if the Government of India had undertaken to construct canals and irrigation works out of the public money, in the same way that they had constructed roads, for the general benefit of the country; and no one could doubt that those works would, in the long run, be extremely remunerative to the Government and to the people of India, though it was quite possible they might not realize the sanguine expectations of those who undertook them. He supposed, however, that the House had no desire to enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of works of irrigation; for he believed all who had paid attention to the subject concurred in admitting the advantages arising from them. The only question for consideration, therefore, was the best means of carrying out such works. As the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) had truly remarked, this Company was established in 1858, under the auspices of his noble Friend the then Secretary of State for India; but he believed that, in point of fact, the system dated from a somewhat earlier period, and that it was under the old Court of Directors that the first Resolution was passed to the effect that works of this kind might be entrusted to a private company. As the House was aware, the finances of India were frequently overburdened by the claims upon them, and great difficulty was experienced in finding money out of the taxation of the country for carrying on works which were not likely to be immediately remunerative; and it was felt that, if irrigation was to be carried on on a really satisfactory footing, it would be desirable to introduce private capital and private enterprise into India, for the purpose of executing works, which would certainly be advantageous to the people, and which might be profitable to the individuals who undertook them. This Company was therefore formed by gentlemen who looked, no doubt, to a large remuneration from the capital they were about to expend, but who, he thought, had also other and higher objects, as they believed they were undertaking a work which would tend to the advantage of a most important portion of the population of India. They advanced a sort of moral claim on the Government for such assistance as the Government could give them. They asked for a concession and for a guarantee. It was not his present duty to discuss whether the Government were right in giving them that support or not. Under all the circumstances, he hardly ought to say that the Government were wrong, though he confessed that his own opinion, formed on a good deal of experience during the last few years, was decidedly against the system of granting guarantees. Under such a system, if the works turn out very profitable, the company have all the advantage; while, on the other hand, if they prove unprofitable, the Government have to bear the loss. That was the rationale of the system of guarantees, which he should be glad to see either restricted or abolished. When, however, this question was brought forward in 1858, experience had not been acquired in respect to the guarantee system, and the Government had then to consider the mode in which they could best facilitate the object of bringing private capital and enterprise into India. They were told that if they gave a guarantee it was probable that the works would prove so profitable that other companies would follow the example of this, and would, without guarantee, bring private money into India and be able to execute these great works of irrigation. In this respect he believed the scheme was not unsuccessful, for it was in consequence of this Company having begun to work, and having at first held out encouragement to the public, that the se-

second undertaking referred to by the hon. Gentleman was set on foot without any guarantee. And certainly we owed to the gentlemen who took part in the formation and promotion of the twin Companies a debt of gratitude for the exertions they made in raising a sum approaching £1,000,000 of capital without any guarantee on the part of the State. We are also bound to acknowledge our obligations to them for the character of the work they had accomplished in Orissa, and, he believed, in the Madras Presidency; for the two Companies were, in fact, one, although it had two distinct and unconnected undertakings. After the Company had commenced their works and carried them on to a certain point, they made the unfortunate discovery that they had not capital enough to carry them on further in a proper manner, whereupon they asked Lord Halifax (then Sir Charles Wood) for assistance; but he declined to sanction an alteration which they wished to introduce into the terms of the guarantee. Subsequently, however, Lord De Grey and Ripon consented to advance them a loan on the security of their works, which were admitted to be good and well-executed works as far as they went. In taking the works as a security the Government were of opinion that they were making a very good bargain. Indeed, if the Government had not done so they would have been placed in a position of great difficulty. They had undertaken to guarantee the Company, and were paying interest; and the question was whether they were to be relieved from the payment of that interest. It was clear that the Government could not be relieved till the Company made profits; and it was made clear to Lord De Grey that the Company would not make any profits without further assistance from the State. Lord De Grey therefore thought it was for the interest of the Government that he should advance the loan. On this point, however, the hon. Member for Halifax would be better able than he to give an explanation. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) believed Lord de Grey had exercised a sound discretion; and he felt sure the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire did not mean to impute anything like jobbing or improper conduct to his Lordship or to the hon. Member for Halifax. With regard to the other undertaking, and the transaction in which he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had been himself engaged, it was of course due to the House, after the statement of the hon. Gentleman, that he should offer an explanation. The second undertaking was divisible into two. There was an undertaking by the Company, called the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, to irrigate a portion of Orissa, and there was the further undertaking to irrigate a portion of Behar. Now, the hon. Gentleman had lost sight of an important element in one part of the transactions—namely, the concessions made to this Company with regard to the irrigation at Behar. While objecting upon principle to Government guarantees generally, he particularly objected to guarantees in the matter of irrigation works; because, by allowing a company to undertake them, Government exposed itself to difficulty and embarrassment, and it was the duty of Government to keep them in its own hands. Otherwise, difficult questions bearing upon the land revenue, the condition of districts irrigated, and the relations between ryots and landowners and between landowners and the Government, were infinitely complicated by the obligation of Government towards an irrigation company. Any one who would follow up the matter would see that it was almost impossible satisfactorily to work a system of irrigation in a large district—especially in one in which there was no permanent settlement of the revenue—by means of a company. The questions raised, such as who was to have the control of the water, what was to be the price fixed, and what were to be the stipulations with the Zemindars as to the alteration of the assessment, were in themselves so difficult and involved such delicate considerations, that it almost amounted to a dereliction of duty on the part of Government to give up the control of an irrigation system to a company, and particularly to a guaranteed company. He meant no disrespect to the Company in question by expressing these views; and his great regret that that Company had obtained the concessions and the position it had obtained in Orissa and in Behar, and more particularly in Behar, because the Company had the exclusive right to irrigate a very important district, and they had not the means of doing it. They simply kept others out, and prevented the Government from undertaking the works. The Company, having obtained its concession, laid out a large sum in works which had been warmly approved by the authorities and by the independent investigators of the Orissa famine, which was, no doubt, locally mitigated by the works, while the Company's officers behaved with great berality and did much to alleviate distress. These facts, and the necessity of finding some employment for the people of Orissa, at the time of their suffering, were the occasion of the advances to which the hon. Member referred. Having been told in the House that the Company was not to be assisted, the hon. Member seemed to think he had been deceived by the Secretary of State, and his council; and he seemed to think that that was owing to some proceedings on his Sir (Stafford Northcote's) part, but the advances were made by the Governor General in India without consulting the Secretary of State, and it seemed to him that they were rightly made, seeing that there was a means of profitably expending the money. If employment had not been provided in this way it must have been done by setting the poor to dig holes one day, and fill them up the next. It appeared to him that having the machinery ready to hand for the profitable expenditure of money the Government were quite right in so laying it out. Accordingly, about £120,000 was advanced on the understanding to which he had referred. When the Company were asked to undertake the work they said they were ready enough to spend the money, but they did not wish to make the additional outlay on their own account. They, in fact, found that their water was not taken so rapidly as they expected, and that their works were not producing a profit; and therefore it was not in their power, in the present state of the money market, to go on with their works. They, therefore, proposed to lie on their oars, and wait till the works which they had executed began to be profitable, when the public would come forward and provide the funds necessary to complete the works. The Government said that might be perfectly legitimate on the part of a company, but it did not at that time meet the wishes of the Government, who could not wait; and it was under these circumstances, and looking to the circumstances he had mentioned, that the Governor General wrote the despatch the hon. Member had referred to. This brought up the history to the point at which it became the duty of the Secretary of State in Council to act. The Governor General had written an elaborate despatch, pointing out that the Company had failed to realize the great profits they had looked forward to, referring to the complications that had arisen between the Company and the Government, and proposing to buy up the interests of the Company, not at par, but

in 5 per cent stock, which was then at 110, terms which would have been the means of increasing the value of the Company's stock considerably more than the 25 per cent which the hon. Member had spoken of. That despatch came into his (Sir Stafford Northcote's) hands, and the Council decided that it would be right to offer to purchase the Company's works; but that conclusion was not come to without much hesitation, and after full consideration of all the circumstances he had stated. The Government felt that it was important for India that these works should be carried on, though the Company had not the means of carrying them on with activity and success; and her Majesty's Government resolved not to entertain the question of a guarantee. There was such great force in the argument of the Governor General, as it related to the works that were not completed in Behar, that they would have been prepared to offer almost any terms to get them into the hands of the Government; but with regard to Orissa it was of less importance to the Government to purchase the Company's rights because a considerable amount of work had been actually executed. On careful consideration of the whole question, they came to the conclusion that the terms proposed by the Governor General were excessive. The hon. Member had said that the Secretary for State was—he would not repeat the elegant expression of the hon. Member—but he was weak, and his council was at the mercy of jobbers and speculators, and that they had made an extravagant and improvident bargain. But looking to the Correspondence, which was in the hands of the public, he could see no evidence whatever to support such a charge. The Governor General proposed the purchase on certain terms. The Government determined not to offer those terms but lower terms. They said, "We will give you the amount which you have expended, and £50,000 over." It was said that the stock of the Company was at a large discount, and that those terms were therefore unreasonably high. But it should be borne in mind that the Company had bonâ fide raised this money, that they had expended it in good work, and that, though it was not now profitable, the Government had reason to believe that when the system was completed it would become profitable. They, therefore, thought it fair to give back to the Company the whole amount they had expended, with a certain sum over and above to compensate them for any inconvenience which might result from parting with a portion of their establishment, and in consideration of any just claims they might have arising from the expectation of future profit. There was no doubt that, as far as they had gone, the Company had done a good work for India; though whether they had done a good work for themselves was another question, into which he would not enter. Having made this as a final offer, after full consideration, the Government thought it right to make known on the same day, through the public Press, before even the directors had received the official communication, the nature of the offer that was made. The effect was that the shares, which had been at a discount, rose to par; but he was told that this was nothing more than a nominal quotation, and that, pending the proceedings, little or no business was done. It had been stated that the offer of the Government was not favourably received by the Company. He did not know whether it had been refused or not; but he had heard that the offer was received at the meeting of shareholders as not only unsatisfactory but insulting. Indeed, quite as strong language as had been applied to him by the hon. Member (Mr. Smollett) had been applied to him by the shareholders. He had received letters from various persons, in which he was accused of a desire to "rob" the shareholders; and he did not know what motives had not been imputed to him, or what language had been used to describe his "audacity" in making an offer which the hon. Member had fairly admitted to be very liberal. He was told, "You know the position of the Company, and you are going to take the profits out of our mouths and transfer them to the Government." The directors had been instructed to ask the Government to alter the terms; but the Government had always refused to do so, and would not give a guarantee. But they also said that they neither had the means nor the wish to force the Company to sell to them; that they made the offer from no feeling of ill-will or wish to disparage what had been done by the Company. There, however, was the fact—while in Orissa the Company had done a good deal, in Behar they had done nothing; and it was the duty of the Government, for the interests of the people of India, to carry these works on either themselves or through others. If the Company were able to carry on these works, let them do so; if they were not able, the Government were prepared to complete them, and it was their duty so to do. In Orissa the Company might possibly be able to carry on the works; but in Behar there really seemed no chance of their being able to raise money and carry on the works for a long time, if at all. Meanwhile, here was a large and important district from which the Government was excluded because this Company had got a concession which they could not use. Under these circumstances the Government said, "If you will give up the Behar works we will make no further proposal respecting Orissa; but we will assist you to complete these works by lending you £500,000, at 5 per cent, upon the security of the works." Now the works had cost £700,000 or £800,000, and it would be a condition that the loan of £500,000 should be further expended upon the works. If the Company were to make default in payment of the interest or in re-payment of the principal, the works would, no doubt, be a perfectly good security for the advance. But, so far as he had been informed, the directors did not consider these terms acceptable, and thought it would not be reasonable that they should give the works as security for the loan. In that case, of course, it was for them to refuse the loan. A meeting was to be held very shortly, and then the proposals of the Government would be considered, and they would receive a final answer. Meanwhile, it was right that there should be no mistake. The Government had made an offer which would still hold good as far as the Indian Council was concerned; they had never varied the terms of the offer, and did not intend to do so. It would be for the Company to consider whether these terms were fair, and, if not, what course they would take; the Government, recognizing in them fellow-workers in the performance of a most important duty, had no wish to interfere with any fair profits they might derive from works which they undertook, no doubt, as much from patriotic motives as from a wish to make a good investment. But he was sorry that the Government had ever entered into engagements with private companies. If they had kept these works of irrigation in their own hands they would have avoided great complications. For a length of time, however, the Government had great difficulty in finding money to carry on such works. It was not easy to extend taxation in India, and was only lately that the Government had adopted a decided policy in borrowing money for works of this kind. Now, money would be borrowed freely for works which could be shown to be of a good, substantial, and profitable character; and he earnestly hoped that, whether through their own agency or that of others, this great and important field of labour would be properly cultivated. He had no wish on this occasion to trespass further upon the general question which the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) proposed to raise hereafter, in connection with works of irrigation. He would only say with regard to the Motion that he hoped it would be pressed. It was one which would be delusive in its character, and probably the object of the hon. Member would be sufficiently attained by the discussion which would elicit.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that they had been accustomed in that House to some of the older Members, such as the late Colonel Sibthorpe, assuming a certain licence of speech, and using sometimes offensive expressions in which none of the younger Members indulged. But he was surprised at the repetition of this by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smollett), who had employed language in that discussion which it was hardly proper to use in that House." The hon. Gentleman had talked of "adventurers;" and had said that the Madras Irrigation Company was a great swindle." Upon reflection, he would, he was sure, regret that he had been led into the use of such language. The hon. Member had also attacked by name the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) who was then Secretary of State for India, and under whom the scheme of irrigation had been carried out. But the House knew very well that of all those who were engaged in the conduct of administrative Departments under the Government of Lord Derby there was none more able or more painstaking than the noble Lord who was then Secretary of State for India; and he (Mr. Kinnaird) believed that the noble Lord retained now precisely the same opinion, which he held when in office, as to the wisdom and propriety of promoting works of irrigation. The immense advantage of these works was not so generally admitted at that time as it was now, and therefore the noble Lord deserved the greater credit for what he had done. Was it a proper thing, then, that the Gentlemen who had forwarded these works should be accused of "lobbying?" He hoped the House would not treat those who had done such service to India in the spirit the hon. Member had done. And were they going to refuse any guarantees for irrigation works, after all the millions that had been advanced in spreading railways over India, and when everyone acknowledged now that under no other system than that of guarantees could India have been so effectually and speedily covered with those great works? The hon Member had read an extract from a despatch of Sir John Lawrence, from which he had made it appear that the Governor General undervalued the works in question; but he (Mr. Kinnaird) would like to read two extracts which would show that the contrary was the case, and that in the frightful famine which came upon Orissa it was the Governor General who made the first offer to the Irrigation Company. And what did the Commissioners' appointed to inquire into the causes and extent of the late famine in Orissa report, and especially Mr. Campbell? They bore testimony to the admirable nature of the Company's works, and to the fact that if such works had been earlier attended to, the loss of nearly a million of lives during the famine would never have occurred. The Governor General, in the despatch to which he had referred, said—

"You are aware that, notwithstanding the strong opinions which we hold as to the inconvenience of the arrangement that has been entered into with the Company, it has been our earnest wish to do all in our power to facilitate the operations of the Company, and to act fully up to the spirit of any actual, or implied engagements entered into with them in past years. If it be necessary to adduce any distinct proof of this disposition on the part of the Government of India, we would refer to our recent resolutions to intrust to this Company the execution of the Soane Canal project, and to make grants of money to aid in the construction of the works in Cuttack, the Company's funds having proved insufficient to secure their prosecution with that activity which, in the altered condition of this province, we deem so desirable. And we may assure Her Majesty's Government that it will continue to be our desire to act in this same manner so long as the present arrangements between the Government and the Company shall be maintained.

"But the terrible calamity which has recently fallen on Orissa and Western Bengal has forced upon us the consideration of the question, whether we can any longer with propriety permit the existing arrangements to continue in force, if it be possible to induce the Company to give up their right under their contract.

"We entirely disclaim the intention of making any reflection on the Company for the manner in which their operations have been hitherto carried out, or for the mode in which they have raised or applied their capital. It is incontestable that a large sum has been raised and spent, and it is even probable that had the Company not come forward, the Government would, up to the present time, have done much less than has been done towards the construction of irrigation works in Cuttack. But the position of the Government with relation to the execution of irrigation works has, within the last year, become entirely changed, and our business is no longer with the past but with the present, and the immediate future, and it is impossible for us to avoid the conclusion that, for the reasons we have above given, the means of the Company henceforth will not only be relatively far inferior to those of the Government, but absolutely insufficient for the real necessities of the country."

And as to the nature of the works the Governor General said—

"We may mention, however, that the works have been visited by Colonel Morton, R.E., an officer of great experience in irrigation works, and also by Colonel Nicholls, R.E., the Chief Engineer of Bengal. Both these officers and also Mr. Crommelin, the Superintending Engineer in the service of the Government at Cuttack, agree in stating that the works are good. These statements have not been made on any critical examination nor in any official Report; but we are satisfied that, in a general way, they are correct. In the same way we learn that in point of actual cost—that is, of the actual outlay upon the works themselves—they are cheap. So far, then, we have some grounds for believing that the Government would not pay any extravagant sum in taking over the works as proposed."

The Governor General, therefore, it would be seen had spoken highly and fairly of the Company's acts, and on the authority of two engineers had stated that the works were cheap; and yet the hon. Member had thought proper to denounce them in the strongest possible language. The hon. Gentleman was surprised that at a time of great commercial distress an enterprize of this kind had not paid, and he seemed to expect that the works should be remunerative the first year. But everyone knew that until irrigation works were complete they could not fairly be expected to be so. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) knew that the whole thing was done openly and above-board. He would not enter upon the other topics adverted to by the hon. Member except as to one point. The hon. Gentleman had been pleased to speak in a way which was derogatory to Sir Arthur Cotton. But it was well known that Sir Arthur Cotton was a man of great practical ability, as well as that he had great enthusiasm in the work of irrigation; and unless great enterprizes were taken up by men of sanguine character they were not likely at first to be prosecuted successfully. Sir

Arthur Cotton had been honoured by his Sovereign for having been one of the first who had directed attention to the necessity existing for these great works of irrigation, and the House would, he was sure, regret it, when such a man was attacked, no one had risen to defend him from false aspersions. Sir Arthur Cotton was perfectly unconnected with the company, he did not hold a share in it, and if he took an interest in works of irrigation it was solely because he was sensible of their great value in such a country as India.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smollett) in his views on the subject of irrigation. On the contrary, he believed that such works would be alike profitable to the Government and beneficial to the people of India. He had always contended that works of irrigation ought to be undertaken solely by the Government, and not by private individuals or companies. His reason for holding that opinion was this:—The land in India belonged to the Government, and the number of tenants on the land to be irrigated was very great. It was therefore impossible to collect the water rates except by the instrumentality of the Government, and as these works yielded great profit the Government were acting as agents for, and were collecting large sums of money merely to hand over to private individuals. What he had long complained of was the dog-in-the-manger policy of the Government—namely, that they would neither execute the great irrigation works, which were so necessary to the welfare of India themselves, nor allow others to do it. At length, however, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) made the experiment of granting a great work to the Madras Irrigation Company, and he was disposed to think that, at the time, this was a judicious course, as it afforded the opportunity of comparing the system of private works and Government works. He congratulated the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India on the conclusions at which he had arrived—namely, that the construction of works of irrigation were of the highest value and importance to the people, and profitable to the Government of India—that it is most advantageous to both that they should be executed by the Government; and that for this purpose they should abandon the uncertain policy hitherto pursued of making reproductive works out of surplus revenue instead of raising public loans for this

It was only lately that the Government had adopted a decided policy in borrowing money for works of this kind. Now, money would be borrowed freely for works which could be shown to be of a good, substantial, and profitable character; and he earnestly hoped that, whether through their own agency or that of others, this great and important field of labour would be properly cultivated. He had no wish on this occasion to trespass further upon the general question which the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) proposed to raise hereafter, in connection with works of irrigation. He would only say with regard to the Motion that he hoped it would not be pressed. It was one which would be delusive in its character, and probably the object of the hon. #### CONDITION OF CEYLON.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. WATKIN then rose to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government. He hoped for the forbearance of the House, as Ceylon was not a very popular subject; but if he wanted any reason for asking the House to agree to this Inquiry, he would find it in the fact that the population of the country, of the Government Returns were to be trusted, had been reduced from 2,300,000 in 1863 to 2,000,000 in 1866, and this in the face of the other fact, which also appeared in these Returns, that there was an increase of births over deaths, which would show that the decrease was owing to emigration. When this question was brought forward on former occasions, the reply of the Colonial Secretary was that the island ought to be annexed to the continent of India. It was only a few years ago, however, that this question was fully discussed by a Committee of the House of Commons, and they came to the unanimous opinion that the circumstances of India and of Ceylon were so different that it would be highly inexpedient and unjust to annex the one to the other. The particular reasons he had for bringing this question before the House he might very shortly sum up. The Chamber of Commerce at Colombo and the Planters' Association at Kandy, both of them influential bodies, had requested him to take the matter up, as representations had been sent from the inhabitants of Ceylon, strongly backed up by the Press, unanimously urging that their grievances should be inquired into, and those representations had not been treated with respect. They did not ask the House to interfere until they had for many years mainly asked the Colonial Office to do them substantial justice. For the last ten years scarcely two had passed without memorials having been sent over from the Legislative Chamber, signed by official and non-official members alike, and often supported by the Governor, asking that they might have that control over the public works, and over the income and expenditure of the island, which was promised them in 1848 by Earl Grey, who stated that the time had come when full control over the expenditure should be given to the Council of Ceylon, and promised at the same time that a despatch should be sent out, laying down rules with reference to the taxation, the military expenditure, and other subjects of complaint. It had been said that the whole of the complaints arose from the desire of the colonists to shirk their fair share of colonial military expenditure, and to expend their whole income upon local purposes, leaving the defence of the colony to be defrayed out of Imperial taxation. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not to-night use, or repeat any such argument. In justice to the men whose energy and enterprize had built up that noble dependency, he was sure it would not be urged by the right hon. Gentleman that their grievances were only traceable to the mean selfishness of seeking to avoid the payment of the military expenditure of the colony. On this subject he would read a letter from a gentleman who was formerly a Member of the House, and who was well known for his solid judgment and his intelligence (Sir James Elphinstone), who had large interest in Ceylon. In that letter he pointed out the necessity for railway extension and for a revision of taxation, and expressed a hope that he (Mr. Watkin) would persevere in his Motion for a Committee. Sir James stated that the colonists did not object to pay for a sufficient force for the protection of the island; what they did object to was that Ceylon should be treated as a garrison for Imperial purposes, and that they should have to support that garrison on a scale far beyond what was required for the purpose of internal or external defence. That they were denied a line of railway into the coffee districts, and that the rates on the railways now open were too high; a large duty was laid upon rice, which was the staple food of the people, and the taxes on land were so levied as to act as a discouragement to agriculture. In addition to this, Ceylon was called upon to maintain establishments at Galle and at Trincomalee which were for purely Imperial purposes. The disparity of numbers between the European and the Native population was no reason for withholding local self-government, since it was on the former that the prosperity of the island mainly depended. He felt assured that the House would weigh the strong opinion of Sir James. In the last three years there had been great depression. He did not mean to contend that that depression arose from causes all of which were under Government control. There had been great deficiencies in the crops; but most of the depression was caused by an injudicious system of taxation, and by incompetent government and Governors. Ceylon was the only country in the world where the greater portion of the revenue was raised from taxes on food. Now, taxing food in Ceylon was like taxing raw material—wages to a great extent were paid in food, and anything which advanced its price diminished produce and crippled industry. One-fourth of the revenue of Ceylon was derived from the tax on grain alone. The production of food in the country was decreasing, and this was traceable to the land tax, and to the gross neglect of irrigation. At one time Ceylon was the granary of the East; but it had not only ceased to be so, but it could not support its own population. There was this further evil, that taxation upon Native-grown rice was to this day collected by farmers. The vices of farming taxes were well known, and they had it upon the authority of Sir Emerson Tennent that, in Ceylon, the amount of taxation levied was double that which found its way to the Treasury. Then there was the question which they had already been in another case debating—the question of irrigation. Under the old Native system, works for the purpose of irrigation were kept up almost as roads were in England, under the “Rajah Karia” system—every district being compelled to keep its own irrigation works in repair. It was true there were abuses connected with that system; and under the English rule this forced system of labour was put an end to, and the irrigation works were left entirely to the good-will and pleasure of the Natives. But the Natives had no capital with which to meet engineering difficulties, and unaided, could not combine, and hence important works were rapidly falling into disuse and decay; and from that cause there had been a falling off in the production of food of one-half or three-quarters; cultivation in some districts having in fact entirely ceased. Since agitation had commenced on this subject, efforts had been made to enable the right hon. Gentleman to say—as no doubt he would say—that Government was engaged in restoring these works. Yes, but what was the proposition by which the new system was to be maintained? It was to be met by a new tax on the food of the Natives; by increasing burdens upon the labouring population. The unfortunate paddy-growers were ready taxed to the extent of one-sixth of their gross produce. The planters of Ceylon had submitted to export duties on their produce, in order that the public works might go on with efficiency. That for an island imported half its grain, and employed the whole of the labour employed in cultivation of coffee; and its taxation amounted to nearly one-third of the gross produce of cultivation. He had no doubt that the right hon. Gentlemen the Under-Secretary for the Colonies would contend that as the revenue of the colony had increased it must be in a prosperous state. He had shown the House under what circumstances the increase had taken place, for his part he thought that if the revenue of the colony had been diminished it would have been a better sign of prosperity than an increase, under such circumstances. Our revenue was increasing during the Russian war; and high taxation and prosperity were not synonymous. The right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) the other night stated that Ceylon had much to be gained by being governed by a man of highest knowledge, capacity, and intelligence; but it should be remembered that the Governor of the island told the Colonial Office that, as far as regarded all material parts of the complaints of the colonists, there was great foundation in every one of them. Surely that showed the case was one demanding an investigation. He knew that all official people were averse to inquiries; but he hoped the House would consider that the repeated complaints of the people, supported by many cases by the opinions of the Governors themselves, made out a case for inquiry. Year after year the colonists sent home memorials, asking that the promises made them by Earl Grey, in 1848, should be carried out; year after year these memorials had been refused. But the colonists had never ceased to be loyal and true to the country and to the Crown. Last year Her Majesty was advised not to grant the prayer of the memorialists, and it was said that these planters wanted constitutional Government. But, in fact, they only asked for the fulfilment of a pledge which was made to them in 1848 by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The mode of doing this they left entirely with Her Majesty. In the Governor's despatch Mr. Wall was not fairly treated.

He was a loyal and an able man, and well capable, if in that House, of pleading the cause of the island. The wishes of the colonists having been for so many years refused by the Colonial Office, they had at last come to that House for redress. Our distant dependencies, he believed, could be retained by us in a satisfactory manner only through the cultivation among their inhabitants of two sentiments — namely, first a feeling of loyalty to the Crown and Government of this country, and next a conviction that, whenever they had real grievances to complain of, and failed to obtain redress for them in other quarters, that House would at least do them the justice of granting inquiry. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Motion of which he had given Notice.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government,"—(Mr. Watkin,)—instead thereof.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) asked that House to grant a Select Committee to inquire into the state of Ceylon upon two grounds. The first was, that certain complaints had reached this country from that island; and the second was, that the institutions of the island were decaying, and its population and prosperity were falling away, and that general misgovernment existed there. Now, as far as the complaints were concerned, they were amply discussed only four weeks ago, when the hon. Gentleman called the attention of the House to the petition which had been forwarded from Ceylon to this country. The hon. Member had not adduced any fresh complaint. Four hon. Members interested in Ceylon took part in that discussion. He (Mr. Adderley) then stated the views of the Government upon the subject, which were fully indorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the late Colonial Secretary, and the House seemed to think that no case whatever had been made out in support of the petition. The hon. Gentleman had now put forward statements of his own, alleging that the island was in a general state of decay. But he submitted that the hon. Member had altogether failed to change the issue of the discussion which had already taken place upon Ceylon. The sole ground of complaint was the military contribution which that colony had been called upon to pay. Now, the fact was, that the contributions which the colony had been called upon to make had been recommended in the Report of a Select Committee, who were of opinion that Ceylon ought to contribute towards the cost of the troops kept in that island. The hon. Member intimated that the colonists did not so much complain of the military contributions as of the number of troops. [Mr. WATKIN: I said nothing of the kind.] He had certainly understood the hon. Member to say so; and of the number of troops which ought to be maintained in Ceylon Her Majesty's Government was the proper judge. It was only when Ceylon was called upon to pay the military contribution that they heard of any complaints on the part of that colony. The statements of the hon. Member with reference to the mis-government of Ceylon and the decay of the prosperity of that island were not borne out by the reports which had been received in this country upon the condition of that colony. When it was proposed to place Ceylon under the Indian Government, there was a general outcry against the proposition. The hon. Gentleman stated that the population had fallen off. Now, the fact was that it was rapidly increasing, being 13,000 more than last year. Last year the births were 48,000, and the deaths 39,000.

MR. WATKIN said, that the colonial blue book showed that in 1863 the population was 2,342,098, whilst in 1866 it was only 2,088,027.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Gentleman had, perhaps, selected a year in which there was a great mortality; but the last accounts showed a great increase in the population. The hon. Member had adduced the increase of the revenue as a proof of decay, inasmuch as he attributed that increase to the imposition of new taxes. The truth, however, was, that it was due to no such cause, but to the growing prosperity of the colony, for the taxes there remained the same as those which had been levied for the last ten years. The next complaint of the hon. Member was that the Government had unwisely interfered with the railway speculations of the colonists, and prevented railways being made into the coffee districts; but that, too, was a statement which was not supported by the facts of the case. When it was shown that the state of the funds for making the railway referred to was satisfactory, it was sanctioned by the Government. The hon. Gentleman also complained that large taxes were levied upon rice grounds; but these taxes had been brought under the consideration of the Government, who had ordered that an inquiry should take place with a view to ascertain whether a reduction in them might not be effected. The tax upon rice was a tax per bushel, and therefore the increased produce of the tax showed an increased production. [Mr. WATKIN: The tax is in proportion to the value.] The tax had not been altered. The question whether the naval stations for the purposes of the colony should be maintained at the cost of the British taxpayer he did not think it necessary to discuss. He had frequently heard the hon. Gentleman complain of the burden thrown upon the English taxpayer to maintain such stations for colonies, many of which were richer than England. Why should not the people of Ceylon bear their share of the taxation of the Empire? Was all the expense of the Empire to be borne by a particular part of it? [Mr. WATKIN: Certainly not.] Under all the circumstances of the case, he did not see any good that could be derived from granting the proposed Committee. Since the Report of the Military Commission in Ceylon, the colonists seemed to be perfectly satisfied with the terms which had been come to, and that Report, he believed, would be strictly adhered to. He did not, he might add, at all agree with the views of the hon. Gentleman as to the government of Ceylon. While the Governor was responsible for the good government of the colony, he must have ample discretion in the management of its affairs; and if, as the hon. Member proposed, the majority of Members in the Council were to be elected, the Governor would no longer be in the position which an autocratic governor ought to occupy, who, being fully responsible, should have the power of conducting his own policy. The hon. Member had also fallen into a mistake with respect to the intention of Earl Grey, whose despatch contained no such promise as that indicated by the hon. Member. Earl Grey expressed a wish that the colony might become more able to take a part in its own financial affairs, and it was rapidly exhibiting greater capacity in that respect, for it frequently controlled votes on financial questions. The hon. Gentleman talked, not in the interest of the great population of the colony, but in the interest of a small section—the English planters—who had ample influence in the Council. He thought that no case had been made out for the inquiry which the hon. Gentleman asked the House to sanction.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK trusted that the Motion for a Select Committee would be agreed to. The Under Secretary for the Colonies had objected that the complaints came only from Englishmen in the colony; but Englishmen constituted the life and soul of the colony; and, if they complained, they ought to have a fair hearing. With regard to the population of the colony, it was true, as stated by the hon. Member for Stockport that its amount had diminished since 1863, though there had been some increase of population in 1866 over the amount in 1865.

MR. GORST thought the House had not only failed to dispose of the grievances of Ceylon, but had failed in understanding what those grievances really were. It was ridiculous to say that the matter had been fully discussed on a former evening, when, in point of fact, only four Members took part in the debate. Moreover, both the Under Secretary for the Colonies and the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) had misconceived the real ground of complaint. Although the statement that the military expenditure was not the real grievance had been proved during the former discussion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) had repeated his former statement. The grievance was not confined to any particular expenditure. It referred to the general system pursued by the Colonial Office; and the complaint was that the Colonial Minister of this country expended £1,000,000 per annum without the slightest check or control from any person in the world. [Mr. ADDERLEY: No, no!] Well, was that expenditure controlled by the House? The state of the House when colonial matters were brought forward showed that hon. Members did not take the slightest interest in them; and it was almost impossible to discuss them except when a Vote was proposed in Committee of Supply. On the previous discussion the House would have been counted out but for the accidental circumstance that the Government wanted to pass a Vote in Supply, and the result would probably have been the same on the present occasion but for a similar reason. Not only was there no control by the House over the expenditure in Ceylon, but there was no control whatever. Now, what was wanted was that there should be an efficient control vested in the colony itself. It was quite true that there was a Legislative Council, and that money votes were brought before that Council; but of the sixteen Members who composed it ten were official servants of the Government, who were compelled to vote according to instructions sent out from this country. He strongly urged the Government to consider the question, and to devise some means for checking our colonial expenditure. He believed that representative institutions had been granted far too soon in many of the colonies, and there was great danger lest the refusal to redress real grievances might lead to an extension of that practice. There was first a refusal to listen to just complaints, and then violent agitation having been excited, extravagant concessions were made for the purpose of allaying that agitation. He did not believe that the Colonial Office was at all ill managed; but he did think that at a time like the present, when the House of Commons took no interest in colonial affairs, it was desirable to provide some machinery by which the action of the Colonial Office in expending a sum of £1,000,000 per annum should be effectively controlled.

COLONEL SYKES objected to the assertion of the Under Secretary of State that the governors of the colonies must be autocrats. They could not expect any body of Englishmen to submit to a system of Government which deprived them of all real control over their expenditure. But that was precisely the state of things at present in Ceylon. There was a Legislative Council, but the Government officers by their votes rendered popular control impossible. He would ask, why were these Crown Colonies kept in the hands of the Colonial Office? The answer was, because of the patronage they brought in the appointments of governors, and judges, and others. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) was undoubtedly right in the view he had taken of this matter, and in bringing it before the House.

MR. CHILDERS agreed very much in the spirit of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) that it was almost hopeless to discuss any colonial question in the present state of that House. He also agreed with much that had been stated by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin). Ceylon had not undergone that rigid inspection by the Colonial Office which from time to time was required; and he strongly urged the desirability, if a Committee were not granted, of sending out a Commission to Ceylon to look very thoroughly into the whole system of administration there. Such a course would, he was convinced, be most beneficial not only to Imperial but Colonial interests. He believed the Government of Ceylon was not well administered; from careful inspection of official documents he could say that a great deal ought to be done with respect to the finance of the colony. But he should feel considerable difficulty in voting for this Motion, because it must be considered in connection with the Papers which had been laid on the table; and he was bound to say that those Papers disclosed such extraordinary doctrines that the House could not allow itself to appear to give any sanction to them. The whole of this movement was based on a Paper which emanated from the gentlemen who called themselves the Ceylon League. That Paper had been laid on the table, and he would quote only this one sentence from it—

“The public of Ceylon will, at present be satisfied with such a concession as will give them the enjoyment, through their Representatives in Council, of the constitutional right of full control of the local revenues, freed from the dictation of the Governor or the Secretary of State.”

The meaning of that was, that representatives of the white population, consisting of 3,000 should have entire control over the revenues without reference to the wishes of the Native population, amounting to 2,500,000. He thought such a position would be monstrous, and he trusted no one on either side of the House would support such a doctrine. But if the Committee were moved for on the ground of the bad Government of Ceylon, he thought there was ground for supporting it. The secret of the matter was this. Until within a few years there was no agitation on the part of the people of Ceylon with respect to the financial administration of the colony. There had been a considerable surplus, which was accumulating. Some years ago a Committee of this House reported that the colony did not bear anything like its proper share of military expenditure, and that that share ought to be increased; and the Government wrote to the Governor to the effect that there being a large surplus every year a portion of it should be applied to relieve the military expenditure. The planters then urged the Governor to expend more money, and the real object of the agitation has been to obtain for them not the power of refusing expenditure, but of increasing it in spite of the Government. Now that was not con-

cond undertaking referred to by the hon. Gentleman was set on foot without any guarantee. And certainly we owed to the gentlemen who took part in the formation and promotion of the twin Companies a debt of gratitude for the exertions they made in raising a sum approaching £1,000,000 of capital without any guarantee on the part of the State. We are also bound to acknowledge our obligations to them for the character of the work they had accomplished in Orissa, and, he believed, in the Madras Presidency; for the two Companies were, in fact, one, although it had two distinct and unconnected undertakings. After the Company had commenced their works and carried them on to a certain point, they made the unfortunate discovery that they had not capital enough to carry them on further in a proper manner, whereupon they asked Lord Halifax (then Sir Charles Wood) for assistance; but he declined to sanction an alteration which they wished to introduce into the terms of the guarantee. Subsequently, however, Lord De Grey and Ripon consented to advance them a loan on the security of their works, which were admitted to be good and well-executed works as far as they went. In taking the works as a security the Government were of opinion that they were making a very good bargain. Indeed, if the Government had not done so they would have been placed in a position of great difficulty. They had undertaken to guarantee the Company, and were paying interest; and the question was whether they were to be relieved from the payment of that interest. It was clear that the Government could not be relieved till the Company made profits; and it was made clear to Lord De Grey that the Company would not make any profits without further assistance from the State. Lord De Grey therefore thought it was for the interest of the Government that he should advance the loan. On this point, however, the hon. Member for Halifax would be better able than he to give an explanation. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) believed Lord De Grey had exercised a sound discretion; and he felt sure the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire did not mean to impute anything like jobbing or improper conduct to his Lordship or to the hon. Member for Halifax. With regard to the other undertaking, and the transaction in which he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had been himself engaged, it was of course due to the House, after the statement of the hon. Gentleman, that he should offer an explanation. The second undertaking was divisible into two. There was an undertaking by the Company, called the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, to irrigate a portion of Orissa, and there was the further undertaking to irrigate a portion of Behar. Now, the hon. Gentleman had lost sight of an important element in one part of the transactions—namely, the concessions made to this Company with regard to the irrigation at Behar. While objecting upon principle to Government guarantees generally, he particularly objected to guarantees in the matter of irrigation works; because, by allowing a company to undertake them, Government exposed itself to difficulty and embarrassment, and it was the duty of Government to keep them in its own hands. Otherwise, difficult questions bearing upon the land revenue, the condition of districts irrigated, and the relations between ryots and landowners and between landowners and the Government, were infinitely complicated by the obligation of Government towards an irrigation company. Any one who would follow up the matter would see that it was almost impossible satisfactorily to work a system of irrigation in a large district—especially in one in which there was no permanent settlement of the revenue—by means of a company. The questions raised, such as who was to have the control of the water, what was to be the price fixed, and what were to be the stipulations with the Zemindars as to the alteration of the assessment, were in themselves so difficult and involved such delicate considerations, that it almost amounted to a dereliction of duty on the part of Government to give up the control of an irrigation system to a company, and particularly to a guaranteed company. He meant no disrespect to the Company in question by expressing these views; and his great regret that that Company had obtained the concessions and the position it had obtained in Orissa and in Behar, and more particularly in Behar, because the Company had the exclusive right to irrigate a very important district, and they had not the means of doing it. They simply kept others out, and prevented the Government from undertaking the works. The Company, having obtained its concession, laid out a large sum in works which had been warmly approved by the authorities and by the independent investigators of the Orissa famine, which was, no doubt, locally mitigated by the works, while the Company's officers behaved with great generality and did much to alleviate distress. These facts, and the necessity of finding some employment for the people of Orissa, at the time of their suffering, were the occasion of the advances to which the hon. Member referred. Having been told in the House that the Company was not to be assisted, the hon. Member seemed to think he had been deceived by the Secretary of State, and his council; and he seemed to think that that was owing to some proceedings on his Sir (Stafford Northcote's) part, that the advances were made by the Governor General in India without consulting the Secretary of State, and it seemed to him that they were rightly made, seeing that there was a means of profitably expending the money. If employment had not been provided in this way it must have been done by setting the poor to dig holes one day, and fill them up the next. It appeared to him that having the machinery ready to hand for the profitable expenditure of money the Government were quite right in so laying it out. Accordingly, about £120,000 was advanced on the understanding to which he had referred. When the Company were asked to undertake the work they said they were ready enough to spend the money, but they did not wish to make the additional outlay on their own account. They, in fact, found that their water was not taken off so rapidly as they expected, and that their works were not producing a profit; and therefore it was not in their power, in the present state of the money market, to go on with their works. They, therefore, proposed to lie on their oars, and wait till the works which they had executed began to be profitable, when the public would come forward and provide the funds necessary to complete the works. The Government said that might be perfectly legitimate on the part of a company, but it did not at that time meet the wishes of the Government, who could not wait; and it was under these circumstances, and looking to the circumstances he had mentioned, that the Governor General wrote the despatch the hon. Member had referred to. This brought the history to the point at which it became the duty of the Secretary of State in Council to act. The Governor General had written an elaborate despatch, pointing out that the Company had failed to realize the great profits they had looked forward to, referring to the complications that had arisen between the Company and the Government, and proposing to buy up the interests of the Company, not at par, but

in 5 per cent stock, which was then at 110, terms which would have been the means of increasing the value of the Company's stock considerably more than the 25 per cent which the hon. Member had spoken of. That despatch came into his (Sir Stafford Northcote's) hands, and the Council decided that it would be right to offer to purchase the Company's works; but that conclusion was not come to without much hesitation, and after full consideration of all the circumstances he had stated. The Government felt that it was important for India that these works should be carried on, though the Company had not the means of carrying them on with activity and success; and her Majesty's Government resolved not to entertain the question of a guarantee. There was such great force in the argument of the Governor General, as it related to the works that were not completed in Behar, that they would have been prepared to offer almost any terms to get them into the hands of the Government; but with regard to Orissa it was of less importance to the Government to purchase the Company's rights because a considerable amount of work had been actually executed. On careful consideration of the whole question, they came to the conclusion that the terms proposed by the Governor General were excessive. The hon. Member had said that the Secretary for State was—he would not repeat the elegant expression of the hon. Member—but he was weak, and his council was at the mercy of jobbers and speculators, and that they had made an extravagant and improvident bargain. But looking to the Correspondence, which was in the hands of the public, he could see no evidence whatever to support such a charge. The Governor General proposed the purchase on certain terms. The Government determined not to offer those terms but lower terms. They said, "We will give you the amount which you have expended, and £50,000 over." It was said that the stock of the Company was at a large discount, and that those terms were therefore unreasonably high. But it should be borne in mind that the Company had bonâ fide raised this money, that they had expended it in good work, and that, though it was not now profitable, the Government had reason to believe that when the system was completed it would become profitable. They, therefore, thought it fair to give back to the Company the whole amount they had expended, with a certain sum over and above to compensate them for any inconvenience which might result from parting with a portion of their establishment, and in consideration of any just claims they might have arising from the expectation of future profit. There was no doubt that, as far as they had gone, the Company had done a good work for India; though whether they had done a good work for themselves was another question, into which he would not enter. Having made this as a final offer, after full consideration, the Government thought it right to make known on the same day, through the public Press, before even the directors had received the official communication, the nature of the offer that was made. The effect was that the shares, which had been at a discount, rose to par; but he was told that this was nothing more than a nominal quotation, and that, pending the proceedings, little or no business was done. It had been stated that the offer of the Government was not favourably received by the Company. He did not know whether it had been refused or not; but he had heard that the offer was received at the meeting of shareholders as not only unsatisfactory but insulting. Indeed, quite as strong language as had been applied to him by the hon. Member (Mr. Smollett) had been applied to him by the shareholders. He had received letters from various persons, in which he was accused of a desire to "rob" the shareholders; and he did not know what motives had not been imputed to him, or what language had been used to describe his "audacity" in making an offer which the hon. Member had fairly admitted to be very liberal. He was told, "You know the position of the Company, and you are going to take the profits out of our mouths and transfer them to the Government." The directors had been instructed to ask the Government to alter the terms; but the Government had always refused to do so, and would not give a guarantee. But they also said that they neither had the means nor the wish to force the Company to sell to them; that they made the offer from no feeling of ill-will or wish to disparage what had been done by the Company. There, however, was the fact—while in Orissa the Company had done a good deal, in Behar they had done nothing; and it was the duty of the Government, for the interests of the people of India, to carry these works on either themselves or through others. If the Company were able to carry on these works, let them do so; if they were not able, the Government were prepared to complete them, and it was their duty so to do. In Orissa the Company might possibly be able to carry on the works; but in Behar there really seemed no chance of their being able to raise money and carry on the works for a long time, if at all. Meanwhile, here was a large and important district from which the Government was excluded because this Company had got a concession which they could not use. Under these circumstances the Government said, "If you will give up the Behar works we will make no further proposal respecting Orissa; but we will assist you to complete these works by lending you £500,000, at 5 per cent, upon the security of the works." Now the works had cost £700,000 or £800,000, and it would be a condition that the loan of £500,000 should be further expended upon the works. If the Company were to make default in payment of the interest or in re-payment of the principal, the works would, no doubt, be a perfectly good security for the advance. But, so far as he had been informed, the directors did not consider these terms acceptable, and thought it would not be reasonable that they should give the works as security for the loan. In that case, of course, it was for them to refuse the loan. A meeting was to be held very shortly, and then the proposals of the Government would be considered, and they would receive a final answer. Meanwhile, it was right that there should be no mistake. The Government had made an offer which would still hold good as far as the Indian Council was concerned; they had never varied the terms of the offer, and did not intend to do so. It would be for the Company to consider whether these terms were fair, and, if not, what course they would take; the Government, recognizing in them fellow-workers in the performance of a most important duty, had no wish to interfere with any fair profits they might derive from works which they undertook, no doubt, as much from patriotic motives as from a wish to make a good investment. But he was sorry that the Government had ever entered into engagements with private companies. If they had kept these works of irrigation in their own hands they would have avoided great complications. For a length of time, however, the Government had great difficulty in finding money to carry on such works. It was not easy to extend taxation in India, and

It was only lately that the Government had adopted a decided policy in borrowing money for works of this kind. Now, money would be borrowed freely for works which could be shown to be of a good, substantial, and profitable character; and he earnestly hoped that, whether through their own agency or that of others, this great and important field of labour would be properly cultivated. He had no wish on this occasion to trespass further upon the general question which the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) proposed to raise hereafter, in connection with works of irrigation. He would only say with regard to the Motion that he hoped it would not be pressed. It was one which would be delusive in its character, and probably the object of the hon. Member would be sufficiently attained by the discussion which it would elicit.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that they had been accustomed in that House to some of the older Members, such as the late Colonel Sibthorpe, assuming a certain licence of speech, and using sometimes offensive expressions in which none of the other Members indulged. But he was surprised at the repetition of this by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smollett), who had employed language in that discussion which it was hardly proper to use in that House." The hon. Gentleman had talked of "adventurers;" and had said that the Madras Irrigation Company was "a great swindle." Upon reflection, he would, he was sure, regret that he had been led into the use of such language. The hon. Member had also attacked by name the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) who was then Secretary of State for India, and under whom the scheme of irrigation had been carried out. But the House knew very well that of all those who were engaged in the conduct of administrative Departments under the Government of Lord Derby there was none more able or more painstaking than the noble Lord who was then Secretary of State for India; and he (Mr. Kinnaird) believed that the noble Lord retained now precisely the same opinion, which he held when in office, as to the wisdom and propriety of promoting works of irrigation. The immense advantage of these works was not so generally admitted at that time as it was now, and therefore the noble Lord deserved the greater credit for what he had done. Was it a proper thing, then that the Gentlemen who had forwarded these works should be accused of "lobbying?" He hoped the House would not treat those who had done such service to India in the spirit the hon. Member had done. And were they going to refuse any guarantees for irrigation works, after all the millions that had been advanced in spreading railways over India, and when everyone acknowledged now that under no other system than that of guarantees could India have been so effectually and speedily covered with those great works? The hon Member had read an extract from a despatch of Sir John Lawrence, from which he had made it appear that the Governor General undervalued the works in question; but he (Mr. Kinnaird) would like to read two extracts which would show that the contrary was the case, and that in the frightful famine which came upon Orissa it was the Governor General who made the first offer to the Irrigation Company. And what did the Commissioners' appointed to inquire into the causes and extent of the late famine in Orissa report, and especially Mr. Campbell? They bore testimony to the admirable nature of the Company's works, and to the fact that if such works had been earlier attended to, the loss of nearly a million of lives during the famine would never have occurred. The Governor General, in the despatch to which he had referred, said—

"You are aware that, notwithstanding the strong opinions which we hold as to the inconvenience of the arrangement that has been entered into with the Company, it has been our earnest wish to do all in our power to facilitate the operations of the Company, and to act fully up to the spirit of any actual, or implied engagements entered into with them in past years. If it be necessary to adduce any distinct proof of this disposition on the part of the Government of India, we would refer to our recent resolutions to intrust to this Company the execution of the Soane Canal project, and to make grants of money to aid in the construction of the works in Cuttack, the Company's funds having proved insufficient to secure their prosecution with that activity which, in the altered condition of this province, we deem so desirable. And we may assure Her Majesty's Government that it will continue to be our desire to act in this same manner so long as the present arrangements between the Government and the Company shall be maintained.

"But the terrible calamity which has recently fallen on Orissa and Western Bengal has forced upon us the consideration of the question, whether we can any longer with propriety permit the existing arrangements to continue in force, if it be possible to induce the Company to give up their right under their contract.

"We entirely disclaim the intention of making any reflection on the Company for the manner in which their operations have been hitherto carried out, or for the mode in which they have raised or applied their capital. It is incontestable that a large sum has been raised and spent, and it is even probable that had the Company not come forward, the Government would, up to the present time, have done much less than has been done towards the construction of irrigation works in Cuttaok. But the position of the Government with relation to the execution of irrigation works has, within the last year, become entirely changed, and our business is no longer with the past but with the present, and the immediate future, and it is impossible for us to avoid the conclusion that, for the reasons we have above given, the means of the Company henceforth will not only be relatively far inferior to those of the Government, but absolutely insufficient for the real necessities of the country."

And as to the nature of the works the Governor General said—

"We may mention, however, that the works have been visited by Colonel Morton, R.E., an officer of great experience in irrigation works, and also by Colonel Nicholls, R.E., the Chief Engineer of Bengal. Both these officers and also Mr. Crommelin, the Superintending Engineer in the service of the Government at Cuttaok, agree in stating that the works are good. These statements have not been made on any critical examination nor in any official Report; but we are satisfied that, in a general way, they are correct. In the same way we learn that in point of actual cost—that is, of the actual outlay upon the works themselves—they are cheap. So far, then, we have some grounds for believing that the Government would not pay any extravagant sum in taking over the works as proposed."

The Governor General, therefore, it would be seen had spoken highly and fairly of the Company's acts, and on the authority of two engineers had stated that the works were cheap; and yet the hon. Member had thought proper to denounce them in the strongest possible language. The hon. Gentleman was surprised that at a time of great commercial distress an enterprise of this kind had not paid, and he seemed to expect that the works should be remunerative the first year. But everyone knew that until irrigation works were complete they could not fairly be expected to be so. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) knew that the whole thing was done openly and above-board. He would not enter upon the other topics adverted to by the hon. Member except as to one point. The hon. Gentleman had been pleased to speak in a way which was derogatory to Sir Arthur Cotton. But it was well known that Sir Arthur Cotton was a man of great practical ability, as well as that he had great enthusiasm in the work of irrigation; and unless great enterprises were taken up by men of sanguine character they were not likely at first to be prosecuted successfully. Sir

Arthur Cotton had been honoured by his Sovereign for having been one of the first who had directed attention to the necessity existing for these great works of irrigation, and the House would, he was sure, regret if, when such a man was attacked, no one had risen to defend him from false aspersions. Sir Arthur Cotton was perfectly unconnected with the company, he did not hold a share in it, and if he took an interest in works of irrigation it was solely because he was sensible of their great value in such a country as India.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smollett) in his views on the subject of irrigation. On the contrary, he believed that such works would be alike profitable to the Government and beneficial to the people of India. He had always contended that works of irrigation ought to be undertaken solely by the Government, and not by private individuals or companies. His reason for holding that opinion was this:—The land in India belonged to the Government, and the number of tenants on the land to be irrigated was very great. It was therefore impossible to collect the water rates except by the instrumentality of the Government, and as these works yielded great profit the Government were acting as agents for, and were collecting large sums of money merely to hand over to private individuals. What he had long complained of was the dog-in-the-manger policy of the Government—namely, that they would neither execute the great irrigation works, which were so necessary to the welfare of India themselves, nor allow others to do it. At length, however, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) made the experiment of granting a great work to the Madras Irrigation Company, and he was disposed to think that, at the time, this was a judicious course, as it afforded the opportunity of comparing the system of private works and Government works. He congratulated the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India on the conclusions at which he had arrived—namely, that the construction of works of irrigation were of the highest value and importance to the people, and profitable to the Government of India—that it is most advantageous to both that they should be executed by the Government; and that for this purpose they should abandon the uncertain policy hitherto pursued of making reproductive works out of surplus revenue instead of raising public loans for this specific object and carrying out the works with as little delay as possible. This he (Mr. J. B. Smith) believed to be a sound course, and it was the one which he had advocated in that House during the last seven years.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CONDITION OF CEYLON.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. WATKIN then rose to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government. He hoped for the forbearance of the House, as Ceylon was not a very popular subject; but if he wanted any reason for asking the House to agree to this Inquiry, he would find it in the fact that the population of the country, the Government Returns were to be trusted, had been reduced from 2,300,000 in 1863 to 2,000,000 in 1866, and this in the face of the other fact, which also appeared in these Returns, that there was an increase of births over deaths, which would show that the decrease was owing to emigration. When this question was brought forward on former occasions, the reply of the Colonial Secretary was that the island ought to be annexed to the continent of India. It was only a few years ago, however, that this question was fully discussed by a Committee of the House of Commons, and they came to the unanimous opinion that the circumstances of India and of Ceylon were so different that it would be highly inexpedient and unjust to annex the one to the other. The particular reasons which had for bringing this question before the House he might very shortly sum up. The Chamber of Commerce at Colombo and the Planters' Association at Kandy, both of them influential bodies, had requested him to take the matter up, as representations had been sent from the inhabitants of Ceylon, strongly backed up by the press, unanimously urging that their grievances should be inquired into, and those representations had not been treated with respect. They did not ask the House to interfere until they had for many years only asked the Colonial Office to do them substantial justice. For the last ten years scarcely two had passed without memorials having been sent over from the Legislative Chamber, signed by official and non-official members alike, and when supported by the Governor, asking that they might have that control over

the public works, and over the income and expenditure of the island, which was promised them in 1848 by Earl Grey, who stated that the time had come when full control over the expenditure should be given to the Council of Ceylon, and promised at the same time that a despatch should be sent out, laying down rules with reference to the taxation, the military expenditure, and other subjects of complaint. It had been said that the whole of the complaints arose from the desire of the colonists to shirk their fair share of colonial military expenditure, and to expend their whole income upon local purposes, leaving the defence of the colony to be defrayed out of Imperial taxation. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not to-night use, or repeat any such argument. In justice to the men whose energy and enterprize had built up that noble dependency, he was sure it would not be urged by the right hon. Gentleman that their grievances were only traceable to the mean selfishness of seeking to avoid the payment of the military expenditure of the colony. On this subject he would read a letter from a gentleman who was formerly a Member of the House, and who was well known for his solid judgment and his intelligence (Sir James Elphinstone), who had large interest in Ceylon. In that letter he pointed out the necessity for railway extension and for a revision of taxation, and expressed a hope that he (Mr. Watkin) would persevere in his Motion for a Committee. Sir James stated that the colonists did not object to pay for a sufficient force for the protection of the island; what they did object to was that Ceylon should be treated as a garrison for Imperial purposes, and that they should have to support that garrison on a scale far beyond what was required for the purpose of internal or external defence. That they were denied a line of railway into the coffee districts, and that the rates on the railways now open were too high; a large duty was laid upon rice, which was the staple food of the people, and the taxes on land were so levied as to act as a discouragement to agriculture. In addition to this, Ceylon was called upon to maintain establishments at Galle and at Trincomalee which were for purely Imperial purposes. The disparity of numbers between the European and the Native population was no reason for withholding local self-government, since it was on the former that the prosperity of the island mainly depended. He felt assured that the House would weigh the strong opinion of Sir James. In the last three years there had been great depression. He did not mean to contend that that depression arose from causes all of which were under Government control. There had been great deficiencies in the crops; but most of the depression was caused by an injudicious system of taxation, and by incompetent government and Governors. Ceylon was the only country in the world where the greater portion of the revenue was raised from taxes on food. Now, taxing food in Ceylon was like taxing raw material—wages to a great extent were paid in food, and anything which advanced its price diminished produce and crippled industry. One-fourth of the revenue of Ceylon was derived from the tax on grain alone. The production of food in the country was decreasing, and this was traceable to the land tax, and to the gross neglect of irrigation. At one time Ceylon was the granary of the East; but it had not only ceased to be so, but it could not support its own population. There was this further evil, that taxation upon Native-grown rice was to this day collected by farmers. The vices of farming taxes were well known, and they had it upon the authority of Sir Emerson Tennent that, in Ceylon, the amount of taxation levied was double that which found its way to the Treasury. Then there was the question which they had already been in another case debating—the question of irrigation. Under the old Native system, works for the purpose of irrigation were kept up almost as roads were in England, under the “Rajah Karia” system—every district being compelled to keep its own irrigation works in repair. It was true there were abuses connected with that system; and under the English rule this forced system of labour was put an end to, and the irrigation works were left entirely to the good-will and pleasure of the Natives. But the Natives had no capital with which to meet engineering difficulties, and unaided, could not combine, and hence important works were rapidly falling into disuse and decay; and from that cause there had been a falling off in the production of food of one-half or three-quarters; cultivation in some districts having in fact entirely ceased. Since agitation had commenced on this subject, efforts had been made to enable the right hon. Gentleman to say—as no doubt he would say—that Government was engaged in restoring these works. Yes, but what was the proposition by which the new system was to be maintained? It was to be met by a new tax on the food of the Natives; by increasing the burdens upon the labouring population. The unfortunate paddy-growers were already taxed to the extent of one-sixth of their gross produce. The planters of Ceylon had submitted to export duties on their produce, in order that the public works might go on with efficiency. That fertile island imported half its grain, and almost the whole of the labour employed in the cultivation of coffee; and its taxation amounted to nearly one-third of the gross produce of cultivation. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentlemen the Under Secretary for the Colonies would contend that as the revenue of the colony had increased it must be in a prosperous state. He had shown the House under what circumstances the increase had taken place, and for his part he thought that if the revenue of the colony had been diminished it would have been a better sign of prosperity than an increase, under such circumstances. Our revenue was increasing during the Russian war; and high taxation and prosperity were not synonymous. The right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) the other night stated that Ceylon had the happiness to be governed by a man of the highest knowledge, capacity, and intelligence; but it should be remembered that the Governor of the island told the Colonial Office that, as far as regarded all the material parts of the complaints of the colonists, there was great foundation for every one of them. Surely that showed the case was one demanding an investigation. He knew that all official people were averse to inquiries; but he hoped the House would consider that the repeated complaints of the people, supported in many cases by the opinions of the Governors themselves, made out a case for an inquiry. Year after year the colonists had sent home memorials, asking that the promises made them by Earl Grey, in 1848, should be carried out; year after year these memorials had been refused. Yet the colonists had never ceased to be loyal and true to the country and to the Crown. Last year Her Majesty was advised not to grant the prayer of the memorialists, and it was said that these planters wanted constitutional Government. But, in fact, they only asked for the fulfilment of the pledge which was made to them in 1848 by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The mode of doing this they left entirely with Her Majesty. In the Governor's despatch Mr. Wall was not fairly treated.

was a loyal and an able man, and well able, if in that House, of pleading the case of the island. The wishes of the colonists having been for so many years recommended by the Colonial Office, they had at length come to that House for redress. Our present dependencies, he believed, could be managed by us in a satisfactory manner through the cultivation among their inhabitants of two sentiments — namely, a feeling of loyalty to the Crown and a government of this country, and next a conviction that, whenever they had real grievances to complain of, and failed to obtain redress for them in other quarters, that House would at least do them the justice of granting inquiry. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Motion which he had given Notice.

R. ALDERMAN LUSK seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government,"—(Mr. Watkin,) instead thereof.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) asked that House to grant a Select Committee to enquire into the state of Ceylon upon two grounds. The first was, that certain complaints had reached this country from that island; and the second was, that the institutions of the island were decaying, and its population and prosperity were falling away, that general misgovernment existed there. Now, as far as the complaints were concerned, they were amply discussed only a few weeks ago, when the hon. Gentleman directed the attention of the House to the petition which had been forwarded from Ceylon to this country. The hon. Member had not adduced any fresh complaint. Four Members interested in Ceylon took part in that discussion. He (Mr. Adderley) stated the views of the Government on the subject, which were fully indorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the late Colonial Secretary, and the House seemed to be of opinion that no case whatever had been made in support of the petition. The hon. Member had now put forward statements of his own, alleging that the island was in a general state of decay. But he admitted that the hon. Member had altogether failed to change the issue of the discussion which had already taken place in the House of Commons on Ceylon. The sole ground of complaint was the military contribution which that colony had been called upon to pay. Now, the fact was, that the contributions which the colony had been called upon to make had been recommended in the Report of a Select Committee, who were of opinion that Ceylon ought to contribute towards the cost of the troops kept in that island. The hon. Member intimated that the colonists did not so much complain of the military contributions as of the number of troops. [Mr. WATKIN: I said nothing of the kind.] He had certainly understood the hon. Member to say so; and of the number of troops which ought to be maintained in Ceylon Her Majesty's Government was the proper judge. It was only when Ceylon was called upon to pay the military contribution that they heard of any complaints on the part of that colony. The statements of the hon. Member with reference to the mis-government of Ceylon and the decay of the prosperity of that island were not borne out by the reports which had been received in this country upon the condition of that colony. When it was proposed to place Ceylon under the Indian Government, there was a general outcry against the proposition. The hon. Gentleman stated that the population had fallen off. Now, the fact was that it was rapidly increasing, being 13,000 more than last year. Last year the births were 48,000, and the deaths 39,000.

MR. WATKIN said, that the colonial blue book showed that in 1863 the population was 2,342,098, whilst in 1866 it was only 2,088,027.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Gentleman had, perhaps, selected a year in which there was a great mortality; but the last accounts showed a great increase in the population. The hon. Member had adduced the increase of the revenue as a proof of decay, inasmuch as he attributed that increase to the imposition of new taxes. The truth, however, was, that it was due to no such cause, but to the growing prosperity of the colony, for the taxes there remained the same as those which had been levied for the last ten years. The next complaint of the hon. Member was that the Government had unwisely interfered with the railway speculations of the colonists, and prevented railways being made into the coffee districts; but that, too, was a statement which was not supported by the facts of the case. When it was shown that the state of the funds for making the railway referred to was satisfactory, it was sanctioned by the Government. The hon. Gentleman also complained that large taxes were levied upon rice grounds; but these taxes had been brought under the consideration of the Government, who had ordered that an inquiry should take place with a view to ascertain whether a reduction in them might not be effected. The tax upon rice was a tax per bushel, and therefore the increased produce of the tax showed an increased production. [Mr. WATKIN: The tax is in proportion to the value.] The tax had not been altered. The question whether the naval stations for the purposes of the colony should be maintained at the cost of the British taxpayer he did not think it necessary to discuss. He had frequently heard the hon. Gentleman complain of the burden thrown upon the English taxpayer to maintain such stations for colonies, many of which were richer than England. Why should not the people of Ceylon bear their share of the taxation of the Empire? Was all the expense of the Empire to be borne by a particular part of it? [Mr. WATKIN: Certainly not.] Under all the circumstances of the case, he did not see any good that could be derived from granting the proposed Committee. Since the Report of the Military Commission in Ceylon, the colonists seemed to be perfectly satisfied with the terms which had been come to, and that Report, he believed, would be strictly adhered to. He did not, he might add, at all agree with the views of the hon. Gentleman as to the government of Ceylon. While the Governor was responsible for the good government of the colony, he must have ample discretion in the management of its affairs; and if, as the hon. Member proposed, the majority of Members in the Council were to be elected, the Governor would no longer be in the position which an autocratic governor ought to occupy, who, being fully responsible, should have the power of conducting his own policy. The hon. Member had also fallen into a mistake with respect to the intention of Earl Grey, whose despatch contained no such promise as that indicated by the hon. Member. Earl Grey expressed a wish that the colony might become more able to take a part in its own financial affairs, and it was rapidly exhibiting greater capacity in that respect, for it frequently controlled votes on financial questions. The hon. Gentleman talked, not in the interest of the great population of the colony, but in the interest of a small section—the English planters—who had ample influence in the Council. He thought that no case had been made out for the inquiry which the hon. Gentleman asked the House to sanction.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK trusted that the Motion for a Select Committee would be agreed to. The Under Secretary for the Colonies had objected that the complaints came only from Englishmen in the colony; but Englishmen constituted the life and soul of the colony; and, if they complained, they ought to have a fair hearing. With regard to the population of the colony, it was true, as stated by the hon. Member for Stockport that its amount had diminished since 1863, though there had been some increase of population in 1866 over the amount in 1865.

MR. GORST thought the House had not only failed to dispose of the grievances of Ceylon, but had failed in understanding what those grievances really were. It was ridiculous to say that the matter had been fully discussed on a former evening, when, in point of fact, only four Members took part in the debate. Moreover, both the Under Secretary for the Colonies and the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) had misconceived the real ground of complaint. Although the statement that the military expenditure was not the real grievance had been proved during the former discussion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) had repeated his former statement. The grievance was not confined to any particular expenditure. It referred to the general system pursued by the Colonial Office; and the complaint was that the Colonial Minister of this country expended £1,000,000 per annum without the slightest check or control from any person in the world. [Mr. ADDERLEY: No, no!] Well, was that expenditure controlled by the House? The state of the House when colonial matters were brought forward showed that hon. Members did not take the slightest interest in them; and it was almost impossible to discuss them except when a Vote was proposed in Committee of Supply. On the previous discussion the House would have been counted out but for the accidental circumstance that the Government wanted to pass a Vote in Supply, and the result would probably have been the same on the present occasion but for a similar reason. Not only was there no control by the House over the expenditure in Ceylon, but there was no control whatever. Now, what was wanted was that there should be an efficient control vested in the colony itself. It was quite true that there was a Legislative Council, and that money votes were brought before that Council; but of the sixteen Members who composed it ten were official servants of the Government, who were compelled to vote according to instructions sent out from this country. He strongly urged the Government to consider the question, and to devise some means for checking our colonial expenditure. He believed that representative institutions had been granted far too soon in many of the colonies, and there was great danger lest the refusal to redress real grievances might lead to an extension of that practice. There was first a refusal to listen to just complaints, and then violent agitation having been excited, extravagant concessions were made for the purpose of allaying that agitation. He did not believe that the Colonial Office was at all ill managed; but he did think that at a time like the present, when the House of Commons took no interest in colonial affairs, it was desirable to provide some machinery by which the action of the Colonial Office in expending a sum of £1,000,000 per annum should be effectively controlled.

COLONEL SYKES objected to the assertion of the Under Secretary of State that the governors of the colonies must be autocrats. They could not expect any body of Englishmen to submit to a system of Government which deprived them of all real control over their expenditure. But that was precisely the state of things at present in Ceylon. There was a Legislative Council, but the Government officers by their votes rendered popular control impossible. He would ask, why were these Crown Colonies kept in the hands of the Colonial Office? The answer was, because of the patronage they brought in the appointments of governors, and judges, and others. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) was undoubtedly right in the view he had taken of this matter, and in bringing it before the House.

MR. CHILDERS agreed very much in the spirit of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Gorst) that it was almost hopeless to discuss any colonial question in the present state of that House. He also agreed with much that had been stated by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin). Ceylon had not undergone that rigid inspection by the Colonial Office which from time to time was required; and he strongly urged the desirability, if a Committee were not granted, of sending out a Commission to Ceylon to look very thoroughly into the whole system of administration there. Such a course would, he was convinced, be most beneficial not only to Imperial but Colonial interests. He believed the Government of Ceylon was not well administered; from careful inspection of official documents he could say that a great deal ought to be done with respect to the finance of the colony. But he should feel considerable difficulty in voting for this Motion, because it must be considered in connection with the Papers which had been laid on the table; and he was bound to say that those Papers disclosed such extraordinary doctrines that the House could not allow itself to appear to give any sanction to them. The whole of this movement was based on a Paper which emanated from the gentlemen who called themselves the Ceylon League. That Paper had been laid on the table, and he would quote only this one sentence from it—

“The public of Ceylon will, at present be satisfied with such a concession as will give them the enjoyment, through their Representatives in Council, of the constitutional right of full control of the local revenues, freed from the dictation of the Governor or the Secretary of State.”

The meaning of that was, that representatives of the white population, consisting of 3,000 should have entire control over the revenues without reference to the wishes of the Native population, amounting to 2,500,000. He thought such a position would be monstrous, and he trusted no one on either side of the House would support such a doctrine. But if the Committee were moved for on the ground of the bad Government of Ceylon, he thought there was ground for supporting it. The secret of the matter was this. Until within a few years there was no agitation on the part of the people of Ceylon with respect to the financial administration of the colony. There had been a considerable surplus, which was accumulating. Some years ago a Committee of this House reported that the colony did not bear anything like its proper share of military expenditure, and that that share ought to be increased; and the Government wrote to the Governor to the effect that there being a large surplus every year a portion of it should be applied to relieve the military expenditure. The planters then urged the Governor to expend more money, and the real object of the agitation has been to obtain for them not the power of refusing expenditure, but of increasing it in spite of the Government. Now that was not constitutional. Even in that House they could not force upon the Government any particular course of expenditure. It was such a system which broke down the Government of Jamaica. The agitation going on at Ceylon was that of a minority to force the expenditure of money in the colony, and thereby to reduce the surplus, so that the colony should not have funds out of which to bear their share of the military expenditure. It seemed to him that, by countenancing such a movement Parliament would be adopting a retrograde policy. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might properly object to the Motion; but he hoped the Government would consent to send out a Commission of Inquiry.

MR. M'LAREN said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had hardly done justice to the Paper which he had quoted. The paragraphs preceding the extract which he had read considerably modified that passage. The spirit of the Paper referred to was this:—That the Government officials in Ceylon had an absolute majority in the Council with regard to the control of expenditure. Ceylon was too large an island to be placed on the same footing as some small West Indian islands, and the people of Ceylon wished that un-officials should have a majority in the Ceylon Council. They wished that should be effected in one of two ways—either by increasing the number of the unofficial men, or by diminishing the number of the official men. He thought that was a very fair proposal. A remark of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that only a small minority supported this proposal, put him in mind of an anecdote which was related to him by Mr. Abercrombie, a former Speaker of the House. Mr. Abercrombie told him that at the commencement of the anti-Corn Law agitation a division took place in which only twelve Members voted in the minority, and that when he (Mr. Abercrombie), one of the minority, was marching out of the House to give his vote, he heard one of the Members of the majority say, "There are just a dozen of them, and they have not an acre among them." That, no doubt, was thought a conclusive argument by the Member who adopted it. He believed it was true, that the twelve had not an acre amongst them, but they had brains; and they inoculated the country with the truth of the proposition that they advocated. That truth prevailed; the majority of the House adopted it, and there was now no one on either side of the House who would say that they did not arrive at a right conclusion. It was vain to say as an argument against the demand of the Ceylon League, that only a minority were in favour of it.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that if the hon. Member did not go to a vote upon this question, he should, in future, walk out of the House whenever the hon. Gentleman brought forward any other Motion of a similar nature. He protested against the House being turned into a mere debating society. Hon. Members brought forward Motions of this description, and after they had impeded the progress of Public Business they withdrew them and the matter ended in smoke. He hoped that the hon. Member would press the question to a division. The very fact that the Under Secretary for the Colonies, and an Under Secretary under the last Administration, had combined in defending the present state of things in Ceylon, convinced him that there must be something rotten in the Ceylon Government.

MR. AYRTON said, that having spent some time in Ceylon, and having had in former times a pecuniary connection with the island, he felt an interest in its condition. Ceylon was a conquest of the Crown, and whatever might be the opinion of the gentlemen represented by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin), it was the duty of the Government to take care of the 2,500,000 of Natives, and not of the 3,000 Europeans only. In order to protect the Natives of the island, the supreme Government should be vested in officers who were responsible to the Crown, and not in a mock popular Council, selected from a few commercial European inhabitants. To place the supreme power in the hands of the Natives would only give rise to false hopes, and would be likely to lead to sedition and insurrection.

MR. WATKIN desired to state that he had said "Aye" to the Motion which involved the rejection of the Committee for which he had moved in the belief that he was supporting his own proposal. He had certainly intended to press the matter to a division.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE stated that all the Members in his neighbourhood had shared in and acted under the same misapprehension.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £59,920, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1869, for the British Embassy Houses, Chapel, Consular Offices, &c. at Constantinople, China, and Japan."

MR. MONK called attention to the proposed expenditure of £9,920 for British Consulate and Embassy houses at Constantinople. A new Embassy house was proposed to be built at Therapia. A most extravagant system was being pursued with respect to the Embassy house at Constantinople; and it was the duty of Parliament to take steps for the reduction of the sums charged upon the country for the purpose of maintaining that establishment. He would quote the following figures to prove how the expenditure had gone on increasing, and to show the enormous sums which had been voted for our Ambassador's houses at Constantinople during the last few years. In 1863-4 the estimate was £4,352, subsequently reduced by a sum of £400; in 1864-5, £3,200; in 1865-6, £3,455; in 1866-7, £3,000; in 1867-8, £4,000; and in 1868-9 it has reached the grand sum of £9,920. He pointed out that last year Parliament had voted a sum of £350 for iron shutters for the building at Therapia, which, if the present proposal were carried out, would be money thrown away. Twenty years ago upwards of £80,000 had been expended in building an Ambassador's palace at Pera, and since that thousands of pounds had been spent in keeping it in repair. He had been at the palace at Therapia, which was very pleasantly situated on the Bosphorus. He thought it was quite unnecessary to spend so large a sum for a new palace, and he hoped the Committee would not sanction the proposal. He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £6,000, the sum proposed for the new Embassy house at Therapia.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £6,000, for the Embassy house at Therapia, be omitted from the proposed vote,"—(Mr. Monk.)

COLONEL SYKES said, that the reduction now proposed was microscopic. There was an enormous increase in the Civil Service Estimates this year. They were divided into seven classes, and there was an increase in every class except two. In the first class there was an increase of £198,000.

THE CHAIRMAN called the hon. and gallant Member to order. The Motion before the Committee is to omit an item from Vote 1, and the discussion must be confined to that item.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had expected an explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury in introducing the Estimates. Failing that, he had asked the Speaker whether he (Colonel Sykes) could make his comments when the first Vote was moved, and the right hon. Gentleman had told him that the Chairman of Committees would decide. There was an increase in the Estimates this year of upwards of £1,200,000, and the country should be made aware of the fact.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

COLONEL SYKES: Then, Sir, I shall not speak at all.

MR. LABOUCHERE feared that the matter was not fully understood by the Committee. Not only at the Embassy house at Constantinople and Therapia, but at the Consulate houses, everything was in an exceedingly bad state of repair, and the real reason why Parliament was so often asked for money was that we had not adopted the best and cheapest course by pulling down the old houses and building new ones. His hon. Friend near him had spoken of the "summer palace" at Therapia. He (Mr. Labouchere) had had the misfortune to live in that palace; and the fact was that so far from being in reality a palace the buildings in question were simply three sheds, nothing better than an old farmhouse, and in exceedingly bad repair. When he resided there he could hardly sleep in consequence of the number of scorpions with which the house was infested. Those who had been much in Turkey knew that when houses became old and full of holes the scorpions multiplied with great rapidity. He believed, in fact, that the thin sheds at Therapia were by this time quite uninhabitable, and that instead of a few hundreds to buy shutters, it was far cheaper to spend £10,000 in one sum, not to build palaces, but a habitable house for the Ambassador's residence in summer. He would, however, ask the Secretary to the Treasury to defer the vote until after some communication with Con-

Constantinople, because he (Mr. Labouchere) thought he could show how the necessary house could be built without cost to this country. The Sultan had given to this country a tract of land, on which the present dilapidated sheds stood, with a large frontage to the Bosphorus. Now a frontage on the European side of the Bosphorus resembled in comparative value a frontage in a fashionable London street, and this particular frontage was a quarter of a mile in length. No Turk ever thought of occupying so large a frontage as this by his garden; he would place his villa on the borders of the Bosphorus, and let his garden extend in the rear. He thought he was not wrong in stating that when Sir Henry Bulwer was Ambassador at Constantinople, he proposed to sell a small portion of this frontage, which he estimated would fetch £10,000, and with that sum to build a new house. The only feasible objection urged against that plan was that the land was the gift of the Sultan; but he had consulted many Turks as to what their habit was when the Sultan presented them with estates, a thing which frequently occurred, as the Sultan, being heir to all who died intestate within his dominions, had annually a good many estates on his hands. They told him that they sold these presents; that it was the custom of the country, and that there was nothing in the act derogatory to the Sultan. On the contrary, they thought it would be complimentary to the Sultan to replace the three sheds by a handsome building, reared at the cost of a small portion of the outlying grounds. In fact it would be more complimentary to the Sultan to build the Ambassador's house out of funds so obtained than out of money sent from this country. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion, but that the Secretary to the Treasury would defer the Vote until he had had the means of communicating with Constantinople.

MR. KARSLAKE said, that as one who had spent much time in Constantinople, he knew of no Vote which the Committee should more readily sanction than this. If the Turks had been left to judge of England's power by what they saw among themselves before the Crimean War, their estimate would have been very low. England had nothing in the country to compare with the handsome buildings of the Russians; and though England's prestige had been lately re-established in the East, he thought it would be only prudent to make a little display in the shape of a respectable dwelling for an Ambassador.

LORD STANLEY said, that the sum spent on the iron shutters would not be thrown away, as the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) complained, because they would be used in the new building. Touching the question generally, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere), that the buildings referred to could not be called a palace; they simply formed a country residence of most unpretending character for the British Embassy; and, in answer to the question why they were not pulled down, and replaced by an entirely new and substantial building, he answered that this was precisely what the Government proposed to do, although the operations might extend over two years. At this distance from the locality, which was from personal experience quite unknown to him, he was prepared neither to accept nor reject the proposal referred to by the hon. Member for Middlesex; but he pointed out that, however worthy of attention the suggestion might be, it had no material bearing on the question at issue, because if, on inquiry, it was found prudent to sell surplus land and devote the proceeds to building the houses required, the sale could be effected at any time hereafter, and the Treasury could then recoup itself from the sum realized; the building must be paid for out of a Vote, and then credit might be given for the proceeds of the surplus lands in the Estimates next year. The question before the Committee naturally divided itself into three branches—Was a house at Therapia necessary? Was the present house in a proper state of repair? And, presuming these questions to be answered in the affirmative, was the proposed mode of dealing with the question sufficiently economical? Respecting the first point, he believed there could be no doubt. We had always had a house at Therapia; because Pera was very unhealthy during the summer, and because it would be extremely inconvenient if our Embassy remained at Constantinople during the summer, when the Government of the country and all the other embassies had removed to Therapia. On the second point—a Report received last autumn from the English Ambassador at Constantinople, stated that it would be hardly possible for the gentlemen of the Embassy to continue to inhabit the buildings unless something was done to them; and, as regarded the servants' portion of no building, it was simply unfit for human habitation. A recent Report, by Colonel Gordon, clearly showed the present house at Therapia was past all repair. With regard to the manner in which those repairs were to be executed, all he could say was that a gentleman had been sent out from the Treasury, especially charged with the duty of investigating them and other kindred matters, and the Government had simply abided by his Report.

MR. POWELL said, that if the ordinary repairs were on so large a scale as £2,600, it was evident that the buildings must be in such a condition as to render their total re-construction not only wise but economical. Having visited the Bosphorus during the past autumn he could testify that the houses were worn out, and that their condition was such as to render them a byword among the native population. The buildings had been handed over by a former Sultan; and the Ambassadors had suffered some inconvenience with regard to them on account of their possessing certain features of antiquarian interest.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK objected to the building of a palace for a country house. He feared that if the Committee voted £10,000 for the purpose this year, they would be called upon for further Votes for decoration and furniture next year or the year after. They had much better give the Ambassador a proper sum and let him provide his own house.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought it desirable that the Vote should be postponed until the noble Lord had inquired whether the statement made by the hon. Member for Middlesex, to the effect that a sufficient sum could be obtained, without calling upon the House at all, by the sale of part of the land at Therapia, was well founded.

LORD STANLEY said, even if it were determined that a portion of the land at Therapia ought to be sold with a view of recouping the nation for the expenses incurred in building, it would not the less have been the duty of the Executive to submit this Vote, in order to bring the expenditure under the notice of the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: But will the noble Lord undertake to enquire whether we can recoup ourselves in the manner suggested?

LORD STANLEY: I have no objection to make the inquiry.

MR. AYTOUN asked, by whom the plan for the new palace had been drawn, and whether it was by an officer in the Royal Engineers, his opinion being that officers in the Royal Engineers were incompetent to erect buildings of this character; also, whether an opportunity would be afforded to Members of acquainting themselves with the details?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the plan had been sent home by Colonel Gordon, an Engineer officer appointed by the late Government to superintend the Consular buildings and other works belonging to this country at Constantinople. The total estimate was £10,000, and, as it was supposed that the building would occupy a year and a half, it was proposed to take a Vote of £6,000 this year, with the intention of following it up next year with a Vote of £4,000.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, nobody would suppose for a moment that the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would waste the money of the country, but there could be no objection, he thought, to postponing the Vote. He believed that if the Embassy at Constantinople were made to understand that the building of the new house would be contingent upon their finding the money, there would be a much better prospect of the money being provided in the way he had suggested than if the House of Commons voted it in the first instance. Part of the land is now used as a kitchen garden. People in their senses did not think of having kitchen gardens on the Bosphorus. The surplus land might be sold for the full amount of £10,000. As to the suggestion that a Minister should hire a house at Therapia, there must first be a house to hire. Those Ministers for whom houses had not been built at Therapia were obliged, at great inconvenience, to go to Prince's Island.

MR. MONK said, he wished to know whether the plans had been drawn by Colonel Gordon himself, and whether the specifications were at the Treasury? Last year the House was informed that the Government had given this matter their careful consideration, and had come to the conclusion, that as the Ambassador was at Therapia only a short time in the year, a new building for a summer residence was not necessary. He asked the House to pause before giving its sanction to a proposal nominally to expend £10,000, but really to commit itself to an unforeseen expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the plan sent home by Colonel

Lord Stanley

Gordon he presumed was his own drawings; at all events, he was responsible for it. He did not think there were any specifications at the Treasury; but an estimate had been sent home by Colonel Gordon, and they were acting on his advice in the matter.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE contended that a large expenditure of this nature ought not to be sanctioned before the assembling of the new Parliament. He despaired of the present Parliament doing anything really practical or useful with respect to the Estimates.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the House having, in 1863, negatived the Vote for the employment of a civil architect at Constantinople, the buildings there were practically not under the charge of anybody with professional experience. When he came to the Treasury in 1865 he found that very large estimates of work to be done had been sent home, yet there was nobody to whom application could be made for information, the clerk of the works having of necessity been brought home and pensioned off, at considerable cost, in accordance with the Vote of the House. After careful inquiry Colonel Gordon, then Major Gordon, an officer of Engineers, who had other employment at Constantinople, and who was certified to be perfectly competent to superintend these buildings, was appointed with a salary of £300 a year, and was instructed to go thoroughly into all questions of repairs, and see whether it was proper to preserve the old palace at Therapia or not. Having made that appointment, he left the Treasury long before Colonel Gordon's Report was received, and knew nothing of what had happened since; but, knowing that if Colonel Gordon had not been appointed there would have been no one to do the work at all, and presuming that the Government had acted upon his Report to the best of their discretion, he could not oppose the present Vote.

MR. MONK asked, whether the noble Lord would not postpone the item till plans and specifications were before them?

LORD STANLEY said, he was anxious to consult the convenience of the House, but he did not think this was a case for postponement. The feeling of the Committee seemed to be that the preservation of the house at Therapia was desirable. It was admitted that the premises were tumbling to pieces, and it followed that some part of the expense of re-building ought at once to be voted.

MR. AYRTON suggested, that perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would be satisfied if the Government engaged not to embark in this expenditure till they knew its extent. The history of those buildings at Constantinople was a somewhat curious one. Some years ago a statement was made to the effect that it was necessary to take some means to secure the Ambassador against the danger of being burnt in the conflagrations which sometimes took place in that city. Upon that a house was begun at a sum of £14,000—enough to build a fine mansion; but the work went on until the Government had spent £80,000 and upwards. Then there was £10,000 for furnishing, and finally the expenditure reached £100,000. The amount spent annually in keeping the house in decorative repair was as much as the salary paid to some of our diplomatic agents at minor Courts. We had appealed to the eye of the Turks by providing the largest Embassy house in Constantinople, fine Consular buildings, a prison, and a hospital, and if in addition to all this the Ambassador was to have a country house rivaling the other palaces on the Bosphorus let Parliament first be satisfied that the estimated cost would not be exceeded.

MR. M'LAREN said, they could not have an estimate without a specification. An officer of Engineers had sent in a plan, and, according to his idea, the house would cost £10,000; but another man might have quite another idea—might think the house should be finished and decorated in quite a different way, and the house might cost three or four times the amount now talked of. Without a specification the estimate was a sham.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he presumed that the estimate of Colonel Gordon was made upon certain data, though the specifications might not be in the Treasury; and it would be a most unusual thing for a Committee of Supply to require a specification to be made out in detail for any public buildings. The Government had no intention of exceeding Colonel Gordon's estimate.

MR. OTWAY said, that although it was not usual to ask for specifications, it was the duty of the Minister before proposing a Vote to ascertain that the charge was a proper one. Officers of Engineers were the most expensive gentlemen to be found for the construction of any work, and their employment had cost the country millions. When a Royal Engineer was appointed to superintend a work another person had to accompany him to take out the quantities. They had no reason to suppose there was any specification in this case, and from the experience at Constantinople they might look for an expenditure of £40,000 instead of £10,000. He should recommend the hon. Gentlemen to divide against the item.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20 ; Noes 37 : Majority 17.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL SYKES wished to have some explanation of the item respecting Consular buildings in China.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK also wished to hear some explanation respecting the sums asked for Consular buildings abroad, especially in China and Japan. He objected to the present arrangement of the Estimate, which was very puzzling and prevented hon. Members from knowing precisely what they were asked to vote. He doubted the propriety of laying out the money which was asked for Consular buildings in Japan, and as an illustration of the necessity for mature consideration in regard to expending money in the country he referred to a paragraph in The Times' City Article of that morning, which mentioned that there was a town near Yokohama which was magnificent for a settlement, and was on the shores of a lake as large as the Lake of Geneva. Unless details were forthcoming he should divide the Committee on the item respecting Japan.

MR. CHILDERS observed, in reference to a remark of the last speaker, that the Estimates were now arranged in accordance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed a few years ago, and in accordance with the advice of the Public Accounts Committee. As to this particular Vote, in 1865 the Treasury, finding that large demands were made from the Foreign Office for Consular buildings in China and Japan, determined not to sanction at that time any additional expenditure; but merely took a Vote to finish the works then in hand, and sent out an officer to visit the different stations and report as to the requirements of each. That being so, it was much to be regretted that the old fault had now been again made of not giving distinct details in the Estimates of the sums required in each case. He might add that when the consular Vote came before the Committee he should take the opportunity of criticizing it. He believed they were retaining Consular establishments in Japan which were outrageously extravagant. With respect to this Vote he thought the House ought to have further information before it voted so large a sum. It was almost impossible to express an opinion upon a lump Vote of £179,000.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that the Government ought to be prepared to furnish some information as to the places where and the objects for which the expenditure was to be incurred. There was one source of expenditure of which the Committee ought to be made aware. We had succeeded in getting China thrown open to foreigners, and some of the most disorderly characters from Europe had gone there. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some British authority to control these persons. If by admitting them we destroyed the authority of the Native Government, we ought in some degree to replace it, at least to the extent of keeping our own countrymen in order.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he held in his hand a list of thirteen places in China and three in Japan at which the money would be expended. Of the total of £179,000, £50,000 was the estimated cost of new buildings at Shanghai alone. In addition new buildings were required at Canton, Foochow, Ningpo, and other places. The principle of this expenditure had been already sanctioned by the Treasury and by previous Votes of the Committee; and the total Vote was submitted this year on the principle that if the expenditure was to be incurred, the sooner the money was spent the better, for then the Government could dispense with the services of the gentleman who was superintending the outlay—Major Crossman, who had proved himself to be a useful public servant, had been sent out to Canton, and was responsible for the way in which this money was spent in China and Japan. There was every reason to suppose that he would conduct the business with due regard to economy. He might remind the Committee that large sums had been realized by the re-sales of land at Shanghai, at prices beyond its original cost; the aggregate gain would perhaps be £50,000 or £60,000, and therefore this outlay was not altogether one of money out of pocket.

MR. CHILDERS thought the Secretary to the Treasury was mistaken in one respect; for he did not believe that the House was committed to this expenditure. On the contrary, his impression was that no sum had previously been named as the total required, and this was the first year that that total appeared in the Estimates. Certainly it did not appear in the Estimates for which he was responsible; for he refused to adopt any sum until he received the Report of the officer sent out to visit all the stations in China and Japan, and report upon their requirements. Upon that the Treasury and the Foreign Office were to be responsible for the expenditure recommended in each case. The officer selected, Major Crossman, had, he believed, made very considerable reductions upon the schemes of the Consular authorities, sometimes to the extent of one-half of what they proposed. More distinct information ought to be given as to the intended expenditure at each place.

COLONEL FRENCH asked, if any Report had been made with reference to the matter under discussion?

COLONEL SYKES said, that the Chinese Government had never parted with the freehold of the land required by the English Government; they had simply let it to us at a rent. It was hardly credible that such large sums could be necessary.

MR. OTWAY said, that an Engineer officer had been sent out on a roving commission, who said they would require to expend £179,000, but did not inform them on what they were to lay it out. The Secretary to the Treasury had said that the Committee were pledged to the Vote by what had taken place last year on the subject. Now, he was informed that there was no Estimate of this kind last year. Would they commit themselves to sanction a Vote of £179,000, by voting a portion of it now?

MR. AYRTON said, that the Vote furnished an illustration of the way in which the House drifted into expenditure of this kind. Several years ago a distinct understanding was come to that the Government should never incur expenditure on public works in excess of the amount of the Vote proposed unless the full extent of the intended expenditure was stated. In this matter, last Session, the Government simply proposed a Vote of £20,000 for Consular buildings in China and Japan, and there was no suggestion that they were embarking in further expenditure; and yet it was now said that the Vote of £20,000 was a mere Vote on account, and that they were committed to an expenditure of £179,000.

VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the alteration in the form of the Estimates this year, in consequence of the passing of the Exchequer Audit Act, made it difficult for hon. Members to follow the Vote from last year to this. From the Estimates of last year it appeared that in the year 1866-7 a Vote was taken of £20,000 under the heading "Buildings at several Consular Stations." A similar Vote of £20,000 was taken last year under the same heading. On that occasion the Committee did not require a list of the stations at which these buildings were to be erected. He was willing to admit it would have been better if they had been given. The omission had now been supplied by the Secretary to the Treasury. It appeared that they included Canton, Foochow, Ningpo, Tien-tsin, and other places, the names of which, however, would not afford much information to hon. Members unacquainted with the country. Major Crossman was sent out to China and Japan expressly to control the expenditure on these Consular buildings; for it had been found by the late Government that the Consular authorities were more anxious to study their own convenience than economy, and were proposing works regardless of their cost. To put an end to this, his hon. Friend opposite sent out a person in whom he had confidence, to report what was really necessary. Reports had been sent home of the requirements of the different stations, and the expenditure necessary was estimated at £179,000. Of this, £50,000 was required for the Supreme Court at Shanghai, leaving £129,000 for the twelve other stations. When an officer was at that distance it was difficult to specify at which stations the building should be begun; and he was therefore instructed to begin building at such stations as it would be most convenient for him to superintend. It was difficult also to find out at such a distance where the money would be spent during the current year. The Government, therefore, could only act generally, and they came to the conclusion that it would be best to leave the control to Major Crossman.

MR. CHILDERS said, that this expenditure had been going on for several years, and although on the face of these Estimates, the House was supposed to have voted only £40,000, it had really voted much more. Having regard to the small number of Europeans at Chinkiang and another place, he thought it would be un-se to have these expensive Consular buildings there. He had great confidence in Major Crossman, and it would be well at his Report respecting past and future buildings should be placed on the table.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, whether it was contemplated to build at Pekin?

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that some details should be given of the expenditure in Japan, and meanwhile moved that the vote should be reduced by £15,000, the proposed expenditure there.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £15,000, for Consular buildings in Japan, be omitted from the proposed vote."—(Mr. Lusk.)

COLONEL SYKES said, that the Committee was left in the dark as to the mode in which this expenditure was to be distributed, as regarded the several Chinese ports. He would suggest that the Papers supplied to the House should state the number of European subjects residing at the places where these Consular buildings were required.

LORD STANLEY said, he must point out that in Japan you could hardly hire houses; for you could not hire the houses of the Daimios, and there were hardly any others that were fit for the residence of Europeans. Moreover, the system of hiring instead of building was exceedingly expensive. As the Committee were aware, two new ports were opened at Japan, and when new ports were opened it was necessary to have Consuls and Consular residences. In China we were at present paying £8,000 a year for buildings occupied for Consular purposes, and even then complaints were frequent respecting the accommodation. £5,000 capitalized represented a sum of £100,000, and the expenditure on buildings must not therefore be regarded as wasted, but rather as a reproductive investment.

COLONEL FRENCH asked, if there was any objection to produce the Report of Major Crossman?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there could be no objection to produce Major Crossman's Report. At all events a statement should be made showing the disposition of the money which it was proposed to spend.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK inquired, whether it was intended to build an Embassy house at Pekin?

Mr. Childers

LORD STANLEY said, that there was a very extensive, and he believed a very good Embassy house at Pekin. He did not undertake to say that it might not want repair, nor that some additional buildings might not be required; but there was no intention to undertake building on a large scale there.

MR. WATKIN complained that they had no information as to the total amount which had been voted from the beginning in reference to Constantinople and other places.

LORD STANLEY observed that a Return had been moved for which would give the information.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to know whether £15,000 was all that would be required with respect to Consular residences in Japan? Last year the House voted £20,000 for Consular residences in China; and this year the House was told that, because it voted that amount, it bound itself to vote £179,000 for Consular residences in China, for the purpose of completing the business. He wished to know whether the £15,000 now asked for Consular residences in Japan was only a portion of a greater sum, as in the case of the Consular residences in China?

MR. CANDLISH said, the Committee need not expect that by granting money for the building of Consular residences, they would get rid of annual charges with regard to the residences of our Consuls abroad. He observed that there was an item of £2,000 for ordinary repairs of the Consular residence at Constantinople. The buildings at distant stations seemed always to want repairing, and he thought that in such places it would be better to hire than to purchase houses. He hoped the hon. Member would insist on a division.

MR. CHILDERS hoped the Government would give some further explanations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the House had voted last year the sum of £10,000 for these Services under the head of buildings required at certain stations, and £7,000 the year before that, and besides this there was last year £5,000 for building in Japan. Major Crossman had sent over a Report with respect to the buildings which would be required in Japan, and he believed the sum of £15,000 would have to be spent upon them. The detailed Report, however, had not been sent home as yet. Unless the Committee would trust the Government in this matter the consequence might be they would have no money to go on with, and that, owing to the distance, Major Crossman's time might be, to a great extent, thrown away. The Committee must be aware that, in dealing with matters of this sort at so great a distance, it was impossible to have the same particulars and details as might be had in the case of buildings nearer home. A great deal must be left to the discretion of Major Crossman, who was on the spot, and it was therefore wholly impossible to give the Committee all the information they might desire. The late Government had acted very judiciously in sending out Major Crossman, and he trusted that the Committee would not, by its Vote on this occasion, render that officer's mission of no avail.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE inquired, whether Major Crossman was not at this moment in England?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was not; he was abroad superintending these works. He had recommended that expenditure should be incurred at thirteen places.

MR. NEATE urged that the Committee should trust the Government. The amount was not a very large one, and as they knew they had not a very flourishing Budget, it was the interest of the Government to be as economical as possible. His experience was that there was an excessive cutting down of the Estimates at the Treasury.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £8,000, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Fire Brigade.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1869, for the purchase of Ground and for the Erection of a House for Her Majesty's Mission at Teheran."

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he decidedly objected to this new Vote; because if it were agreed to, no doubt it would be followed in future years by larger Votes. Next year they would be told that the Committee had voted so much this year, and so the thing would go on. He wanted to nip the matter in the bud, and therefore he moved that the Vote be disallowed.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had always been under the impression that there was a very good house at Teheran. He agreed with those who thought it far better to build than to hire a house; but he thought that the Committee ought to have some definite information as to how much money it would be necessary to expend upon it. Were they, for instance, going to send out European furniture? If they were it might cost as much as the house itself.

COLONEL SYKES wished to know, if it was proposed to erect a new mission-house in Teheran, this never having been considered necessary before? We had had a mission to Teheran for half a century, and our Chargé d'affaires used to find a house for himself.

LORD STANLEY said, this was a great mistake, as there was a mission-house which had been built in the early part of the present century, and the land on which it stood was British property. Of course, it was very unfortunate that houses should tumble down and fall into such a state that they could no longer be inhabited, but so it was. The matter had been inquired into by two engineers on the spot, who reported that the mission premises were partly uninhabitable and partly in need of extensive repairs, and that the site was unhealthy. On these representations it was thought desirable to remove the residence to a somewhat healthier quarter. The old house and land would be sold, and the sum obtained by the sale would defray a considerable part of the expense of the new buildings, which were not intended to be in any way superior.

MR. LABOUCHERE had the same objection to this Vote that he had had to that respecting Constantinople. It was for the purchase of land for the new house; and before the Committee was asked to grant £20,000 for that purpose, he really thought that it should be told what was the price that the old site was likely to fetch. He believed that the present house was unhealthy, and he desired to know, what superiority the new site would possess over it in that respect?

LORD STANLEY said, a conjectural estimate might, no doubt, be furnished of what the land would sell for, but this would be of no practical value, as the price of land at Teheran could not be estimated beforehand, as it might be in London. The old site could not be disposed of till the new house was built.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he considered that the House was sitting to good purpose, after the Vote of the other night. He thought they ought to fish up their concerns, garnish their use, and set it in order for the new Parliament, which he hoped would be more economical than any Parliament they had ever seen. It was very wrong of the Government, when they hardly knew that they were any Government at all, except by suffrage, to insist on pressing new Votes. The best thing they could do was to complete the Votes already partly taken, and shut up shop as fast as they could.

MR. CHILDERS suggested to the noble Lord, as a large deficit in the Revenue was unavoidable this year, it would be better to postpone this Vote to another year.

LORD STANLEY said, no doubt it might be possible to keep the present buildings in repair for two or three years longer; but the price of land in Teheran, both for letting and selling, was rising every year. Ten years ago that which it is now proposed to do might have been done much more cheaply. He did not put it as a matter of extreme urgency; but from all the information he had, and the best judgment he could form, he believed the expense would be greater the longer it was delayed.

MR. GOLDNEY thought they ought to pass this Vote, after the explanations given by the noble Lord.

MR. CHILDERS said, that if the price of land at Teheran was rising, the value of the old site might be expected to rise in proportion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Treasury had accepted the proposition to build a new house at Teheran with very great reluctance, and only on the ground that it was by far the most economical step that could be taken. It was extremely undesirable that the Vote should be withdrawn; because they would have to spend a great deal of money in keeping the old house in repair.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in that case he hoped the Vote would be agreed.

If it was intended to build a new house in two or three years' time it would be mere folly to spend £2,000 or £3,000 tinkering up the old buildings.

MR. GREENE thought it bad taste for the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) to remind people who were going to die of the fate that was before them. He supported the Vote on economical principles.

Question put: The Committee divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 25: Majority 45.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK called the attention of the Government to the fact that in the case of Alderney there was some discrepancy to be explained. Of the total amount of £1,274,000 voted, £1,226,861 had been expended, leaving a balance of £47,000 of which £9,000, excess of former Votes, was to be surrendered; whereas it was now proposed to vote £56,000, which would exceed the total.

MR. GRAVES said, the sum asked this year for Alderney was £56,000, or an increase of £13,800 upon the amount voted last year. He confessed he had great doubts as to the propriety of any large expenditure upon Alderney. He had visited the place recently, and was quite unable to ascertain what we shall gain from the large and increasing outlay which went on there. The impression he had derived from his inspection was that they might as well throw the money into the sea as go on with the construction of that harbour, further than the most simple and speediest completion.. It could not contain more than four or five first-class ships, and it would take a garrison of 10,000 men to defend it. It was desirable to bring the expenditure upon these works to an end.

MR. CANDLISH pointed out that the sum proposed this year for Holyhead Harbour, together with the amount previously taken for it, would exceed the estimated cost of the works there. The Estimate had also been exceeded at Dover. He wished to inquire of the Government, whether any idea could be given of the total expenditure which would be required to complete the works at those Harbours?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE was not going to defend what had been done at Alderney. For the works at that place £1,300,000 had long ago been estimated as the sum necessary. When they had gone so far with those works it was requisite to go a certain length further, and not leave them in an unfinished state, which would be really dangerous to shipping. Whether the works would be advantageous to shipping under any circumstances was a point on which he was not called on to express any opinion; but the increased Estimate this year for Alderney was simply owing to the works being pushed on with greater rapidity, and not to any proposed extension of them beyond the point to which the original Estimate had been cut down. There was no intention of going beyond that; but it was of great importance, in an economical point of view, to have the works finished as soon as possible. He hoped the Estimate of £1,300,000 would not be exceeded. If it were exceeded, the Government would have to explain the cause of it; and if any fresh works should be proposed they could not be carried out without the previous sanction of Parliament. There was, however, no prospect of anything of the kind, and he trusted that the works at Alderney would shortly be brought to a close. At Dover there had certainly been some excess over the Estimate, because it had been found necessary to extend the pier and build a new pier-head, and to provide protection for the rest of the work. As to Holyhead, considerable expenses had to be incurred in consequence of a breach made by a heavy storm last year at that important harbour. It was necessary to repair the breach at once, and it had been done as economically as possible.

COLONEL FRENCH confirmed the statement of the right hon. Member (Mr. Cave) with respect to the breach at Holyhead, and said it was absolutely necessary to expend the money in repairing it.

MR. CHILDERS asked, whether, in consideration of the accommodation provided for the mail packets at Holyhead Harbour, by the expenditure of the sum of £6,500 mentioned in the Vote, the Post Office and Treasury had agreed with the mail contractors as to certain conditions with respect to time, which had been the subject of much correspondence; and, if not, what was required to be done before the Post Office would be in a position to impose fines upon the mail contractors for not keeping time?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was necessary to expend the sum asked for at Holyhead. He would make inquiries relative to the question of the hon. Member for Pontefract.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK complained of this continual outlay upon the harbour of Holyhead, which was simply used for a few steam packets.

MR. GRAVES said, he could tell the hon. Member for Finsbury that it was not an unusual thing to have as many as 300 vessels in Holyhead Harbour at one time. He wished the expenditure upon all their harbours was as profitably laid out as that upon Holyhead. He found that a sum of £496 was asked for Portpatrick Harbour. A very large outlay had been made on that harbour, with a view to make it a packet harbour, but he understood that idea had been abandoned; and if that were the case, why should the harbour be kept up?

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, that it was greatly to the interest of Ireland that they should obtain the best means of communication between Portpatrick and Ireland; and when the necessary amount had been expended it would ensure accuracy of service.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked, if the reason why the penalties had not been enforced against the packet company at Holyhead was because that company alleged that the contract for the execution of the necessary works had not been completed in a proper manner?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH believed that there had been a long dispute respecting this matter, and he would take care to inquire into it. He believed there was also some point of dispute as to time. It appeared that a sum of £9,000 would be surrendered to the Exchequer, but that sum had not yet been surrendered.

MR. CANDLISH remarked, that no answer had yet been given with regard to the item which appeared in the Vote respecting Portpatrick.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that this was the last time an item in connection with Portpatrick would appear in the Estimates; for he was glad to say that it had been decided to abandon that place as a port of departure for the mail packets. The difficulty had arisen in consequence of a Treasury Minute of 1856, in which the Government of that day undertook to make a harbour suitable for packet services. On the faith of that Minute the railway company spent a large sum of money, and the object of the Government had since been to come to some arrangement with the company on the subject. It had at last been arranged that the Government should lend the County Down Railway Company the debenture capital at a lower rate of interest than that which they were now paying, and that Portpatrick should then be finally abanoned as a mail-packet station. As regarded the Portpatrick Railway Company, although the proposition which they lately made was still under consideration, yet they had at last agreed to give up Portpatrick as a point of departure. They still asked, however, that the spirit of the Treasury Minute should be carried out, and that they should retain the privilege of conveying the mails from some other point. He believed that the whole sum asked for in the Vote for Portpatrick would not be required, inasmuch as it was likely that the staff would be got rid of in the course of the year, although it might be necessary to continue the salary of the superintendent until the repair of a breach which had been made in the pier in January was completed.

(5.) £37,310, to complete the sum for certain Lighthouses Abroad, &c.

MR. CHILDERS desired some explanation respecting a sum of £11,650, which was put in the Vote for the Little Basses Rocks (at Ceylon) spare lightship. Was it the case that this lightship had answered?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE was afraid he could not give any more definite answer to this question than that which had been given by previous Presidents and Vice-presidents of the Board of Trade. After careful consideration, they had come to the conclusion that it would not be justifiable, in the interests of navigation, to take away these lights, and that was all he could say about the matter. The advantage of a light was, of course, negative; and it was impossible to say how many shipwrecks had been prevented by it.

MR. CHILDERS repeated his inquiry as to whether the existing arrangement had been found satisfactory or not? Three or four changes of mind on the part of the department had occurred, but the House had as yet no information that the light was satisfactory.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE believed that a lightship had been considered to be the best and most economical plan, though proposals had been made for a permanent structure. The spare ship was necessary in case the other broke adrift.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK doubted very much whether they knew what they were doing. He did not know why they should spend the money unless they wanted it. He did not understand why they should take money away from one Department, and give it back through another.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN wished to know whose duty it was to report to the Board of Trade as to the advisability of these lights? Was it the Admiral on the station, or any other responsible person?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the report was made by the agent to the Trinity House. In the case of a colony, by the Colonial Government.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £51,238, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1860, for the Maintenance and Repair of the Royal Palaces."

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, this Vote was increasing year by year, and some explanation was necessary with regard to it. There was this year an increase of £14,293 over the amount of last year's Vote. He considered the expenditure enormous. He also noticed that the money spent on palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty was very large. £8,000 was charged for Windsor Castle, and the sum asked for Hampton Court Palace stables and out-buildings, including orangery and vinery, amounted to nearly £8,000. He believed that a certain class of persons were lodged in that place who did not wish to pay their debts; and an action had been brought in the Court of Exchequer against a sheriff for putting the law in force in the case of one of the inmates. He should like to know at whose expense that action was brought. He did not think it was creditable to ask the taxpayers of the country to pay such large sums to keep up these palaces.

MR. CHILDERS asked for some explanation respecting the item for the expense of the re-construction of Romney Lock and Weir, and for the removal of Old Windsor Lock. He believed that in consequence of Romney Lock falling into ruins, some of the water arrangements connected with Windsor Castle were interfered with, and it was originally intended that the expense of the repair of the lock should be only advanced by the Treasury, and repaid from the funds of the Conservancy raised under a Bill before Parliament; but it now appeared that it was to be defrayed by the present Vote.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, when the Conservancy Bill was passed £5,000 was given up to carry out certain drainage improvements, and power was given to impose a certain rate upon the owners of property, for the purpose of diverting the drainage. They were now asked to vote a sum of £15,000 to accomplish the same object, and they ought to see that it was not paid twice over. It ought also to be seen whether they were not in this Vote dealing with the drainage of the whole town.

Mr. BENTINCK drew attention to the item of £500 for cleansing and restoring pictures in Hampton Court Palace. They were not, it appeared, the property of the nation, but of the Crown, and the Crown ought to pay the expenses connected with them.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he could state that no part of the sum asked for in respect of Royal Palaces was devoted to the drainage of the town of Windsor. He thought we had a great deal too many palaces. The palaces which were not in the occupation of the Crown cost about £50,000 a year. The orangery, vinery, stables, and outbuildings of Hampton Court Palace cost £7,313. Now, those who resided in that palace were, from early association, rather reckless in their habits, and in order to point out to them the excellence of economy, he should move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £5,000. £2,313 was quite sufficient for Hampton Court Palace.

LORD JOHN MANNERS explained that, under the Act of 1866, the Conservators of the Thames gave notice that the drainage of Windsor Castle should no longer find its way to the Thames; it was necessary to divert it at a cost of £8,000, and there was every reason to believe that the plan suggested for the purpose would be found to work well. With respect to the sum necessary for the removal of the lock and other works connected with it, the Conservators had applied to the Government for a contribution towards defraying the expense of the works. Their request was that one-half the sum to be expended should be re-paid by Government, in consequence of the importance of the works for the water supply of Windsor Castle. The expenditure was estimated at £11,000, but the Government only proposed to contribute a sum not exceeding £2,500. In addition to that, the Government had been called upon to divert the drainage of Hampton Court Palace from the River Thames, and he hoped the plan under consideration would effect that in a satisfactory manner; it would cost £4,500. Under the head of Buckingham Palace there was also an item of £2,150 for cleansing the ornamental water. This explained how the excess on the present Vote had arisen. It would be found that all these additional items together amounted to £17,152, while the excess of the Vote over that of last year was only £14,293. With respect to the pictures at Hampton Court Palace, there had always been a small Vote for cleansing and restoring them. The collection was increasing from year to year; and was under the management of a very competent person, who bestowed great care and attention upon them; and when the hon. Member for Finsbury said these palaces were of no advantage to the public, he could only say that Hampton Court Palace was open to all the world, and the pictures were arranged in such a manner as to render a visit to Hampton Court not only extremely agreeable, but instructive. As to the gardens, they too were open to and much enjoyed by the public. A great portion of the inhabitants of the metropolis habitually derived the greatest possible pleasure from visiting the palace.

Mr. CHILDERS remarked that there was no claim on the Government for the lock referred to. There was only a claim for the machinery which sent the water up to Windsor Castle; and it could not cost £2,500 to put the machinery in order.

Mr. FAWCETT said, the Vote contained many objectionable items, but there was one he considered particularly objectionable—namely, that of upwards of £7,000 for St. James's Palace. He could not understand the use of this palace. Her Majesty did not reside there or hold Her Courts there. Recently Her Majesty's Courts had been held at Buckingham Palace; and if Buckingham Palace was not large enough for the purpose, he should be in favour of additional expenditure in order to make it sufficiently large. He could not conceive why they should sanction the extravagance of keeping up St. James's Palace, when at most it could be used only two or three days in the year, and when there was another palace in the neighbourhood. Everybody who had ever been at a Court at St. James's Palace agreed that it was a most uncomfortable palace for the purpose. He believed that the state of the finances, as it was to be described next ursday, would be most disastrous ; and therefore gave notice that, after the opinion of his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere), he should give that the vote for St. James's Palace be reduced by £5,636.

MR. LABOUCHERE quite agreed with the noble Lord that great pleasure was derived by the people of the metropolis from visits made to Hampton Court Gardens, and that money could not be better expended than in their maintenance. But he found that under Vote 9, ample provision was made for that purpose, and the vote of £7,000 odd, which he proposed to reduce by £5,000, was spent, not in the maintenance of those gardens, but upon the stables, vinery, &c. He should like to know who used the stables of Hampton Court Palace. The Court never visited there. He must therefore press his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN informed the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that when he intended to make his Motion, he must do so before the hon. Member for Middlesex moved his Amendment, as the Motion to which his Motion refers comes first in the Votes.

MR. FAWCETT then moved that the sum of £5,636 for Palaces partly in the occupation of Her Majesty, be omitted from the proposed Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £5,636, for Palaces, &c. partly in the occupation of Her Majesty, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE complained of the annual increase in the amount of these Votes. It was said the people went to Hampton Court Gardens ; so they did, but they had to pay to see the vinery. They went to Kensington Gardens ; but it was no reason for spending so much at Kensington Palace. Then there was a vote of £200 for incidental expenses, which was never there before ; he should like to know what that was for. He would support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Brighton.

MR. OTWAY wished to call attention to two inconveniences which attended the visits of the people to Hampton Court Gardens. The first was the small number of seats in the gardens and in Bushey Park. He must say he knew no man who was more disposed to attend to the convenience of the public than the noble Lord, and he hoped he would take this matter into consideration. The next was a matter that especially degraded us in the eyes of foreigners — he meant the meanness of charging a penny for permission to enter the vinery. He hoped the noble Lord would take this matter into his own hands, and make such arrangements as would remove this paltry toll so offensive to the visitors of the vinery by next Sunday.

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought that the number of seats in Bushey Park might be advantageously increased ; but he must remind hon. Members that additional seats could not be supplied without an expenditure of money. He hoped, if there was a slight increase in the Votes next year to supply this want, no hon. Gentleman would get up and complain of the extravagance of the Government in reference to it. With respect to the observation of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), he had been informed that it had been found utterly impossible to throw the whole expense of repairing the lock upon the Conservators, and therefore the Crown had been compelled to contribute its quota proportionately to the benefit it derived from the water supply at Windsor being kept up. With regard to the penny toll on entering the vinery at Hampton Court, he was not ashamed to say that he was not aware of its existence ; but now that his attention had been drawn to it he would make inquiries upon the subject.

MR. DILLWYN said, the House never complained of any increase in the Votes that were intended for the comfort of Her Majesty, or the convenience of the public, but they did object to expenditure that was entirely useless. There was no justification whatever for the expense now incurred for St. James's Palace. There were few levees held there which could not be held as well in Buckingham Palace, where Her Majesty now held her drawing rooms.

The Committee divided : — Ayes 8 ; Noes 82 : Majority 74.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE moved that from the sum of £7,313 for Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty, the sum of £5,000 be disallowed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £7,313, for Hampton Court Palace, Stables, and Outbuildings, with Orangery and Vinery, be reduced by the sum of £5,000."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE understood that, as he wished to move a still larger reduction, he must do so before the Amendment of the hon. Member for Middlesex was put. He therefore moved the reduction of the whole Vote by £15,000.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that he Amendment could not be put, inasmuch as it had been proposed to reduce certain items in the Vote. After such proposals had been decided, it was not in the power of any hon. Member to move a reduction of the Vote itself.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE had taken care to propose his Amendment in time; and was disappointed to find that his submission to the ruling of the Chairman had rendered the proposal of his Amendment irregular.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member for Portsmouth that his Amendment could not, in any case, have been put, inasmuch as it had been previously proposed to reduce an item in the Vote, and the House had divided on that proposal.

MR. AYRTON had always understood that the rules by which the deliberations of the Committees were guided precluded any Member, after any particular item had been decided, to move any reduction in an antecedent item. He had, however, never heard that, after the Committee had decided on particular items, it was incompetent for any hon. Member to move a reduction in the entire Vote, and, as he did not see how their proceedings could be carried on under the rule just laid down, he should take the liberty of moving that the Committee report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had acted under no rule of his own framing, as the following Resolution, agreed to by the House on the 9th of February, 1858, would show—

"That where it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall afterwards be put on the Original Vote, or the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without Amendment."

MR. BENTINCK asked, whether the pictures at Hampton Court were the property of the Crown, or of the nation. Were they not maintained by sums voted from the Consolidated Fund?

MR. FAWCETT said, he wished to ask, whether in the opinion of the Government, it would be possible to adapt Buckingham Palace for the holding of drawing-rooms and levees, so that the cost at present incurred in the maintenance of St. James's Palace might be saved, and the site of that building might be turned to some useful public purpose? If he were not satisfied on this point, he should bring the matter before the House on a future day, and move for a Select-Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the Question of the hon. Member for Brighton was one to which it would be impossible to give an off-hand answer. It was only after the most minute and careful inquiry that the possibility of adapting Buckingham Palace for the holding of drawing-rooms and levees, and the cost of such an undertaking, could be ascertained; and he was not, therefore, then prepared to give the hon. Gentleman the information for which he asked. In answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck), with respect to the pictures at Hampton Court, he apprehended there could be no doubt that the pictures were the property of the Crown.

MR. FAWCETT hoped that the noble Lord would make the necessary inquiries respecting the point upon which he had asked for information.

MR. AYRTON said, he felt it his duty again to advert to the question of Order already raised. If the rule laid down by the Chairman were permitted to stand, it would amount to a complete estopping of their privileges, as it would make it impossible to move anything but the reduction or omission of particular items. This was a question of such importance that the sooner it was brought under the consideration of the House the better, with a view to its being cleared up. In former times, there were no explanatory items; but now these were so numerous that the effect of the rule might be to cause their whole proceedings to be stopped by the most trivial Motion. For instance, if a Member chose to move a trifling reduction, say of £5, on an Estimate and divide the House upon it, no other Member would thereafter be permitted to move the reduction of the Vote, however weighty might be his reasons for so doing. The question was so grave in its nature that he begged the Committee not to proceed further until an explanatory Resolution had been come to by the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER fully concurred in the view of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets. It was most important that the Committee of Supply should have the fullest liberty dealing with the Estimates. They should be able to discuss the Votes in the Votes, as well as in their items, with a view to the proper control of the expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Resolution read by the Chairman was founded on a very distinct principle—namely, that the House should not divide twice on the same question. If the wish of the hon. and learned Member for the Lower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) were complied with, a very unsatisfactory state of things might occasionally arise. One Member might move a reduction of £5,000 in an item, and, though he might be unsuccessful, another Member might immediately afterwards move that the whole Vote be reduced by £5,000, which would be virtually seeking a decision twice over. Then, another might move a reduction of £5,000 in one item, a second might move a reduction of £10,000 on another item and be in a minority, and a third might propose a reduction of £7,000 and be in a minority also; yet, the three sections of the Committee who had supported these several motions might combine, to reduce the whole Vote by the three sums taken together. That state of things would cause great confusion, and prevent the Government from ascertaining with clearness what was the opinion of the House upon the question involved. For these reasons, he thought the Resolution of the House should be adhered to.

Mr. AYRTON repeated his belief that the rule would place an unreasonable restraint upon the action of Members in Committee of Supply. He insisted on the right of every hon. Member to question the expediency of any vote as a whole. In the case of a Vote of £175,000, there might be, as in this case, an item of £1,219 for "Albert Road." According to the ruling, one hon. Member who objected to the £19 made a motion to that effect, another hon. Member who wished the total amount reduced by £25,000 would be precluded from what was his undoubted right. To object to particular items was likewise, and generally useless; the constitutional policy was to move a general reduction of the amount, leaving it to the Government to re-apportion the smaller amount among the different items. The construction now put upon the Resolutions must deprive the Committee of one of its most important powers, and rendered it absolutely necessary that a supplementary Resolution should be passed upon the subject.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would ask the Committee to suppose a case where one Member wished to reduce a Vote of £200,000 by one-half, while another Member wished to move the total omission of the Vote. If the Member in favour of the omission of the Vote moved first, the other Member could not be heard; and if on the other hand the Member in favour of the reduction of the Vote by £100,000 moved first, the other would, according to the ruling of the Chairman, be precluded from bringing forward his Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he might answer the hypothetical difficulty raised by the hon. Baronet by saying that it would be his duty to decide such a question when it arose. Of course if the whole Vote were affirmed it would be too late to move any reduction; but the hon. Baronet had fallen into an error in supposing that any one could move the omission of an entire Vote. There was no such Motion. It would be a mere negation of the Motion that the sum of £200,000 be granted to her Majesty.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: That is no answer to my objection. When once an Amendment has been moved to any item of a Vote the Vote must be put, it is now stated, without Amendment. This precludes any Member who wishes to move that the whole Vote be omitted from doing so.

THE CHAIRMAN: If a Motion be made for reducing a Vote, and that be negatived, any other number of Motions may be made afterwards. The hon. Baronet talks of a Motion for the omission of a whole Vote. I say that no such question is put from the Chair. The question is put from the Chair that the whole Vote be granted, and the Member who desires to see it omitted says "No." But the rule is that when once a Motion has been put from the Chair for omitting or reducing an item forming part of a Vote, after that the reduction of the Vote itself cannot be moved. That is the Resolution of February, 1868, and it is in plain and express terms.

MR. GOLDNEY thought the position of the question was this. A Vote might be proposed in its total amount which any Member might move to reduce. If that Motion were negatived it would still be open to him to move the reduction of any item. The ruling of the Chair seemed to him perfectly clear. Supposing a Vote of £70,000 was proposed. It was competent for any hon. Gentleman to move its reduction by £30,000, and if this were negatived Members might move Amendments on the ten separate items of £7,000 of which the Vote was made up. But after these items had all been disposed of it was not competent to go back upon the whole Vote, and move a reduction upon it. The Amendment might be taken in the first instance against the total amount of the Vote, or against any portion of it, and if it were negatived it was still open to move a reduction in a particular item; but after the items were passed a Member could not move a reduction upon the whole Vote.

COLONEL FRENCH held that the ruling of the Chairman was correct.

MR. HEADLAM said, the practice of setting forth a great number of items in a Vote had grown up since the Resolutions were adopted, and therefore it might be wise for the House to consider whether some alteration might not be made in the Resolutions. But he did not see what good could be gained by prolonging the present discussion, since they had no power in Committee to alter the Resolutions.

MR. SANDFORD said, he had never listened to a more monstrous argument than that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Different sections of the House might be defeated in turn upon special Motions, and yet they might concur in thinking that the Estimates as a whole had not been framed with a due regard to economy. He thought some alteration of the rule was necessary.

MR. AYRTON said, that when the House next went into Committee of Supply he should move a Resolution to amend the Resolution read from the Chair, and to the effect that any hon. Member should have the power of moving the reduction of the whole Vote, notwithstanding that a Member might previously have moved the reduction of a particular item.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE entered his strong protest against the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Since he had had the honour of a seat in the House he had never heard from a Member of the Government such astounding language.

Question put and negatived.

MR. AYRTON moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Ayrton,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ;

BOUNDARY BILL.—[Buz 78]

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Ferguson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that as any discussion of the measure would probably be on details, such discussion could best take place in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. HEADLAM did not wish to oppose the second reading, but thought it right to tell Her Majesty's Government that in some parts of the North of England strong objections were entertained to the machinery of the Bill, especially so far as it related to North and South Shields.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE objected to the principle of the Bill, which was to take away voters from the country and place them in the towns, thus eliminating the town voters, who were really the Liberal voters. Without going the length of moving the rejection of the Bill, he thought there should be further discussion on this stage, and therefore moved that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Serjeant Gaselee.)

MR. CANDLISH did not think any one could object to the principle of the Bill, which was simply that boundaries should be altered.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 30th April.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, in rising to ask for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women, said that had there been any important Government Bill in the order for that evening he should have submitted, in the present state of the business of the House, to detain it with any statement at the present stage of the Bill which he should ask the leave of the House being in; but, as there was nothing of importance, he hoped he might be permitted to take this opportunity of explaining the object. In the able speech of last year which his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. Stuart Mill) advocated the claims of female ratepayers to the franchise the argument which had most weight with himself, and he believed with many others who voted with him, was that in which he pointed out the grievances resulting to large numbers of married women from the present state of the law relating to their property. He stated that, as a rule, the wealthy classes escape from the operation of the Common Law by means of marriage settlements; but that this course not being open to the poorer classes, they come under the full force of its severity. He said that if women had a share in the return of Members to this House there could not be a doubt that one of the first measures that would be forced upon our attention would be one for amending this law. The House rejected the claims of the hon. Member, and women would be no better represented in the new House than in the present. It would not therefore be unreasonable that they should take an opportunity of considering the grievances complained of. The Bill which he proposed with this object was almost identical with one which was brought into this House in 1857 by Sir Erskine Perry. That Bill had been prepared, after a long inquiry, by a committee of the Law

Amendment Society, of which the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was a member, and the right hon.
Baronet the Secretary of State for War an active supporter. The Bill was read a second time late in the Session by a majority of 120 to 65; but, notwithstanding this favourable start, nothing more had been done in the matter since that time. It happened that in the same year the Divorce Act was passed; and in the course of it a clause was inserted which, by giving magistrates power to make orders protecting married women from claims on their property and earnings by husbands who had deserted them, remedied to a small degree the evils then complained of. It was thought, he presumed, that, as something had been done, it was not desirable to renew the discussion on the broader question. In the course, however, of the last autumn a very numerous petition was presented to the Law Amendment Society, praying them again to exert themselves on this question, and in consequence another committee was appointed by that learned society, composed of able lawyers and others, who, after an independent inquiry, came to the same opinion as the previous one. It was at the invitation of that society that he now proposed the Bill. Before stating its purport he must ask the indulgence of the House while he stated briefly the effect of the law which was complained of. If he wished tersely and accurately to describe the present state of the Common Law, which regulates the status of nineteen out of twenty marriages in this country, he could not do better than take the words of Shakespeare, in which, when Portia gives her hand to Bassanio,
she says—

"Myself, and what is mine, to you and yours
Is now converted: but now I was the lord
Of this fair mansion, master of my servants,
Queen o'er myself; and even now, but now,
This house, these servants, and this same myself
Are yours, my lord."

That, which was then a true description of the Common Law, was true to this day. Marriage, in fact, operated as an absolute gift to the husband of all that the wife had or which would come to her during marriage. It was true that in the case of real property the husband could not dispose of it without the wife's consent; but he received the rents during their joint lives, and might dispose of this interest. With respect to her leasehold and personal property, it was absolutely at her husband's disposal, and if he was reckless or extravagant she had no means whatever of restraining his expenditure. If, in order to provide against penury, she earned any money by her labour, all she earned became the property of her husband, and all her savings belonged to her husband. It would be found, on looking at the depositors' books of the Post Office Savings Banks that a notice was attached to them stating that, although money would be received from married women, it would be paid over to their husbands on application. The husband did as he thought fit with her property, as, indeed, with his own; he was subject to no control on her part; if he was unfortunate it went to his creditors; if he was reckless she could not restrain him. Indeed, at Common Law the wife had no separate existence from that of her husband. She could not contract, or sue or be sued. She and her husband were considered as one person; but that person was not a combination of the two, but was represented by the husband alone. Blackstone, after stating the effect of the Common Law, remarked that the very disabilities to which women were subjected showed how great favourites they were to the law. No women, he thought, would agree to that. Nor, in fact, did the Court of Equity. It would be easy out of the practice and judgments of the Judges in Equity to pronounce the condemnation of the Common Law which it deserved. At what time the Equity Judges first introduced these exceptions it was now difficult to trace; whether it was due to the old ecclesiastical Chancellors or to the earlier lay Chancellors, like Lord Ellesmere and Lord Nottingham, who first transplanted some of the more equitable doctrines of the Civil Law, we could not now tell. All that we could say was, that from a very early date equity had recognized the separate existence of the married woman and the possibility of her having a separate estate. If Shakespeare had lived in the present day he would probably not have described the high-spirited, noble, and wealthy Portia as so completely handing over herself and her property to her husband; she would have made favourable arrangements for herself, and by means of marriage settlements and trustees have provided for a separate estate during marriage, free from her husband's control. It would not be uninteresting if he were to point out the various stages by which the Courts of Equity have advanced towards carrying out a more just policy to married women. They began by recognizing the fact that through trustees a separate estate could be secured to the wife free from the control of the husband; they then went a little further, and conceded to her what was called an equity to a settlement—that was, in the case of any money coming to her after marriage, they recognized that in certain cases the wife was entitled to a portion of this to her separate use, so as to secure her against her husband's improvidence. At the same time, they had proceeded very timidly and cautiously, not liking to give her all. By way of illustration he gave two cases; in one, a married woman, whose husband had become insolvent, and who was utterly unprovided for, became entitled as next of kin to £1,000. She applied to the Court of Chancery to have it settled to her separate use, free from her husband's creditors. Lord St. Leonards would not give her the whole of it; he directed £600 to be given to the wife and £400 to the creditors, who, he said, with curious logic, were entitled also to some compassion for their wives and children. In another case a husband had deserted his wife, leaving her unprovided for; he was living with another woman, under circumstances which made it impossible to suppose that he could ever return to his wife. The wife became entitled to £6,000, and applied to have the whole settled upon herself; the Court would not give her the whole, but directed one-fourth of the sum to be paid to the scoundrel who was her husband. Lord Cottenham in a case before him stated the grounds for giving a wife what is called her equity to a settlement in a way which clearly showed how inadequate the process of equity is for really dealing with the case. Lord Cottenham said—

“The Common Law gives to the husband the property of the wife, upon the ground that he is liable to maintain her, and makes no provision for the event of his falling or becoming unable to perform that duty. If the property be attainable at law the husband or his assignee at law, the severity of this law must prevail; but if it cannot be reached otherwise than by the interposition of this Court, equity, though it follows the law, and therefore gives to the husband or his assignee the life estate of the wife, yet withholds its assistance for that purpose, until it has secured to the wife the means of subsistence; it refuses to hand over to the assignees of the husband the income of the property which the law intended for the maintenance of both."

The Courts of Equity had not only given to the wife her equity to a settlement, and recognized the possibility of her having a separate estate; but they had given her in respect of her separate estate all the incidents attaching to property, the right to contract with respect to it, and to sue and be sued in the Courts of Equity. A woman's equity could be a separate trader; she could also sue her husband in equity; and the Court would in some cases hold him to be a trustee for her, and compel him to do what was right. Through these decisions in Chancery a system had grown up, under which, by virtue of marriage settlements, the wealthy classes, almost without exception, escaped from the operation of the Common Law. No man of position or wealth could dream of allowing his daughter to marry under the simple condition of the Common Law, no matter how favourable appearances might be. He would very properly insist upon a marriage settlement, to secure her against the husband's misfortune or neglect. If the lady were wealthy a portion of her fortune would be settled on her to her separate use. It rarely happened in the upper classes, therefore, that a wife found herself under the protection of the Common Law only; but exceptional cases were sufficient to condemn the law, and he presumed few persons could fail to recollect some case of hardship to married women, even among the wealthy. The very fact that the wealthy as a rule set aside the law was the best evidence that they were not satisfied with it. But if this were so with the wealthy, more so was it with the humbler classes. It was universally admitted that marriage settlements and trusteeships were inapplicable to the case of very small fortunes, or to cases where women were earning small incomes by professions or wages. The result was that these people were left without any protection from the effect of the Common Law, and the consequences were often disastrous. If the marriage turned out well, if the husband was prudent, trustworthy, sober and kind,

no harm resulted; but if he proved reckless, improvident, vicious, self-indulgent, drunken, or even only unfortunate, everything the wife had would be swallowed up, and her position would become one of great hardship. The fact that the husband had uncontrolled property in his wife's savings and earnings was then the fruitful source of wretchedness. It often acted as an inducement to the husband to become idle or drunken; it prevented the wife having that moral control over him which she might otherwise have; it sometimes took from the wife the motive for exertion, and urged the family downward in its career of misery. The Census showed that out of 3,200,000 wives in this country upwards of 800,000 were employed in professions and trades of various kinds. Almost without exception these persons were without the protection from the Common Law which the wealthy had found so necessary; their earnings belonged to their husbands and not to themselves. Yet it seemed that what a woman earned by her own exertions ought to be far better secured to her than anything even which comes to her by bequest or descent. If we reflected for a moment upon the number of those women who, having made an unfortunate choice, found themselves bound for life to bad husbands, some idea might be gained of the amount of unhappiness and wretchedness resulting from the operation of the Common Law, unhappiness which might be greatly alleviated, though not perhaps removed, by its change. There was, perhaps, no one in the House who had not become acquainted with some case of peculiar hardship. He could mention many, but would refer only to two. In one case a wife who earned money by her own work had, unknown to her husband, put by a little store in the savings bank against a bad day; her husband, a dissipated, improvident man, suspecting the fact, tested his wife by suddenly saying to her, "Do you know the savings bank has failed?" The poor woman fainted from the shock, and her husband immediately went off and drew out her money. In another case, which he had been told was very common, a married woman, who was clever and industrious and could easily earn money, had for a husband an engineer on board a man-of-war, whose practice it was to come back to his wife after his cruise, and in a few weeks to clear his wife out by living upon her savings and the proceeds of a sale of her small stock in trade. As he was not cruel to her within the meaning of the law, and as his absence on a cruise could not be deemed desertion, she could get no reparation; she had no resource but to submit to his periodical visitation. He would not multiply cases; they were matter of common knowledge, and he was certain there was no statesman, philosopher, or lawyer who, after a candid consideration, would not admit the Common Law of this country was unjust in its operation upon large classes of people. The only question was whether to proceed further in the direction of the exceptional provisions of equity, eating into the principle of the Common Law, but leaving that law still in the fundamental groundwork of the system, or whether to make a change in the Common Law itself, and to give to the married woman an absolute property in her own fortune, earnings, and savings. He believed the latter was the true course to take. The whole process of equity was really inapplicable to the great bulk of the people; the law itself should deal equitably with the case of married women. It was not sufficient to meet the case by expedients, which could only be brought into operation by ante-nuptial arrangements or by special applications. It was often too late already when these applications were made; and the great bulk of people did not understand or could not get the legal advice to enable them to take advantage of them. The Bill, therefore, which he ventured to introduce proposed to make a change in the Common Law itself, so as to prevent in the future marriage operating as a transfer of the wife's fortune to the husband. In the case of existing marriages it would secure to the wife any future earnings which she might make or any property which she might hereafter become entitled to, and in respect of such separate property the wife would be able to contract and to sue and be sued in the Law Courts as if she were a single woman. The change might seem a startling one, but it would not really be very great. He believed it would make very little difference with the wealthy; it was not proposed to interfere with the power to make marriage settlements, but in those exceptional cases where no settlement was made the wife would have there her own fortune, just as if it had been settled to her separate use under a marriage settlement. It was with the humbler classes that the change would be the greatest, and it was there the change was most needed. He would not on the present occasion deal with all the objections which would probably be raised. There were two points, however, on which it was advisable to say a few words. It would be urged that, as the husband was responsible for the maintenance of his wife and children, it was only right that he should have his wife's fortune. He had already shown that there was no legal means of enforcing this obligation of preventing him from disposing of the means of fulfilling it, and that equity gave this reason for its interference; but even where the husband did not part with his wife's money, but retained it in his hands, his legal obligation to maintain her was of the most shadowy character. It had sometimes been thought that the wife, when living with her husband, had a right to pledge his credit with tradesmen for the supply of necessaries according to her station in life, but a recent decision had shown that even this was not so. The wife was now held to be only his agent for ordering goods of tradesmen as long as he pleased; and if he withdrew his authority, even without public notice, if he only forbade her to order goods or to pledge his credit, she had no right to do so. The ground on which this was held was that the husband ought to be absolute master of his own style of living, and that it ought not to be left to a jury to say how his wife should dress. The husband might treat her, in fact, as Petruccio did Katherine. Sir William Erle said—

"If the wife, taking up goods from a tradesman, can make her husband's liability depend on the estimate by a jury of his estate and degree, the law would practically compel him to regulate his expense by a standard to be set up by that jury."

The reasoning seemed sound, but the result was that the husband's legal liability to maintain his wife was reduced to the merest shadow; if she lived apart from him, without any fault of her own, then it seemed that he was liable to tradesmen who supplied her with necessaries; but she had no direct remedy against him, and this circuitous process was of very little value to the woman. He had received information from two of the leading magistrates in London, showing what hardship often resulted to women who had been deserted by their husbands and who refused to support them. There was no means of getting at them, even though they might be making good wages in the same parish in which their wives were receiving parochial relief. If the legal responsibility for the fe were small, it was still less in the case of the children.

"However plain the moral obligation" (said Justice Blackstone) "that every man shall provide for those descended from his loins, it is to which the Common Law seems to have given means of enforcing."

The Statute Law had done no more except to provide against the case of the father allowing his children to fall upon the parish; if he did this, he was liable to be punished criminally. Short of this, he might do as he liked with his children; he was not bound to educate them, or feed, or dress them after any style appropriate to his own or his wife's fortune. Where the law had been content with the moral obligation, it was obvious that the children would be as well off where the father shared that moral obligation as where it fell only on the father, and therefore, on the one hand, no argument could be founded on this in support of the present law; and, on the other hand, it was not necessary in any change that was made to provide specially that the wife should be liable to contribute; it might be properly left to moral obligations. Then, again, it would be said that it would be fraught with danger to teach married couples that there might be a separation of interests, and that to introduce into any one the principle of separate rights, interests, and a separate legal existence would detract from the sacredness of marriage. That argument, if good at all, was good against the whole doctrine of separate estate as now allowed by Chancery under marriage settlements. It did not seem that in the case of the wealthy they attached much importance to this argument; nor could he ascertain that any real harm resulted from those cases within his knowledge where the wife has a separate estate; but we had a far wider experience to draw upon than the comparatively few such cases in this country. In the United States for the last twenty-five years the various States had been legislating in the direction which he advocated. They inherited from us our Common Law, but they had not respected it as we had. Some of the States at once went the full length of the present Bill; others proceeded by slow degrees, but now, almost without exception, married women had their separate property throughout the States. Vermont adopted it in 1847; New York made a step towards it in 1840, and completed it in 1860; Pennsylvania in 1848; Massachusetts in 1855; and the experience everywhere of the results had been favourable. The change had given great satisfaction. An eminent lawyer, Mr. Dudley Field, who was mainly concerned in drawing up the Code of New York, speaking on this point in public, said he did not believe there was a single person in his State who wished to return to the Common Law; every change had been in the direction of carrying out the new principle still further. It had not been found that any evil had resulted; the sanctity of marriage had not been impaired; the homes of New England were as happy as they were before, while cases of great hardship had been redressed, and the status of women, particularly in the lower classes, had been greatly improved. If he wanted further authority, he could quote from the recent Reports of the Indian Law Commission, composed of the most able lawyers in the country, Lord Romilly, Sir William Erle, Mr. Justice Willes, Sir Edward Ryan, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and others. They were instructed to frame a code of Civil Law framed on English principles, but with such alterations as they thought fit—a code which would form the general law of all classes in India, subject to the special customs of certain sects. [Mr. Lowe: Not of the Hindoos and Mahomedans; to the Europeans and Eurasians it will apply.] These Commissioners, after careful discussion, rejected the Common Law of England, and had given to married women their separate property and a right to contract. These recommendations had already passed into law. Could any one doubt if it were referred to the same Commissioners what ought to be the Law of England that they would report to the same effect? In conclusion, he would only add that just as there was no civilized country in the world where the law was so unfavourable to married women in respect of their property as in England, so he believed that there was no country where so much good was to be achieved in raising the status of women of the lower classes by giving to them their earnings and their savings. He did not take any sentimental view of this question; he refrained from expressing his opinion whether women were or were not the equals of men. He put the question upon expediency and experience. Let them have as far as possible fair play, remove unequal legislation, and women would then speedily find their true level, whatever that might be, for which by nature they were intended.

Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SNAW-LEFEVER, Mr. RUSSELL GURNET, and Mr. STUART MILL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 89.]

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.—RESOLUTION.

Resolution [9th February 1858] relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply read, as followeth :—

"That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment."

MR. AYRTON rose to move the following Resolution :—

"That the Resolution of the House on the 9th day of February, 1858, That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment," be rescinded; and that, instead thereof, it be resolved—

"That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, unless an Amendment be moved for a reduction of the whole Vote."

He had been induced to bring forward this Resolution in consequence of what occurred last night in Committee of Supply with regard to the Vote for Palaces, &c. In former times it was the practice of the Crown to make a general demand upon the House for certain sums which were considered necessary for the public service; and it was the practice of the Committee to express its opinion by granting the whole of the sums so demanded, or by diminishing it, leaving to the Crown the responsibility of applying the money to the necessities of the country. It was found that the Crown, instead of appropriating the public money in the manner suggested when the Supplies were asked, sometimes, by the ill advice of the Ministers of the day, appropriated the money for other and different purposes, and it was found necessary to provide means for more specifically applying them, and then the practice grew up of having the Votes divided under separate heads. But such was the disinclination of the House to any very minute investigation of the details of Supply, that the Government was permitted to apply any savings which might be made under one particular Vote to the purposes of any other Vote. That went on for some years, and it was competent for any Member to move to reduce the amounts. A few of the items of the great services of the country came before the Committee, and the miscellaneous Estimates in larger amounts. When the spirit of reform and retrenchment began to prevail, a new system was introduced—that of having each Vote divided into a number of items. In fact, each Vote came to be accompanied with a Schedule of explanatory statements. In 1857, when that practice had grown to a considerable extent, difficulties arose in Committee of Supply with respect to the expenditure for palaces and public buildings in the occupation of the Crown; and the confusion became so great that he (Mr. Ayrton) ventured to suggest that, when a question was raised as to a particular item, the discussion should for the time be taken on that item, and questions with respect to it should, at the close of such discussion, be put from the Chair. The subject was afterwards brought under the consideration of the House, and a Resolution was moved by Sir Denham Norreys, that if any question was raised in Committee of Supply respecting a particular explanatory item, that the Vote of that item should be debated, and the sense of the Committee taken upon it; but the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister and other experienced Members of the House pointed out the great dangers that might arise from altering a proceeding that had prevailed for upwards of 200 years, and a Select Committee was appointed in consequence to consider what was the best mode of taking Votes in Committee of Supply. That Committee agreed to certain Resolutions, one of which stated that, when the question had been taken on a particular item, no question should subsequently be put on a preceding item; but, when any reduction occurred, the next question to be put was that on the Motion that the Vote should pass. The Committee reported at the end of the Session of 1857, and in 1858 a proposal was made by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to give effect to the Report. With this object certain Resolutions were moved at two o'clock in the morning, without any serious consideration or discussion. Now, the point to which he had to call the particular attention of the House was that the most important of those Resolutions, instead of being identical with the Resolution to which he had just referred as having been adopted by the Select Committee, was not in ac-

ance with that Resolution. This Resolution was passed by the House—

That when it has been proposed to omit or amend items in a Vote the Question shall afterwards be put on the original Vote or on the amended Vote, as the case may be, without amendment.

I thought the real signification of that Resolution had not been brought under the notice of the House. It amounted to this, that if any Member in Committee of Supply submitted for the consideration of the Committee the omission or reduction of any item, however small, from the explanatory statement of a Vote, after that position had been put from the Chair, he could not be competent to any Member to move the reduction of the whole Vote.

The practical result was that if, on any particular Vote, a Member proposed that an item in it, however trivial, should be considered, every hon. Member would be precluded from canvassing the expediency of the whole Vote and its general effects. In Navy Estimates the first item was "Payment of Officers and Men." Supposing an hon. Member questioned the policy of maintaining the Navy on its present footing, of peace, the proper mode of proposing was to move the reduction of the number of officers and men. His objection was to the general policy of the Government. He objected to the policy of maintaining so large a force; and his mode of putting an expression of the opinion of the House was, to move that the Navy should be reduced one-fourth or one-fifth of its present number; but to cast on the Government the duty and the responsibility of determining, if the House decided in favour of the reduction, how the reduction should be carried into effect. His was a question, not of detail, but of policy. The item for wages was £3,036,000. He had a right to propose to reduce the number by 4,000 or 5,000 men. But, according to the decision of the Chairman last year, upon the Resolution inconsiderately adopted by the House, if an hon. Member got up and said he observed that we employed 195 flag officers, which he thought was a monstrous number, and that they cost £49,000, and he desired to reduce the number of the House whether there should be so many flag officers, and he moved that the sum of £49,000 for 195 flag officers should be reduced by £10,000; that was a proper Resolution; but then the discussion must be confined to that

This was a very reasonable and a very proper proceeding. But, if the Chairman put this Motion to the Committee, the Committee were thereby debarred from afterwards voting on the question of policy. Could it have entered into the contemplation of the House, when it passed that Resolution at two o'clock in the morning, that it had adopted a proper mode for conducting the Business of the House? It had been suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, if Members were at liberty to move the reduction of a whole Vote after a particular item had been canvassed, the same matter might possibly be discussed twice over. In point of fact, however, the particular and general questions were separate and distinct from each other, although they perhaps might, to a certain extent, go over the same ground; whereas, in order to uphold the Resolution, it must be shown that the two questions would necessarily and invariably go over the same ground. Again, the reason assigned by the right hon. Gentleman did not hold good; because, since these Resolutions were passed, it had actually been ruled by the Chairman, in Committee of Supply, that if an hon. Member moved the general reduction of a Vote, and if that Motion were carried against him, another Member might start up and propose a reduction of the items in detail. It so happened that the Resolutions did not prevent this from being done. But his difficulty was this: the Resolution expressly proclaimed that, if a Member discussed a particular item, it was the duty of the Chairman to put the Vote from the Chair; and then it could not be brought forward again. So that a Member had the power of preventing a general discussion of a question of policy. He (Mr. Ayrton) would amend the Resolution in this way: that, after a particular item had been the subject of discussion, any Member should be at liberty to exercise his constitutional right of moving a general reduction of the whole Vote. Was it desirable to have such a proceeding? He had heard the opinion of many Members of that House, and he believed that hon. Members would agree with him that nothing was more expedient, nothing more desirable, if they wished to enforce retrenchment and economy. He thought it most desirable to uphold that principle, and not endeavour to take out of the hands of the Ministers of the Crown the details of administration, but confine themselves to expressing an opinion that the expenditure was too large, and leave the Government to go into the details and ascertain in what way the retrenchment could be best carried into effect. He thought that both modes ought to be preserved. They ought not to allow any individual Member to deprive another Member of the opportunity of bringing any business of this kind before the House. The question was one of such grave importance that he had felt it his duty to bring it formally under the notice of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the said Resolution be rescinded."
 —(Mr. Ayrton.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that this was a matter of considerable importance, and he was not at all surprised that the hon. and learned Member who took objection to the proceedings of last evening had brought it before the House; but he thought it was not desirable to decide at once a point only just raised upon a Notice given at an early hour that morning, and of which many Members were not aware until breakfast time. It was desirable that hon. Members should have the fullest opportunity of discussing the Estimates in detail, and moving Amendments; but he did not think that practically the Committee were deprived of that privilege. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets thought that every Member should have the opportunity of moving, not only the rejection of an item in the Vote, but the general reduction of the Vote itself. He concurred in this; but he reminded the hon. and learned Member that it was still open to a Member to move the general reduction of the Vote, notwithstanding that another Member had previously moved the rejection of a particular item. That being so, a Member must make up his mind in time whether he would move the reduction of an item or the rejection of a Vote, and would wait until he saw whether an objection to a particular item would succeed. If no such rule were adopted, they might have two decisions on a Vote, placing the Government in a position of considerable difficulty; because it might happen that the Committee would not entertain Amendments for the rejection of a particular item, and adopt that for a general reduction of the Vote, the consequence of which would be that the House having affirmed the item to which objection had been taken, the other items which had not been objected to would suffer in consequence of the general reduction of the Vote. For instance, if in Committee on the Navy Estimates it was affirmed that 195 flag officers were necessary, and the whole Vote was afterwards reduced, the Government would have considerable difficulty in saying how the reduction should be apportioned. He quite agreed that in all cases the better and more constitutional way was to move the general reduction of a Vote; but if the Committee took on itself to discriminate and to affirm an item which had been objected to, it was rather hard on the Government that they were to be called on to reduce others in the Vote. He admitted that there was considerable force in the objection of the hon. and learned Member; but, at the same time, he should be sorry to see the existing rule rescinded.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that as it appeared likely that this matter would go back for re-consideration, he might be permitted to suggest a further point. The Motion of his hon. and learned Friend was on a very important and very valuable subject, and formed part of the largest questions. The rules which, in the course of centuries, had been elaborated in this House for the conduct of the Business had been most deservedly admired. But difficulties might arise when the House could only have one Amendment on the same point; because, as soon as one Amendment had been rejected, it had resolved that the original Motion should be put unamended. It might be well for the House to examine this point. According to the rule of the French Chamber, whatever number of Amendments there might be moved, the question of precedence was decided in this way:—The Amendment which was farthest from the original Motion was put first, and if this were lost, the others were put in succession. Might it not be as well to adopt the plan here?

MR. CHILDERS said, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had concluded his speech without making any recommendation to the House. In fact, the matter ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and he wished to know if his right hon. Friend had any objection to the adoption of that course; or did he merely propose the adjournment of the subject to a future day? He understood his right hon. Friend to say that if a particular item was objected to and discussed, the decision on that item must be conclusive as to the judgment of the Committee on the whole Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : The rule laid down by the Chairman last night was, that after the decision of the Committee had been taken on a particular item in the Vote, it was not competent to an hon. Member to move the rejection of the whole Vote.

MR. CHILDERS was quite aware of the fact, but he also understood the right of a Gentleman to contend that that rule was quite right ; because if it was afterwards competent to the Committee to reject the whole Vote, the Government would be in a difficulty with respect to its distribution among items unobjected to ; but he thought this hardly a conclusive objection. It often happened that while some hon. Member who objected to the whole Vote on general grounds of economy, not possessing the necessary information, which was the possession of the Government, to enable him to point out objections to particular items, adopted the plan of moving the general reduction of the Vote, there were others who, from having filled official positions, or having devoted themselves very assiduously to the study of successive Estimates, were enabled to point out the objectionable increase of particular items, and therefore moved their rejection or reduction. He certainly did not think that a Member who wished to move a general reduction ought to be precluded from doing so by the rejection of an Amendment reducing a particular item ; and he suspected his right hon. friend was in error in supposing that after an hon. Member had moved the general reduction of a Vote, a particular item could not be discussed. The form of the Amendment relating to the whole Vote precluded such a course. But he would take higher ground. It was for the interest of the Government, and of every Member of the House, to what party they might belong, to give the fullest and freest discussion to any criticism of the Estimates. The present process did not preclude the House from criticising the Estimates in the way which they wished. The present course might be convenient to the Government at the time ; but he ventured to say that it would be more to their interest, and that of the public service if a freer and better criticism of the Estimates could be obtained. If the adoption of the present rule precluded hon. Members from dealing with the Votes in the way which they desired, there would be always complaints till it was altered. The new arrangement might involve more time than that at present occupied ; but he was sure the extra discussion would be for the benefit of the public service.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he could not understand how the ruling of the Chairman last night interfered in any way with the privileges or powers of hon. Members in criticizing the Votes. He believed he was right in saying that the effect of the present rules was this, that when the Vote was read from the Chair, any hon. Member might move that it be reduced. If that opportunity were not taken advantage of, and the items of which the Vote consisted had been gone through and discussed and passed, it was not then in the power of any Member to move the reduction of the Vote by any particular sum, though he could still divide the House on the question that the whole Vote be rejected. This seemed to him to be a common-sense and practical method of conducting Supply. It could give rise to no actual inconvenience if hon. Members clearly understood the effect of the rule, and he saw no ground for assenting to refer the point to the consideration of a Committee.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he could see no good cause of complaint against the course pursued. He did not see that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) had made out the slightest case ; but if the House thought differently, he suggested that the question should be referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

MR. DISRAELI said, he was a Member of the Committee of 1858, and very much approved of the Resolutions then arrived at. With regard to the point now under discussion, his impression was not in favour of the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) ; but he admitted the gravity of the point, and should like a longer time for its consideration. After what occurred last night, he had no idea that they would be called on to decide the point to-day. It did not appear to him to be a point which should be submitted to a Select Committee. It was a question which would be best discussed in open Chamber, and he thought they would be most likely to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in that way. He would therefore suggest the adjournment of the debate, so that they might come to some decision after due consideration. He wished it to be understood that he was not pledged to anything, and should be ready to listen to any suggestion that should be made. If, however, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets did not object, he should now move the adjournment of the debate till this day week.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. GILPIN said, he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, instead of carrying out the punishment of death within prisons, that Capital Punishment should be abolished."

He felt some difficulty and hesitation in asking the attention of the House to the Motion of which he had given notice. In the first instance, he would express his extreme regret at the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart), whose name had been so closely connected with the amelioration of the criminal law, and who had done so much to abolish capital punishment. His reason for bringing forward this Motion now was, that he had a strong conviction that capital punishment was inexpedient and unnecessary; that it did not ensure the purposes for which it was enacted; that it was unjust in principle; that it involved not unfrequently the sacrifice of innocent human life; and further, that it afforded an escape for many guilty of atrocious crimes. Holding these opinions, he could not permit to pass an Act which proposed to re-enact the punishment of death without entering his solemn protest against it, and submitting the reasons why he thought it inexpedient that capital punishment should be inflicted. The late division on this question was no test whatever of the feeling of the House on the question of capital punishment. He was now asked, "Will you bring forward a Motion for the abolition of capital punishment in the face of the frequent murders, of the increase of the crime of murder—at a time when no doubt there are influences at work"—to which he would not particularly allude—"which aggravate the crime to an extent almost unprecedented?" He unhesitatingly replied, "Yes; I will bring it forward now, because, if my principle is good for anything, it is good at all times and under all circumstances." He would remind the House that the atrocious murders which were now being committed, and which they all so much deplored, were murders which were committed under the present law, and he believed would not be committed under the altered state of the law which he desired to introduce. The question he had to deal with was—by what means could they best stop the crime of murder? He disavowed emphatically any sympathy with crime—he disavowed any maudlin sentimentality with respect to this question. He was sure his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) would agree with him that the question between them was, how best to prevent the crime of murder. He said, without fear of contradiction, that almost in every instance in which capital punishment had ceased to be inflicted for certain crimes those crimes had lessened in frequency and enormity since its abolition; yet, as regarded murder, where the punishment of death was still retained, the crime had increased not only in number but enormity. In proof of that allegation he might quote statistics; but the fact was well known, and he would not take up the time of the House by doing so. It was also not to be denied that this was a question upon which there had been a very considerable change in public opinion within a comparatively short period of time. Some of those who had the administration of the law in their hands, and some of those who had occupied the position of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), had come to the conclusion, at which he arrived many years ago, that capital punishment was undesirable—that it was unnecessary—and that the time had arrived when some other system ought to be adopted. Surely they were not succeeding in putting down murder. They had for centuries tried the lex talionis—the life for life principle—and they had miserably failed, and murder still stalked abroad. Earl Russell, in the introduction to the new edition of his work on the English Constitution, thus expressed himself as being favourable to the abolition of capital punishment—

"For my own part, I do not doubt for a moment either the right of a community to inflict the punishment of death, or the expediency of exercising that right in certain states of society. But when I turn from that abstract right and that abstract expediency to our own state of society—when I consider how difficult it is for any Judge to separate the case which requires inflexible justice from that which admits the force of mitigating circumstances—how invidious the task of the Secretary of State in dispensing the mercy of the Crown—how critical the comments made by the public—how soon the object of general horror becomes the theme of sympathy and pity—how narrow and how limited the examples given by his condign and awful punishment—how brutal the scene of execution—I come to the conclusion that nothing would be lost to justice, nothing lost to the preservation of innocent life, if the punishment of death were altogether abolished. In that case a sentence of a long term of separate confinement, followed by another term of hard labour and hard fare, would cease to be considered as an extension of mercy. If the sentence of the Judge were to that effect, there would scarcely ever be a petition for remission of punishment, in cases of murder, sent to the Home Office. The guilty, undisturbed, would have time and opportunity to turn repentant to the Throne of Mercy.”

Now, the first objection which he (Mr. Gilpin) had to the punishment of death was its essential injustice. They gave the same punishment to the crime of a Rush and a Manning as they did to that of a Samuel Wright, and other less guilty persons. They had, under the present law, constant occurrences in which the feeling, intellect, judgment, and Christianity of the public were against carrying out the extreme penalty, even in cases where the law was clear and unmistakable as to the matter and there was every reason to believe that it had been justly administered by the Judge who had condemned the criminal. Take, for instance, the case of the woman Charlotte Harris. She was sentenced to death, being enceinte at the time. According to custom she was relieved until her babe was born, and then the sentence of the law had taken its course she would have been hanged; but public opinion in the meantime had become so strong that the Home Office, even, he believed, in opposition to the judgment of the Secretary of State, had to give way, though the case was a fearful and atrocious one, and her life was spared. Richard Cobden, writing to him (Mr. Gilpin) with reference to this case, said—

“You are right. It is truly horrible to think of nursing a woman through her confinement, and then with her first returning strength to walk her to the scaffold! What is to become of the baby at its birth? is it to lie upon the mother's breast until removed by the hand of Calcraft? Oh, horrible! horrible! Could you not have a meeting to shame the authorities.”

Well, there were several meetings—one of 1,000 women, headed by Mary Howitt, and they petitioned the Throne for mercy, and mercy was extended. Then there was the case of Alice Holt. She, too, was pregnant; but the Home Office, having got wiser by this time, would not bring her to trial until after the birth of her child. Then they brought her to trial, sentenced her to death, and carried out the execution. Against the injustice of such a proceeding he had at the time most earnestly protested. A practical point most serious to the interests of society was this: numbers of criminals had escaped from the punishment due to their crimes, because of the unwillingness of juries to incur the possibility of convicting the innocent. He believed it was on this ground that Mr. Waddington, the former Under Secretary at the Home Office, came almost to the opinions that he (Mr. Gilpin) entertained. He knew it did not appear in his evidence before the Royal Commission; but Mr. Waddington told him though looking at the matter from a different stand-point and urged by different arguments, still he had very nearly come to his (Mr. Gilpin's) opinions that it would be desirable for the interests of society at large that the abolition of capital punishment should take place. He (Mr. Gilpin) believed it was not too much to say that there were men and women walking about red-handed amongst us—persons unquestionably guilty of the most atrocious murders—who, had the punishment for their crimes been other than capital, would be now immured in prison, utterly unable to repeat such crimes as those for which they had been already tried. This arose from the unwillingness of juries to convict—an unwillingness which did them honour—unless they had evidence positive and indisputable. It was right that evidence which would suffice to convict a man where the punishment would be fourteen years, or imprisonment for life, should be regarded as utterly insufficient to convict a man when the sentence would send him out of the world. Some twenty years ago Charles Dickens wrote a series of letters in The Daily News on the subject of capital punishment; and in one, headed “How Jurymen Feel,” he said—

“Juries, like society, are not stricken foolish or motionless. They have, for the most part, an objection to the punishment of death; and they will, for the most part, assert it by such verdicts. As jurymen in the forgery cases (where jurors found a £10 note to be worth 39s., so as not to come under capital punishment) would probably reconcile their verdict to their consciences by calling to mind that the intrinsic value of a bank-note was almost nothing; so jurymen, in cases of murder, probably argue that grave doctors have said all men are more or less mad, and therefore they believe the prisoner mad. This is a great wrong to society; but it arises out of the punishment of death. And the question will always suggest itself in jurors' minds, however earnestly the learned Judge presiding may discharge his duty—which is the greater wrong to society!—to give this man the benefit of the possibility of his being mad, or to have another public execution, with all its depraving and hardening influences? Imagining myself a juror, in a case of life or death, and supposing that the evidence had forced me from every other ground of opposition to this punishment in the particular case than a possibility of immediate mistake or otherwise, I would go over it again on this ground, and, if I could by any reasonable special pleading with myself find him mad rather than hang him, I think I would."

He had alluded to the numbers of persons who had escaped justice altogether, because juries could not make up their minds to convict under such circumstances; but there was another view of the case, and that was the execution of innocent persons, and when he said innocent persons, he meant persons innocent of the crimes with which they were charged. He would not delay the House by quoting what he quoted on a former occasion—the evidence of Daniel O'Connell, or the evidence of the present Lord Chief Baron, as to the frequency of the execution of innocent persons. But he would call the attention of the House to a case which occurred in 1865—that was the Italian Pollizzioni, who was tried for the Saffron Hill murder, when one of the most humane of our Judges expressed his entire belief that the conviction was right. Pollizzioni was sentenced, and was within a few days of being hanged. Law had done its best and its worst, when Mr. Negretti—of the firm of Negretti and Zambra—heard of the case, and became convinced that the man was innocent. He busied himself in getting evidence, which at last satisfied the Home Secretary, not that the prisoner deserved secondary punishment, but that he was absolutely innocent, and then he was taken out of the condemned cell. But for the interference of a private individual this man would have been hanged. It might be said that a case like this was very exceptional, and God forbid that it should be frequent; but within a few months there was the case of another man at Swansea, Giardinieri—oddly enough, also an Italian—who was sentenced to death, and was within a short time of being hanged. Evidence was, however, procured which showed him to be innocent. These were solemn facts. Charles Dickens said—

"I entreat all who may chance to read this letter to pause for an instant, and ask themselves whether they can remember any occasion on which they have in the broad day, and under circumstances the most favourable to recognition, mistaken one person for another, and believed that in a perfect stranger they have seen going away from them, or coming towards them, a familiar friend."

Hence there should be a reasonable hesitation as to an irrevocable verdict. The frequency of cases of mistaken identity were notorious. Mr. Visschers, who held a high position in the Government of the King of the Belgians, stated that in his experience three men convicted of murder appealed to the Court of Cassation, when the conviction was confirmed. The King, however, commuted their sentence into one of perpetual imprisonment; but their innocence being afterwards established, they were liberated, and granted annuities for life. Mr. Serjeant Parry stated, in reply to a Question by Mr. Waddington—

"I could mention six or eight instances within my own knowledge in which men have been acquitted, purely upon the ground that the punishment was capital."

And in reply to Mr. Bright, the learned gentleman said—

"I know that juries have acquitted men clearly and beyond all doubt guilty of murder, and some of the very worst murders that have ever been committed in this country, and have done so simply because the punishment has been the punishment of death. They would have convicted if the punishment had been imprisonment for life, or any punishment short of taking the life of the man, and they have seized hold of any excuse rather than be agents in putting capital punishment into operation."

This was not unreasonable; because a man, if wrongly transported, as in the case of Mr. Barber, the solicitor, could have compensation made to him, but not so if wrongly hanged. Many years ago Sir James Mackintosh stated before a Committee on the Criminal Laws that during a long cycle of years an average of one person was executed every three years whose innocence was afterwards proved. And Sir Fitz Roy Kelly stated, in 1839, that there were no less than fourteen innocent persons within the first forty years of this century who had been convicted, and whose innocence since their death had been fully established. And doubtless the average of one innocent person every three years was much too low, because it should be remembered that after the person was executed there was no motive to discover whether he or she were innocent or not. It was only necessary again to refer to the well-known case of Samuel Wright, a working carpenter in Southwark, to show the inequality of the law, and that, resulting simply from the character of the punishment. He believed no jury could have found Wright guilty on the charge of murder, and that no Judge but he would have left him for execution. The prisoner, it was true, pleaded guilty to the crime, and neither the counsel nor the Court could induce him to retract the plea; but it was clear from the facts of the case that this was not a case of wilful murder. The man was awake in the night, and was dragged out of bed by a violent woman with whom he lived. He struggled with her, and seizing his razor, which was lying in his way, without premeditation he killed her. He was brought for trial, and he pleaded guilty. They could not expect a carpenter to be trained to the niceties of the law, and it could not be wondered at that he, a conscientious man, determined to plead guilty. Almost at the same moment a very large body of his fellow-working men came up to the Home Office and plead that his life might be spared. The present Government was not then in office. [Mr. Buxton: Who was the Home Secretary?] His right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey). It was thought, most unwisely in his opinion, that the appearance of so large a body of working men on such a subject was an attempt to terrorise the Home Office, and a deaf ear was turned to their pleadings, which might wisely have been granted. Samuel Wright was executed, and that in the face of Charlotte Windsor, the hired orderess of babies, who, to solve some of the subtleties of law, was brought from one part of England to another, and after being only imprisoned for life. He could never forget the morning of that execution. The people in the neighbourhood, instead of rushing to see the execution, had their heads drawn down. It was a case which would take a long time to wipe out from the memories of the people of that neighbourhood. That happened about the time that Townley, another murderer, was acquitted on the ground of insanity—a plea which his subsequent suicide showed to be true. But the question of insanity was one of the most uncertain character; the dividing line was disputed by doctors, and was a by doctors in divinity; and the result was that in the case of men who were executed no time was allowed to show whether the crime was the result of a diseased brain, or of that moral obliquity which was rightly the subject of punishment. He felt grateful to the House for the indulgence they had shown him on a subject which had occupied his attention for twenty years. Now, he would ask, what was capital punishment? The punishment of death? No, it was not that. The sentence of death was decreed upon all of us by a higher than a mortal Judge. We but antedated the sentence, and by how much this was done no man could know. A man might be sent to the gallows who, according to medical opinion, could not live three months—and, in fact, a man had been recently executed, of whom the medical man said he could not live three months if he died in course of nature, and another man with a prospect of a long life. But what was the punishment? It was not death; it was antedating the sentence passed upon us all by the Most High. From ten thousand pulpits in the land, they were told, and rightly told, that for the repentant sinner the gates of Heaven were open, whether his death was a violent one or not; and yet in the face of those sermons they said—he did not mean that the Judges say it in so many words—“Your crime is so great that there can be no forgiveness with man; but appeal unto God and he may forgive you if you appeal in the right way and pay due attention to your religious advisers.” We told the criminal in one breath that his crime was too great for man to forgive—that he was not fit to live on earth, but we commended him to the mercy of the Highest. We said, in effect, that those feet “which would leave no stain on the pure pavements of the New Jerusalem would leave the polluting mark of blood upon the ground that mortals tread.” He knew not how to escape from this argument. If criminals were fit to die the time of their going to Heaven was hastened; and if not fit to die, they were allowed to go with all their unexpiated crimes on their heads before their final Judge. If we believed that faith which we professed, then the greater the sin the greater the need for repentance; and it was something monstrous that we should set ourselves up to decide that a fortnight from the date of his sentence was enough time for the worst murderer to make his peace with God. If we believed there was need for that peace-making, let us give the murderer the time which God would give him to make his peace with Him. If we wanted to teach mercy, let us set an example of that mercy, and at all events stop short of shedding human blood. And if we would teach reverence for human life, let us not attempt to teach it by showing how it may be speedily taken away. He therefore moved the Amendment of which he had given notice, convinced that by the entire abolition of capital punishment, and the removal from their criminal code of the principle of revenge—the life for life principle—they would inaugurate an era in which the sanctity of human life would be regarded more highly than it had hitherto been, and in which the sense of that sanctity, permeating through society, would result in a great lessening of the crime of murder, and consequently in increased security to the public of this country.

MR. LEEMAN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, instead of carrying out the punishment of death within prisons, that Capital Punishment should be abolished,"—(Mr. Gilpin,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GREGORY said, the question before them was not, as the hon. Member who had just spoken seemed to suppose, one of softening the heart or saving the souls of murderers, but of preventing the Queen's subjects from being murdered. The balance of all authority, as far as they could arrive at it, was that the punishment of death was the great deterrent for murder. Of the eminent men who composed the Commission of 1866, they had the authority of eight in favour of continuing capital punishment; and as to the four who were for abolishing it, they entered the Commission with minds already made up, having been Members of the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment. The opinion of all the Irish Judges was unanimous in favour of retaining that punishment, and the opinion of the English Bench was also unanimous to the same effect, with the exception of that of the late Mr. Justice Shee. The opinions of those best acquainted with the criminal classes were to the same effect. The governors of gaols stated that the fear of death alone restrained the miscreants they had in charge from attempts on the lives of the prison officials; and it was clear that it must be so. If a man be condemned for one murder to penal servitude for life, how could he be restrained from another murder. Punishment could go no further. He would be left to the indulgence of his brutal instincts without a check. The police officers examined before the Commission, who gave most intelligent evidence, one and all said that, from their experience of our most desperate criminals, they felt convinced they would have "knifed" this person and that, were it not that they were afraid, to use their own phrase, of being "scragged" or hanged. Pusey, a desperate burglar, who broke into a house in which an old lady and her housemaid lived, said, with an oath, that he would have "choked" both the housemaid and the old lady if it had not been that he was afraid of being "choked" himself. This they would find upon the testimony of Inspector Tanner, who added that such was the desperate character of the man that he would have carried out the threat with as much coolness as he would have eaten his breakfast. Another desperado, Palin by name, who committed murder, was sent to Australia, and after perpetrating a horrible outrage in that country was condemned to death. Just before going to the scaffold he wrote a letter, in which he declared that the blood of his last victim rested upon those who had spared his life in the first instance, when he ought to have been hanged. But it was said that those who were assassins were not, generally speaking, persons who belonged to the marauding and dangerous classes. They committed every other crime but fell short of this, and the reason given was, that these people had a horror of taking life. This was a strange reason, and he should not have alluded to it but that some stress had been laid upon it by so high an authority as Lord Romilly. He (Mr. Gregory) had already shown from the evidence of police officers that it was precisely the fear of the gallows and nothing else, which had restrained these desperate men. Did they think that those garotters, who took as it were possession of the town a few years ago, were restrained by any tenderness for human life, when they left their victims senseless from blows and half strangled on the pavement? Unquestionably not. Did anyone imagine they were prevented from taking life by the risk of having their im-imprisonment if tried and found guilty, extended from twenty years to imprisonment for life? Were there no punishment of death they would have done the business effectually and have no tales told. Inspector Tanner, who was as well acquainted with the criminal classes as any man in England, represented the invincible feeling among them, no matter how long the period of imprisonment, to be that something would turn up, and that they would eventually regain their liberty; and great was the difficulty of dealing with the question found to be that even Lord Romilly proposed that, in the case of persons found guilty of murder, periodical flogging should be added to the punishment of imprisonment for life. But no deterrent was wanted, and that deterrent could not be had without publicity. If, therefore, a man were to be flogged within the walls of a gaol beyond the public view, and if he were never to emerge from the precincts of the gaol to tell others what had befallen him, this punishment would wear the aspect of revenge and torture instead of operating as a warning to others, so that that was the position to which Lord Romilly, with all his benevolence, was reduced in endeavouring to provide a substitute for death. Looking to the experience to be derived from other countries, it would be found by a Report which had some time ago been furnished by Mr. Rumbold, our Attaché at Berne, who had endeavoured to ascertain how matters stood in reference to capital punishment in several of the cantons of Switzerland, that though, as a general rule, the punishment was there inscribed on the statute book it was rarely enforced; but that, as far as he could ascertain, its maintenance as part of the legal system exercised a deterrent effect. It further appeared, from this Report that in Neuchâtel and Friburg capital punishment had been of late years abolished; that in the case of the former no statistics were supplied; but that, so far as Mr. Rumbold's information went, the use of the knife there was steadily on the increase. In Friburg, where during the eighteen years from 1830 to 1848, when capital punishment was in force, only twenty-six murders had taken place, the number had increased during the sixteen years between 1848, when it was abolished, and 1864 to forty-seven. The Minister of Public Instruction in Tuscany gave pretty much the same account of the state of things there — robbery ac-

panied by murder being, according to his statement, very much on the increase since capital punishment was done away with in 1859. He moreover states that the offenders were rarely detected, because the dead could not identify. But his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, and those who supported his views, appealed to the number of murders which had been committed in this country within the last few years, for the purpose of showing that the existence of capital punishment did not prevent such crimes. The same argument, however, held equally good as applied to imprisonment, because it did not put an end to the frequent commission of assaults and thefts and burglaries. Were we, then, to give up imprisonment? Many thousand more assaults and robberies would surely be committed if imprisonment were done away with, and so would many hundred more murders be perpetrated if death were not the penalty of the crime. As to the argument derived from the alleged existence of insanity in the case of the offender, everybody well knew how often, after the commission of some desperate and deliberate murder, some soft-hearted doctor or some gentleman who was opposed to the punishment of death, tried to show that a great amount of unaccountable conduct had been exhibited by the culprit—that he had done many strange things in his youth, or that some members of his family had been eccentric. Now, juries listened to this argument. Half mankind is ready to believe the other half to be lunatics. Now, the accused knew well that, if acquitted on the grounds of insanity, he would be locked up for the remainder of his days, and the world would know him no more. But he strove to obtain—and rejoiced if he obtained—and his counsel also rejoiced exceedingly if he obtained this incarceration for ever—anything, in short, rather than hanging. As to the Bill on the subject which had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, he must confess that he was entirely in its favour. He could not, however, at the same time, conceal from himself that public executions, though in this metropolis they were accompanied by scenes of ribaldry, yet in the country and in Ireland impressed those who witnessed them with a feeling of deep awe. He recollected a speech which a couple of Sessions ago was made by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. He described in vivid language the desperate character of the crowd which he saw assembled at an execution in the metropolis at which he was present—their levity and obscenity up to and after the falling of the drop, and he wound up his observations by asking, what advantage could result from such a scene? Now, he was aware that the impression created by it was not all that could be desired; but it nevertheless conveyed to every miscreant in that crowd the lesson that the law had a long hand as well as a strong one, and that for the crime of murder death was the penalty which it inflicted. More than that, he would venture to say that scarcely a single man out of all that evil gathering returned to his home without the conviction that there was a barrier set up against the indulgence of his bloody and brutal instincts beyond which he might not pass without becoming, in all probability, a similar spectacle—finishing his life like some savage beast—an object of execration and abhorrence. Nevertheless, the time had, in his opinion, arrived when public executions ought to be abolished. They were not in accordance with the spirit of the age. They were barbarous and, he believed, demoralizing; and he felt convinced that equal, if not greater, awe might be impressed if they were conducted within the precincts of the gaol. But everything should be done to render the occasion solemn and momentous. Notice of the execution should be given beforehand; the death-bell should be tolled; the black flag raised; and, above all things, the whole of the inmates of the prison should be made witnesses of the scene. Under those conditions, the punishment of death ought, he contended, to be continued. It was better that the murderer should perish than that innocent men and women should have their throats cut. A witty Frenchman lately wrote a pamphlet on this subject, and said—

He quoted Montesquieu, who mentioned that, in his time, in England assassinations were rare, because robbers had the hope of being transported while assassins had not. In China, robbers guilty of cruelty were cut into pieces; consequently, they robbed but did not murder. In Russia, the punishment of robbers and murderers was the same; and they invariably assassinated because the dead told no tales. With all the respect, therefore, which he (Mr. Gregory) bore to his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, he adhered to the opinion of such men as Bentham, Montesquieu, and Fenelon; to the verdict of the late Commission; to the almost unanimous testimony of the English and Irish Bench; and to the unanimous evidence of those best acquainted with the criminal classes; and, while giving his hon. Friend full credit for his benevolence and humanity, he must say “No” to his Amendment.

MR. NEATE observed that the hon. Gentleman who last spoke inadvertently committed an error in stating that only four members of the Commission were in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, because, in addition to the four members alluded to, Mr. Justice O’Hagan did at a subsequent period intimate by a private memorandum an opinion recommending, though not immediately, the abolition of that punishment. It was also stated before the Commission by many gentlemen representing the Bar of this country that the result of their experience was that there was increased difficulty in obtaining the conviction of guilty persons in consequence of the existence on the statute book of the penalty of death. The present Bill only dealt with the smaller part of the subject which came under the consideration of the Commission. One important object of the Commission was to provide a better definition of the law of murder, and the Bill of the late Government as well as the Bill of last year grappled with that matter; but the present Bill only dealt with the smaller part of the question, having reference to the infliction of capital punishment in private. He objected to the labours of the Commission being dealt with in that way; for he feared that the result would be that the more important part of the recommendations of the Commission would fall to the ground. He admitted that the punishment of death was the most deterrent; but he did not therefore admit that it was the most effectual, or that its abolition would lead to the multiplication of murders. Certainly nothing was so terrible as death; but those who were most impressed with the sight of the scaffold were those who thought least of it when it was removed from their eyes. The same sensual nature which yielded to the terror of present death was least able to realize it at a distance. Murderers were usually, in some sort, courageous men; and if it were put to a Rush or a Palmer, when about to commit a murder, whether in the event of his being found out he would wish that the penalty for his crime should be death or perpetual imprisonment, he believed he would say, "It does not much matter, if I am found out, whether I am hanged or not; but if I am to make a choice, I say let it be death—["No, no!"]—because I know I have a greater chance of escape from the scruples of the jury than if the punishment was perpetual imprisonment." But even allowing for the greater chance of a prisoner's escape from punishment when the penalty attached to the offence he was charged with was death, he nevertheless admitted that the punishment of death was more deterrent, though it did not follow that it was, therefore the most effectual means for the prevention of crime; for were the punishment of death abolished, improvements in the efficiency of the police or in the character of legislation would more than compensate for the absence of the terror of the death penalty. No doubt sheep stealers were more afraid of former days of being hanged than they now were of being subject to the penalty now present inflicted for the offence of sheep-stealing; but, in consequence of capital punishment being abolished for that offence, the State felt the necessity of improving the police of the country. The county police was accordingly brought into existence, and the crime had since diminished. One great reason why he wished for the abolition of this law of murder was that it would compel them to see what they could do, by education and legislation, for the better humanization and improvement of the people. He should vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. J. STUART MILL: It would be a great satisfaction to me if I were able to support this Motion. It is always a matter of regret to me to find myself, on a public question, opposed to those who are called—sometimes in the way of honour, and sometimes in what is intended for ridicule—the philanthropists. Of all persons who take part in public affairs, they are those for whom, on the whole, I feel the greatest amount of respect; for their characteristic is that they devote their time, their labour, and much of their money to objects purely public, with a less admixture of either personal or class selfishness, than any other class of politicians whatever. On almost all the great questions, scarcely any politicians are so steadily and almost uniformly to be found on the side of right; and they seldom err, but by an exaggerated application of some just and highly important principle. On the very subject that is now occupying us we all know what signal service they have rendered. It is through their efforts that our criminal laws—which within my memory hanged people for stealing in a dwelling house to the value of 40s.—laws by virtue of which rows of human beings might be seen suspended in front of Newgate by those who ascended or descended Ludgate Hill—have so greatly relaxed their most revolting and most impolitic ferocity, that aggravated murder is now practically the only crime which is punished with death by any of our lawful tribunals; and we are even now deliberating whether the extreme penalty should be retained in that solitary case. This vast gain, not only to humanity, but to the ends of penal justice, we owe to the philanthropists; and if they are mistaken, as I cannot but think they are, in the present instance, it is only in not perceiving the right time and place for stopping in a career hitherto so eminently beneficial. Sir, there is a point at which, I conceive, that career ought to stop. When there has been brought home to any one, by conclusive evidence, the greatest crime known to the law; and when the attendant circumstances suggest no palliation of the guilt, no hope that the culprit may even yet not be unworthy to live among mankind, nothing to make it probable that the crime was an exception to his general character rather than a consequence of it, then I confess it appears to me that to deprive the criminal of the life of which he has proved himself to be unworthy—solemnly to blot him out from the fellowship of mankind and from the catalogue of the living—is the most appropriate, as it is certainly the most impressive, mode in which society can attach to so great a crime the penal consequences which for the security of life it is indispensable to annex to it. I defend this penalty, when confined to atrocious cases, on the very ground on which it is commonly attacked—on that of humanity to the criminal; as beyond comparison the least cruel mode in which it is possible adequately to deter from the crime. If, in our horror of inflicting death, we endeavour to devise some punishment for the living criminal which shall act on the human mind with a deterrent force at all comparable to that of death, we are driven to inflictions less severe indeed in appearance, and therefore less efficacious, but far more cruel in reality. Few, I think, would venture to propose, as a punishment for aggravated murder, less than imprisonment with hard labour for life; that is the fate to which a murderer would be consigned by the mercy which shrinks from putting him to death. But has it been sufficiently considered what sort of a mercy this is, and what kind of life it leaves to him? If, indeed, the punishment is not really inflicted—if it becomes the sham which a few years ago such punishments were rapidly becoming—then, indeed, its adoption would be almost tantamount to giving up the attempt to repress murder altogether. But if it really is what it professes to be, and if it is realized in all its rigour by the popular imagination, as it very probably would not be, but as it must be if it is to be efficacious, it will be so shocking that when the memory of the crime is no longer fresh, there will be almost insuperable difficulty in executing it. What comparison can there really be, in point of severity, between consigning a man to the short pang of a rapid death, and immuring him in a living tomb, there to linger out what may be a long life in the hardest and most monotonous toil, without any of its alleviations or rewards—debarred from all pleasant sights and sounds, and cut off from all earthly hope, except a slight mitigation of bodily restraint, or a small improvement of diet? Yet even such a lot as this, because there is no one moment at which the suffering is of terrifying intensity, and, above all, because it does not contain the element, so imposing to the imagination, of the unknown, is universally reputed a milder punishment than death—stands in all codes as a mitigation of the capital penalty, and is thankfully accepted as such. For it is characteristic of all punishments which depend on duration for their efficacy—all, therefore, which are not corporal or pecuniary—that they are more rigorous than they seem; while it is, on the contrary, one of the strongest recommendations a punishment can have, that it should seem more rigorous than it is; for its practical power depends far less on what it is than on what it seems. There is not, I should think, any human infliction which makes an impression on the imagination so entirely out of proportion to its real severity as the punishment of death. The punishment must be mild indeed which does not add more to the sum of human misery than is necessarily or directly added by the execution of a criminal. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin) has himself remarked, the most that human laws can do to anyone in the matter of death is to hasten it; the man would have died at any rate; not so very much later, and on the average, I fear, with a considerably greater amount of bodily suffering. Society is asked, then, to denude itself of an instrument of punishment which, in the grave cases to which alone it is suitable, effects its purpose at a less cost of human suffering than any other; which, while it inspires more terror, is less cruel in actual fact than any punishment that we should think of substituting for it. My hon. Friend says that it does not inspire terror, and that experience proves it to be a failure. But the influence of a punishment is not to be estimated by its effect on hardened criminals. Those whose habitual way of life keeps them, so to speak, at all times within sight of the gallows, do grow to care less about it; as, to compare good things with bad, an old soldier is not much affected by the chance of dying in battle. I can afford to admit all that is often said about the indifference of professional criminals to the gallows. Though of that indifference one-third is probably bravado and another third confidence that they shall have the luck to escape, it is quite probable that the remaining third is real. But the efficacy of a punishment which acts principally through the imagination, is chiefly to be measured by the impression it makes on those who are still innocent: by the horror with which it surrounds the first promptings of guilt; the restraining influence it exercises over the beginning of the thought which, if indulged, would become a temptation; the check which it exerts over the gradual declension towards the state—never suddenly attained—in which crime no longer revolts, and punishment no longer terrifies. As for what is called the failure of death punishment, who is able to judge of that? We partly know who those are whom it has not deterred; but who is there who knows whom it has deterred, or how many human beings it has saved who would have lived to be murderers if that awful association had not been thrown round the idea of murder from their earliest infancy? Let us not forget that the most imposing fact loses its power over the imagination if it is made too cheap. When a punishment fit only for the most atrocious crimes is lavished on small offences until human feeling recoils from it, en, indeed, it ceases to intimidate, because it ceases to be believed in. The failure of capital punishment in cases of theft is easily accounted for: the thief did not believe that it would be inflicted. He had learnt by experience that jurors would perjure themselves rather than find him guilty; that Judges would seize any excuse for not sentencing him to death, or for commending him to mercy; and that if either jurors nor Judges were merciful, there were still hopes from an authority above both. When things had come to this pass it was high time to give up the vain attempt. When it is impossible to inflict a punishment, or when its infliction becomes a public scandal, the threat cannot too soon disappear from the statute book. And in the case of the most of offences which were formerly capital, we heartily rejoice that it did become impracticable to execute the law. If the same state of public feeling comes to exist in the case of murder; if the time comes when jurors refuse to find a murderer guilty; when Judges will not sentence him to death, or will recommend him to mercy; when, if juries and Judges do not flinch from their duty, Home Secretaries, under pressure of deputations and memorials, shrink from theirs, and the threat becomes, as it became in the other cases, a mere brutum fulmen; then, indeed, it may become necessary to do in this case what has been done in those — to abrogate the penalty. That time may come—my hon. friend thinks that it has nearly come. I hardly know whether he lamented it or boasted of it; but he and his Friends are entitled to the boast: for if it comes it will be their doing, and they will have gained what I cannot but call a fatal victory, for they will have achieved it by bringing about, if they will forgive me for saying so, an enervation, an effeminacy, in the general mind of the country. For what more than effeminacy is it to be so much more shocked by taking a man's life than by depriving him of all that makes life desirable or valuable? Is death, then, the greatest of all earthly ills? Usque adeone tibi miserum est? Is it, indeed, so dreadful a thing to die? Has it not been from of old one chief part of a manly education to make us despise death—teaching us to account it, if an evil at all, by no means high in the list of evils; at all events, as an inevitable one, and to hold, as it were, our lives in our hands, ready to be given or risked at any moment, for a sufficiently worthy object? I am sure that my hon. Friends know all this as well, and have as much of all these feelings as any of the rest of us; possibly more. But I cannot think that this is likely to be the effect of their teaching on the general mind. I cannot think that the cultivating of a peculiar sensitiveness of conscience on this one point, over and above what results from the general cultivation of the moral sentiments, is permanently consistent with assigning in our own minds to the fact of death no more than the degree of relative importance which belongs to it among the other incidents of our humanity. The men of old cared too little about death, and gave their own lives or took those of others with equal recklessness. Our danger is of the opposite kind, lest we should be so much shocked by death, in general and in the abstract, as to care too much about it in individual cases, both those of other people and our own, which call for its being risked. And I am not putting things at the worst, for it is proved by the experience of other countries that horror of the executioner by no means necessarily implies horror of the assassin. The stronghold, as we all know, of hired assassination in the 18th century was Italy; yet it is said that in some of the Italian populations the infliction of death by sentence of law was in the highest degree offensive and revolting to popular feeling. Much has been said of the sanctity of human life, and the absurdity of supposing that we can teach respect for life by ourselves destroying it. But I am surprised at the employment of this argument, for it is one which might be brought against any punishment whatever. It is not human life only, not human life as such, that ought to be sacred to us, but human feelings. The human capacity of suffering is what we should cause to be respected, not the mere capacity of existing. And we may imagine somebody asking how we can teach people not to inflict suffering by ourselves inflicting it? But to this I should answer — all of us would answer — that to deter by suffering from inflicting suffering is not only possible, but the very purpose of penal justice. Does fining a criminal show want of respect for property, or imprisoning him, for personal freedom? Just as unreasonable is it to think that to take the life of a man who has taken that of another is to show want of regard for human life. We show, on the contrary, most emphatically our regard for it, by the adoption of a rule that he who violates that right in another forfeits it for himself, and that while no other crime that he can commit deprives him of his right to live, this shall. There is one argument against capital punishment, even in extreme cases, which I cannot deny to have weight—on which my hon. Friend justly laid great stress, and which never can be entirely got rid of. It is this—that if by an error of justice an innocent person is put to death, the mistake can never be corrected; all compensation, all reparation for the wrong is impossible. This would be indeed a serious objection if these miserable mistakes—among the most tragical occurrences in the whole round of human affairs—could not be made extremely rare. The argument is invincible where the mode of criminal procedure is dangerous to the innocent, or where the Courts of Justice are not trusted. And this probably is the reason why the objection to an irreparable punishment began (as I believe it did) earlier, and is more intense and more widely diffused, in some parts of the Continent of Europe than it is here. There are on the Continent great and enlightened countries, in which the criminal procedure is not so favourable to innocence, does not afford the same security against erroneous conviction, as it does among us; countries where the Courts of Justice seem to think they fail in their duty unless they find somebody guilty; and in their really laudable desire to hunt guilt from its hiding-places, expose themselves to a serious danger of condemning the innocent. If our own procedure and Courts of Justice afforded ground for similar apprehension, I should be the first to join in withdrawing the power of inflicting irreparable punishment from such tribunals. But we all know that the defects of our procedure are the very opposite. Our rules of evidence are even too favourable to the prisoner: and juries and Judges carry out the maxim, “It is better that ten guilty should escape than that one innocent person should suffer,” not only to the letter, but beyond the letter. Judges are most anxious to point out, and juries to allow for, the barest possibility of the prisoner’s innocence. No human judgment is infallible: such sad cases as my hon. Friend cited will sometimes occur; but in so grave a case as that of murder, the accused, in our system, has always the benefit of the merest shadow of a doubt. And this suggests another consideration very germane to the question.

The very fact that death punishment is more shocking than any other to the imagination, necessarily renders the Courts of Justice more scrupulous in requiring the fullest evidence of guilt. Even that which is the greatest objection to capital punishment, the impossibility of correcting an error once committed, must make, and does make, juries and Judges more careful in forming their opinion, and more jealous in their scrutiny of the evidence. If the substitution of penal servitude for death in cases of murder should cause any relaxation in this conscientious scrupulosity, there would be a great evil to set against the real, but I hope rare, advantage of being able to make reparation to a condemned person who was afterwards discovered to be innocent. In order that the possibility of correction may be kept open wherever the chance of this sad contingency is more than infinitesimal, it is quite right that the Judge should recommend to the Crown a commutation of the sentence, not solely when the proof of guilt is open to the smallest suspicion, but whenever there remains anything unexplained and mysterious in the case, raising a desire for more light, or making it likely that further information may at some future time be obtained. I would also suggest that whenever the sentence is commuted the grounds of the commutation should, in some authentic form, be made known to the public. Thus much I willingly concede to my hon. Friend; but on the question of total abolition I am inclined to hope that the feeling of the country is not with him, and that the limitation of death punishment to the cases referred to in the Bill of last year will be generally considered sufficient. The mania which existed a short time ago for paring down all our punishments seems to have reached its limits, and not before it was time. We were in danger of being left without any effectual punishment, except for small offences. What was formerly our chief secondary punishment—transportation—before it was abolished, had become almost a reward. Penal servitude, the substitute for it, was becoming, to the classes who were principally subject to it, almost nominal, so comfortable did we make our prisons, and so easy had it become to get quickly out of them. Flogging—a most objectionable punishment in ordinary cases, but a particularly appropriate one for crimes of brutality, especially crimes against women—we would not hear of, except, to be sure, in the case of garotters, for whose peculiar benefit we re-established it in a hurry, immediately after a Member of Parliament had been garotted. With this exception, sentences, even of an atrocious kind, against the person, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) well marked, not only were, but still are, visited with penalties so ludicrously inadequate, as to be almost an encouragement to the crime. I think, Sir, that in the case of most offences, except those against property, there is more need of strengthening our punishments than of weakening them: and that severer sentences, with an apportionment of them to the different kinds of offences which shall approve itself better than at present to the moral sentiments of the community, are the kind of reform of which our penal system now stands in need. I shall therefore vote against the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 8: Majority 104.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 struck out.

Clause 3 (Execution to be within Prison).

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH expressed his opinion that, in introducing the element of privacy into executions, they would do their best to imitate the crime itself. It was, of course, a deed of violence. In taking away the element of publicity, they were taking away the chief authority for the act, which was to be sought, not in any written statute, but in the common feeling of mankind seated in the heart. This going away with the consensus populi would be to realize the prediction that if they abolished publicity it would be impossible to maintain capital punishment at all, because the effect would be revolting to human feeling. They would only show that they were afraid of carrying out their own principle of capital punishment. It might be true that, when a crowd was collected at executions, scenes and incidents revolting to moral feeling took place; but this might equally occur if a number of people were admitted to what was called a private execution.

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

MR. HIBBERT thought the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. Darby Griffith) should have been made on the second reading of the Bill. There were many countries in which private executions were established without the inconveniences asserted to be inseparable from them.

MR. NEWDEGATE concurred with the argument of the hon. Member for Devizes. He admitted that private executions prevailed in various countries; but there was no country in the world in which respect for the law was so high and deep as it was in England. The principle of secrecy which the Bill contained was objectionable, because it would bring the carrying out of the law into suspicion and diminish the force of the law. Secrecy in matters of this kind would excite against the Executive an amount of odium that must be deplored, and which had never previously attached to it. The principle of our law was, that the execution of a person was the act of the whole nation, and that being so, it should be public, in order that that portion of the nation residing in the immediate neighbourhood of the crime might, if they chose, attend and see their own punishment carried out.

MR. M'LAREN said, he entirely disagreed in the views taken by his hon. Friend on the other side. Even supposing that the scriptural argument could be maintained, and that the text, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," was correctly interpreted, which he by no means admitted, where was it written that the shedding of blood should necessarily take place in the midst of a crowd composed of the most profligate and worthless part of the population that could be collected? Did the spectacle do good to the classes who furnished these crowds? All the evidence went to show that instead of doing them good, it had a tendency to demoralize them. The clauses of the Bill would insure every necessary publicity, and he cordially thanked the Government for the measure.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK thought the Bill a move in the right direction—that was to say, towards the total abolition of capital punishment. Public executions were an evil. He himself had had more than once to sentence numbers of persons in the police-court for robbing at executions. He asked whether "within the walls" of the prison would be interpreted within the external boundary walls or actually within the prison itself?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY : The external walls.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, with reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), that if any change took place from private executions it would most certainly not be to public executions, but to the total abolition of capital punishment; the national aversion to secrecy would enforce this abolition.

MR. DENMAN admitted that one reason why he had voted for the second reading of the Bill was because he believed it was a step towards total abolition. But even assuming that capital punishment was to be maintained in perpetuity, was it not far better that it should be carried out within the prisons, and thus avoid the horrible and disgusting scenes that took place at public executions? One great stumbling block in the way of total abolitionists hitherto had been the want of a sufficiently strong public opinion to justify their proposal; private executions would, he believed, remove the difficulty by leading the public to the opinion that it was not necessary to put a person out of the world for the public safety when he could be well secured from doing harm by closely confining him in prison. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that, in the case of Palin, the first murder case he had ever defended, if the punishment had been anything but death the prisoner would have been convicted, because there was the plainest evidence against him. Palin was afterwards transported for fifteen years, and finally committed a capital offence, for which he was executed. But that he did not wish to inflict a speech upon hon. Members he might have cited different cases in which criminals, undoubtedly guilty, had escaped conviction through the repugnance of juries to doom them to the extreme penalty of the law. It would not be long, he thought after this Bill passed, before public opinion would declare that a secret act of assassination within the gaol was not necessary or expedient. A plan had been suggested by Sir Walter Crofton, a very high authority on such a subject, under which prisoners might be confined for life, and practically without hope, in the interior of some prison, so that society would run no risk of their escape from prison, and would avoid the risks it now ran, in many cases, from their total impunity, owing to the unwillingness of juries to inflict an irrevocable sentence.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, the

hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) objected to all punishments carried out privately as unconstitutional, was he prepared to revive the abominable practice of public flogging? There was no objection to the clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he objected to flogging prisoners, because to degrade men was not the best way to fit them to continue in society. But the case of capital punishment is totally different, and the old principle of English law is that if a citizen of the country is to be deprived of his life the execution ought to take place in the face of the public.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, that if, as some predicted, the effect of passing the second reading of this Bill were to lead to the abolition of capital punishment, he should assuredly regret that he had been among its supporters. He could not agree in that prediction. He for a long time considered private executions anti-English; but the majority of the country, or at any rate of the House, has now decided the question. He protested against the representation of the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) that juries had violated their oaths—["No, no!"]—for violating their oaths it is, because they objected to the penalty of death.

MR. NEATE said, that even if the House agreed to deprive executions of their public character, there was much that might and ought to be done to give solemnity to executions within the walls of the prison. He wished, for instance, that the sheriff present should be the High Sheriff; and he further thought that the foreman of the grand jury and at least three of the grand jury ought to attend the execution. ["Oh!"] The clause, as it stood, was founded on a total misconception of the nature and object of capital punishment. Something should be done to supply the want of publicity by the presence of proper representatives of the public. If he were asked to name a suitable hour and place for the purpose, he should say New Palace Yard at four o'clock. ["Oh, oh!"] As he was sure there would be a very strong feeling in the country against the Bill he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would allow a sufficient time between the Committee and the third reading to enable the House to learn what was thought of it out of doors. The

on. and learned Gentleman moved to omit the words, "The Sheriff charged with the execution," and insert—

"The High Sheriff in person, and also the foreman of the Grand Jury by whom the Bill was found, and three other members of such Grand Jury, to be selected in such manner as the Judge of Assize by whom the case was tried shall direct."

SIR JOHN SIMEON thought it would be unfair to require the attendance of either the High Sheriff or the foreman of the Grand Jury as they were unpaid officials.

MR. GORST suggested that it would be well to provide for the attendance at executions of witnesses, independently of officials and the relatives of the criminal, whose evidence would satisfy the coroner's jury as to the mode of death. In Australia the attendance of two justices of the peace was required.

MR. LOWTHER moved to leave out the words "Relatives of the prisoner, or." Those who objected to public executions would not desire the presence of relatives of the prisoner when executions were carried out in private.

MR. HIBBERT suggested that, for the purpose of identification, the presence of relatives of the culprit might in some cases be very important. At present the Governor had the power of admitting them to the gaol to see the procession on its way to the place of execution.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the words proposed to be omitted were struck out, it would still be in the power of the Governor to admit relatives of the culprit under the words enabling him to admit "other persons" than the officials specially named.

MR. WALPOLE remarked that the words applying to "relatives" might be taken as giving such persons a right to demand admittance. It would be well to bear this in mind before altering the clause.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH could not suppose that the relatives of the prisoner would like to be present at such a distressing and shocking sight. At all events, it should be left to the discretion of the sheriff to determine whether they should be admitted.

MR. M'LAREN said, it was always the case that poor persons stuck to their relatives to the death; and it would only be right to accord to them the privilege of being present at the execution of their relatives.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the clause is permissive, and therefore it will make no difference in point of legal obligation whether the words are omitted or retained, though they would be useful as an instruction to the sheriff as to whom he should admit.

MR. CANDLISH thought it important that the relatives of the prisoner should have a legal right to attend the execution.

MR. LOWTHER said, if the words are retained the sheriff will still have power under the clause to refuse the relatives admission in certain cases.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK thought it desirable that a few of the general public should be admitted within the prison. If thirty, twenty, or even ten of the general public were allowed to be present the execution would not be a private one, any more than the Central Criminal Court was a private Court, although only a very limited number of the public could be accommodated in the building. He moved, therefore, an Amendment to the effect that the sheriffs and visiting justices should admit into the gaol as many of the general public as could properly and conveniently be accommodated.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he understood the proposition of the hon. Gentleman was that the gaol should be opened to any persons who might choose to come, as long as there was sufficient room for their accommodation. [Mr. Alderman Lusk: No!] If not, due provision was made in the clause as it stood for carrying out the hon. Member's intention. It was left to the discretion of the sheriff and the visiting justices to admit such persons as they thought fit, and therefore it would be unnecessary to introduce the words proposed by the hon. Member.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK explained that it was his intention that the sheriff should admit as many of the general public as could be conveniently accommodated.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that if the clause were altered in the way proposed, the sheriff would be bound to admit the public indiscriminately into the gaol as long as there was room to accommodate them. Thus boys, women, and others who ought not to witness executions, would have a right to admission. By the clause as it stood power was given to admit the representatives of the Press and other persons of respectability who, in the opinion of the authorities, ought to be present at the execution.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK pointed out that boys and young girls might be excluded, as they were now from Courts of Justice in certain cases.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the reason why boys and girls were sometimes kept or ordered out of Court was that the Judge is assumed to have supreme control over the discipline of the Court, though some people doubted whether they have so much authority; but if this Amendment were adopted the sheriff would be bound to act according to the words of the statute, and to admit the public indiscriminately.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH thought what was proposed by the Bill would be very like a select audience. It would probably come to admitting people by ticket.

MR. M'LAREN suggested the addition of words to the effect that the sheriff should admit such reporters for the newspapers connected with the county or borough as he might deem proper.

MR. DENMAN, while agreeing with the spirit of his hon. Friend's Amendment, thought it quite superfluous and unnecessary. Under the term "persons," the representatives of the Press would be admissible.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE thought that the representatives of the Press should have a right to be present, instead of their admission being at the discretion of the authorities, who, perhaps, might in some cases think it desirable that the public should not be furnished with a full account of the proceedings. He should therefore take an opportunity of moving an Amendment to that effect, and would certainly divide the Committee upon it.

MR. HIBBERT opposed the Amendment as unnecessary, seeing that it must be left to the discretion of the sheriffs and the visiting justices to say how many people could be accommodated.

MR. M. CHAMBERS could not see the use of adding the words, "of the general public" after "persons," as the latter included the former.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE moved the addition of the words, "and so many reporters of the public Press," the effect of which would be to secure the attendance of the representatives of the Press, so that the public might know what official persons were present. He held that the decision of what persons to be admitted should not be left entirely to the discretion of the sheriff and visiting justices. He thought it would tend to the satisfaction of the people of this country that the admission should be ensured of those who would faithfully report what took place on such occasions.

Amendment proposed, after the word "prisoner," to insert the words "and so many reporters of the public press."—(Mr. Alderman Lawrence.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 46: Majority 22.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Coroner's Inquest on Body).

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE asked, if the representatives of the Press would be allowed to attend the inquests? Were those inquests to be private or public?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The inquests will be conducted on precisely the same principles as at present.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE: Will they be open to the public?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: They will be as open to the public as Coroners' inquests held in prisons now are.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, a sheriff might have particular views of his own with regard to the admission of unofficial persons to an execution; and supposing the sheriff excluded such persons, who were to be witnesses at the Coroners' inquests?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that an execution can be carried on without witnesses, I do not think so. There must be witnesses, whatever reliance may be placed upon their testimony.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK: I understand that there may be official persons present; but will that satisfy the public? This should be arranged beforehand. If the sheriff did not admit any of the public, who were to be the witnesses but the gaoler and hangman?

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH complained that the matter was treated with levity on the Treasury Bench, and regretted to observe that the House seemed ready to relieve itself from a serious subject by ebullitions of that kind. There might be a crotchety sheriff, of opinion that it was in-ended to carry out executions privately, and not admit the general public, and to that the hon. Member opposite took exception.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed a clause extending the Act to Scotland, with the necessary modifications of language.

Clause agreed to.

MR. NEATE said, that the punishment of hanging, as practised in great Britain, was derived from barbarous countries, and was singularly unequal in its operation. He would suggest that the Government should have recourse to modern science with the view of discovering a less painful mode of execution. It was a mistake to suppose that dislocation of the neck produced instantaneous death. Sometimes it did so; other times, the criminal was convulsed for some seconds. The garotte was a more merciful punishment; or life might be taken by means of carbonic acid gas—a process which would prevent the painful necessity of having the hands of the hangman about the culprit's neck. He wished to limit manual interference by one fellow-creature with another in such cases as much as possible, and would even go so far as to allow the prisoner to put an end to himself. He thought the suggestion was worth consideration when they were entering the old mode of execution. He would move as a new clause, but would not press it to a division that—

Clause negatived.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

Mr. Locke.*)

[BILL 1.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved that the Chairman report Progress with the view to the framing of a clause to protect the interests of reversioners, which, as the Bill at present stood, had been altogether overlooked. The interest of the reversioner might be confiscated if the lessee neglected his duty.

MR. GOLDNEY suggested to the hon. Baronet to withdraw his Amendment until the clause framed by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Powell) to meet his objection was considered.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he would withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

MR. POWELL then proposed a clause providing that—

“Application may be made to justices where more than one owner of premises included in order under Act, and any one owner neglects to comply with such order.”

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID denied that this clause would meet the difficulty. There might be half-a-dozen lessees, and finally the freeholder, and all those delicate interests required very careful consideration. He therefore hoped that the Chairman would be allowed to report Progress, in order that an opportunity should be afforded for the preparation of a new clause that would effectually protect the interests of reversioners.

MR. POWELL said, he thought that in the clause he had proposed he had saved the interest of the reversioner.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he was of opinion that the clause under consideration had been carefully drawn, and would meet the object of the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid). Every class of interest in property was protected.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, the description given did not tally with the printed words of the clause.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, there were no other powers in this Bill to take land than were contained in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Bill.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, the effect of the Bill, even though including the proposed clause, would be to cause a forfeiture of the interests of reversioners, without their having any opportunity to prevent it.

MR. AYRTON thought that some one should be responsible for the clause. The hon. and learned Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid), who was a good authority, told them the clause did not meet the wants of the case. It seemed to him it was necessary to have a well-considered clause.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS thought that the discussion showed the necessity of not dealing with the rights of property in the off-hand manner proposed.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought it would be a very great pity if the Committee were to lose this chance of getting through with the clauses of the Bill. There would be ample opportunity at its next stage to discuss the important subject which had been raised by the hon. Baronet.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, they would not have an opportunity of discussing the matter fully when the Bill was reported, because at that stage hon. Members had only the privilege of addressing the House once. However, he would not further press the point.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved the following new clause, which he said was designed to obviate one of the many disadvantages which he believed would attend the working of the Bill if passed in its present form:—

"This Act shall not apply to any premises as to which the owner of the freehold has instituted proceedings under the covenants contained in the lease under which the premises are held, in order to compel due performance of such covenants, as to repair or for forfeiture of such lease by reason of breach of any such covenants, provided such proceedings are bonâ fide and duly prosecuted, and provided that such owner shall succeed in obtaining judgment therein, and provided also that within three calendar months after such judgment obtained, such owner shall properly repair such premises so as to render them fit for healthy occupation, or pull down and demolish the same, at his option."

MR. AYRTON suggested that this clause should not be pressed; but that the matter should be allowed to remain in the hands of the Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought it would be only right for the Government to undertake some responsibility in connection with the Bill, and by the next stage attention would be paid to this matter.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, on this understanding he would, for the present, withdraw the clause.

MR. POWELL proposed a clause providing that, in case of leaseholds, the owner of the reversion have power to determine the lease, compensation being paid to the lessee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved another clause—

"This Act shall not apply to any case in which the defective state or condition of the premises is attributable to or occasioned by the act, neglect, or default of the local authority, to put in force the powers for remedy of such defects already vested in such local authority."

MR. GOLDNEY objected to the clause.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID mentioned the case of mischief being done by the authorities raising a road.

MR. POWELL said the clause was inapplicable.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID next moved the following new clause:—

"In any case where any lessee shall refuse or neglect to execute the works required by the order of the local authority made under this Act, and the owner of the freehold shall elect to execute the same, such refusal or neglect of the lessee shall operate as a forfeiture of his interest in such premises, and if within one calendar month after such refusal or neglect the owner of the freehold shall commence such works, and he shall execute the same without delay, he shall be entitled to hold the said premises free from the interest of such lessee but subject to the payment by the freeholder to the lessee of the value of the interest of such lessee, according to the mode of valuation provided in the nineteenth Clause of this Act."

MR. POWELL said, he did not see any objection to the clause.

First Schedule.

MR. AYRTON said, he observed that the corporation of London had made its influence felt in reference to the Bill, for by a note appended to the Schedule it was declared that the metropolis should not include the City of London; so that the result would be that the most wealthy portion of the metropolis would escape contributing towards the improvement of the dwellings of the poorest classes within the metropolis. Such an arrangement was most inequitable. He should move the omission in the Schedule of all words relating to the City of London, so as to make the metropolis at large, as defined by the Metropolis Local Management Act, liable to the charges for carrying this Act into operation.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "The City of London," in line 7, to "c. 91," in line 12, inclusive."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. GOSCHEN opposed the Motion. There was a great deal of work to be done in the City of London of the nature contemplated by the Bill, and the City did not sh to escape from its fair share of public burden, but it desired to pay for that which was to be done within its own area.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS thought that the City had no claim for the exemption which was claimed. The metropolis should be regarded as one area for the purpose of carrying out all sanitary arrangements.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 19: Majority 7.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 88.]

BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 5.]

(Mr. Monsell, Mr. Sullivan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MONSELL, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, said he thought he could show that the grievances which it referred were so serious that in the present Session they ought to be redressed. At the present time the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland, though representing only about one-ninth of the population of that country, had power to prevent any religious service but that of their own Church from being performed in the parish burial-grounds. This matter was seriously complained of, not only by Roman Catholics but also by Presbyterians and by the members of other religious bodies. He was sure that no one would desire that Ireland should continue to be, as she was now, the only Christian country in which the great majority of the people were committed to the grave without any religious service. He understood that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) intended to move that the present Bill should extend to England; he (Mr. Monsell) feared that additional difficulties would be placed in his way if the English were mixed up with the Irish grievance. The present law of burials in Ireland was founded upon a Bill passed under the auspices of Lord Plunket in 1824, which Bill provided that every person, whatever his religion, should have a right to interment in the churchyard of the parish where he died; but that no religious service should be performed at the grave without the permission of the Protestant incumbent. If the incumbent refused his sanction he was required to state in writing his reasons for so refusing, and to forward a copy of that statement to his Bishop, who was to transmit it to the Lord Lieutenant. Lord Plunket's intention as to the effect of the law was not doubtful; he stated that it would be mandatory upon incumbents to grant the permission asked for; and his intention, and also that of the Legislature, was that the application should be merely formal, and that it should be always assented to by the incumbent. Indeed, Lord Plunket gave as his reason for supporting the measure, that it could not be borne that Protestant clergymen should permit human bodies to be thrown into the ground like so many dogs. The question then arose, "Has the intention of Lord Plunket and the Legislature been carried out or not?" This question could be answered only in the negative. There was the highest authority—that of Archdeacon Stopford—for saying that "The Irish custom does not usually bring the Roman Catholic priest to the grave," and Dr. Doyle supplied the reason when he said that "Priests and prelates would rather be condemned to labour at a treadmill than ask for licences for interments." But when, by an overstrained humility, Roman Catholic priests had made application, they had frequently been refused. He would quote a remarkable instance which occurred at Enniskillen, the living of which was in the gift of Trinity College, and its incumbents were, generally, men of some eminence. There is a cemetery in the parish called Pubble—there has been no church there for eighty years; it is almost exclusively used by Roman Catholics. In twenty-five years there had been only five Protestant burials there. Within the last few years there had been three rectors of the parish—Mr. Maude, Mr. Magee, the present Dean of Cork, a man of the highest mark, and Mr. Greer; but though the burial-ground was far removed from the parish church, all three rectors had, in every instance, refused applications asking permission to read the burial service of the Roman Catholic Church. He might be permitted to say, with reference to the statement that Roman Catholic priests were unwilling to make an application to a Protestant incumbent, that the Protestant clergymen were accustomed, as might be seen by the placards now about Dublin in connection with the May meetings, to speak in a very gross way with regard to the Roman Catholic Church. But, the necessity of asking the incumbent's consent, however, was not only hard upon Roman Catholics, but also upon members of other religious bodies. Though the House had lately heard of the identity of feeling which existed between the Presbyterians and Protestant Episcopalians in Ireland, applications on the part of Presbyterian ministers had been refused. Lately an application to be allowed to perform a burial service was made by the Rev. E. Lyttle, a Presbyterian minister, at Donnybrook; it was refused, and the matter was brought before the Presbytery of Dublin, where Mr. Lyttle stated that—

"For some unknown cause many of the clergy of the Church of England about Dublin and through the South have, during the last three or four years, considered it necessary to assert their dignity and rights in this miserable and odious way. In all directions our clergy are being excluded from the parish graveyards. It is impossible to bear any longer with a state of things which is becoming worse, for such refusals are becoming the usage and the rule."

The Wesleyans met with similar treatment. He had large quantities of correspondence, showing that contumelious refusals followed the most humble applications. He would give one case. In November, 1863, the Rev. Edward Beal, a Wesleyan minister at Armagh, asked permission of the incumbent to perform the funeral service over a Mrs. Miller, and received this answer—

"Sir, I cannot grant the request made in your name; but I will be ready to perform the funeral service of the Church if called on by the friends of the late Mrs. Miller."

An appeal was made to the Archbishop, and he said—

"The Act of Parliament leaves it entirely at the discretion of the incumbent to grant or refuse the permission, and gives the Bishop no right to interfere. You will observe that I have done all that the law requires or permits me to do in this case."

The House would recollect Lord Plunket's explanation of the law. He said that the words enabling permission to be given were mandatory; yet in this case neither incumbent or Bishop so treated it. An appeal to the Bishop was made, and the grievance was not redressed. In February, 1866, the Rev. Mr. Quarry, Wesleyan minister in the county of Kerry, received a peremptory refusal. When he attempted to perform the service outside the graveyard, it was very near being attended by serious consequences. But a more extraordinary case was one which occurred in the county of Galway. George Mitchell died, having previously specially requested that his minister, the Rev. W. B. Le Bat, should conduct his funeral service. The rector, however, would not consent, and (he quoted Mr. Le Bat's words) "assisted by a mob of missionaries and other persons, stopped the procession to the grave, and there was a great deal of disturbance." A memorial upon the matter was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant, who referred it to the Bishop, who sent it to the rector, and the latter returned it to the Lord Lieutenant; so that, as Mr. Butt said, the parties, instead of getting redress or satisfaction of any kind, were baffled, disappointed, and annoyed. He thought that he had said enough to show that there was a serious grievance, and that the intention of Lord Plunket and the Legislature in passing the Act of 1824 had been defeated. It had been supposed that Lord Lieutenants and Bishops would secure the carrying out of the intentions of the Legislature. It appeared that Lord Lieutenants and Bishops were unwilling or unable to control uncharitable or crotchety incumbents. The remedy which this Bill proposed was a simple one—that in the case of urials of persons not belonging to the established Church in the parish burial-grounds, the priests or ministers of the denomination to which the deceased belonged should have the right to perform the burial service of that denomination. The Bill did not in any way interfere with the rights of the parochial clergy to the use of the churchyards; all it provided was that the national burial-grounds should be freely used by the nation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Monsell.)

Mr. LEFROY said, he regretted that he felt it his duty to oppose the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh (Mr. Monsell). He should, however, regret still more if his motives for doing so were misunderstood. He was therefore anxious to state in the briefest and most temperate language the objections which he entertained to the measure. His right hon. Friend had made a most ingenious speech in support of his Bill, and had drawn off the attention of the House from its objectionable features. The right hon. Gentleman alleged that the objects which Lord Plunket had in view when he introduced his measure upon this subject had been frustrated by the clergy, and that he (Mr. Lefroy) could not admit this to be the case. He deemed it necessary to call the attention of the House to the advances which had been made in this matter of late years by the enactment of measures in favour of the Roman Catholics—measures which he rejoiced. In the reign of William III. the Roman Catholics were deprived of the right of burial even in the monasteries or grounds adjacent, and a penalty of £10 was enacted against any violation of that law. In the reign of George IV. a Bill was introduced by Lord Plunket, the object of which was to do away with that prohibition, and throw open all those burial-places to Roman Catholics. The Act of William III. forbade the performance of burial service by Catholic priests. Lord Plunket's Act removed this difficulty also, and gave power to the Protestant incumbents, on the application of a Roman Catholic priest, or Nonconformist minister, to grant to the priest or minister permission to perform the burial ceremony in churchyards for individuals of his communion. The application for leave, as well as the reply to the incumbent, was to be made in writing; the object being to protect the rights of the Church, to secure as far as possible the proper and uninterrupted performance of the burial service, and also that if a refusal were given, it should not be upon unreasonable or trivial grounds. But that was not all; the Bill also provided that in case of leave being refused by the incumbent copies of the application and the reply should be forwarded to the Bishop of the diocese, and transmitted by him to the Lord Lieutenant. It would, therefore, be seen that every security had been given to secure to the Roman Catholics the privilege intended to be given to them by Lord Plunket's Act. In a few cases, clergymen might have withheld permission, but the fault, if any had been the priest's, in neglecting to avail himself of the remedy prescribed by the Act. He was not in possession of information with respect to all the cases referred to by his right hon. Friend; but with regard to Enniskillen, he held in his hand the correspondence which had taken place with the Rev. Mr. Greer, the incumbent, who had but a short time before entered upon his office. The first letter of Mr. Greer was in answer to an application that the Roman Catholic priest should be allowed to come in his robes, and was to the effect that he would make inquiries, and if it could be arranged without inconvenience, he would gladly give permission. On inquiry, however, Mr. Greer was obliged to refuse leave for the proposed burial, as he found that the graveyard was overcrowded, and that it could not take place without disturbing the remains of persons already interred, and thereby causing much pain to their relations. The rev. gentleman expressed his regret at this circumstance, and suggested that a subscription should be immediately commenced for the purchase of additional ground; and he said he should himself be most happy to contribute. The rev. gentleman not only was justified in what he did, but must be considered to have acted with great kindness and prudence. He (Mr. Lefroy) regretted that difficulties existed in any case. He should rejoice to see all differences of opinion forgotten at the grave, and that all those who mourned over their deceased relatives and friends should be allowed to assist at that religious service which was most agreeable to their feelings. But at the same time, he did not think that the Established clergy could consistently give up their rights in this matter. In the first place, the churchyard was in the nature of a freehold vested in the clergy and churchwardens, who were answerable for the care of it. He denied that the Roman Catholics laboured under any grievance in this respect. The necessity which the existing law imposed of asking permission of the incumbent for the performance of religious service over the grave was not really an obstacle to such performances. The practice was, as a general rule, to grant the permission sought; and what was the use of encouraging persons to assume a right in opposition to the clergy, which the clergy willingly conceded in all ordinary cases as a matter of courtesy? Moreover, there would be danger of collision, if, without any notice or arrangement, Roman Catholic processions had a right to enter the ground and perform religious ceremonies, at a time when, perhaps, Protestant service was going on. It would form a perpetual ground of dispute and irritation, and would, in all probability, lead to rioting and outrage. As to the Wesleyans, individuals might have made complaints; but he was informed that the great body of them were satisfied with the present arrangement. For the reasons he had just given, he felt it his duty to enter his protest against the propositions of his right hon. Friend. Looking at the state of the House, he saw no advantage in dividing against the second reading; but he should certainly oppose the further progress of the Bill in its present shape.

MR. PIM was glad that the hon. Member for the University of Dublin did not intend to divide the House. He hoped that the House would unanimously agree to the second reading of the Bill. There were many cases in which a clergyman would believe it to be his duty to refuse the permission sought; while, at the same time, no real ground could be urged why it should not be given. A large number of Roman Catholics in Ireland had been buried for centuries in the parochial burial-grounds; and it was very galling to a Roman Catholic that he was obliged to get permission for the priest to read the service over the remains of a relative. But Protestant Dissenters complained on this subject as well as Roman Catholics. He had a few days since presented a petition from the Presbyterians of Dublin, in which they asked that "they should no longer be subject to this grievance, which they conceived to be as inconsistent with the spirit of the age as it is uncongenial to that of the Gospel." He held in his hand a letter from a Wesleyan Methodist minister strongly protesting against the continuance of an irritating law, and stating that his "brethren felt much as he did." The Bill would be received in Ireland with general satisfaction; and he ventured to express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick would be able to pass it through the House without any serious opposition. If any Amendments were required they could be introduced in Committee.

MR. GREENE said, he could not allow the Bill to pass through another stage without entering his strongest protest against it. He felt that the time had come when it was the duty of that House to watch narrowly the progress of events. So far as he could form an opinion upon this subject it did not appear to him that there was any practical grievance affecting the Roman Catholics. He thought that the passing of the present measure would lead to scenes in Ireland which they would all deprecate. Although he was willing to give every liberty to the Roman Catholics, consistently with the security of the Established Church and its rights, he could not yet fail to remember the narrow views of the Romish Church, which interdicted all liberty of conscience and all freedom of action in its members. He said they were advancing towards a state of things that demanded their most serious consideration. To allow the Roman Catholic Church all the privileges of the Church of England was inconsistent with the maintenance of the principles of the Reformation or the national religion. This measure, if passed, would let in the keen edge of the wedge to be followed by further aggression. So long as he had the honour of a seat in that House he would raise his voice against any proposition for the progress of the Romish Church. The hierarchy of that Church not only sought for greater spiritual power in the country, but also for temporal power. One concession after another had been given them by Protestant England with a view to conciliation. Let the people of England mark well what was going on, and take warning in time. Although he should run the risk of being called illiberal, he should certainly feel it his duty if a division took place to vote against the second reading of this Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, this Bill for Ireland was the same in substance as the Bill which had been introduced for England on behalf of the Protestant Dissenters by Sir Morton Peto, and which was discussed upon the Motion for its second reading on the 15th of April, 1863. The House, after mature consideration of its principle, rejected that Bill by a majority of 125. In 1861 the subject had been also before the House; but the proposal of that day was rejected by a small majority, because the opinion upon it was taken unexpectedly. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick now made a similar proposal for Ireland on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. It was perfectly understood that the right hon. Gentleman on all these subjects represents the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland. He (Mr. Newdegate) wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman his simple proposition. The House was perpetually told that the Roman Catholic hierarchy was an aggrieved body. He asked in what respect were they an aggrieved body? He could not understand how they could be considered aggrieved; for the course of legislation had of late years been one continual system of concession to their demands, unless it was assumed that the whole of the ecclesiastical property in Ireland had once belonged to them, and that it ought now to be restored to them. ["No, no!"] He said that that was the ground assumed—not so strongly in that House as out of that House. The grievance everywhere stated by the organs of the Roman Catholic hierarchy was, that the ecclesiastical property of Ireland had been taken from them. Every man who reads the newspapers—every man connected with the Press knows this. It was a principle publicly proclaimed by them out-of-doors. It was, therefore, plain that what the Roman Catholic hierarchy now demanded was restitution of all that ecclesiastical property which they asserted had once belonged to them. The right hon. Gentleman opposite might shake his head at this statement; but he must know very well that this was a principle laid down by the Roman Catholic newspapers and publications. This was the grievance put forward by the Roman Catholic hierarchy. He denied that those complaints came from the Roman Catholic laity. The former asserted that the ecclesiastical property now held by our Church in Ireland was taken from them some 200 or 300 years ago, and that it should now be restored to them. If they would not, in the case of the Church of Ireland, admit the possession for 100 years as establishing a right, which was the rule under the canon law of Rome as regarded such rights, he wished to know to what extent that principle of restitution might not be carried? Another grievance was that the confiscated estates were held by the descendants of those to whom they had been granted by the Sovereign at the time that these estates were confiscated 200 or 300 years ago. Well, he asked whether the House was prepared to meet that assumed grievance, and to disturb the settlement of property in Ireland? Those grievances hung together, and they would never hear the end of them so long as they encouraged the idea that they were willing to gratify these claimants, by concessions, gifts, and largesses—to subvert the tenure and title not only of ecclesiastical property, but of all property alleged to have been confiscated centuries ago, and now held by Protestant owners. He put this matter plainly, because he confessed he was tired of hearing of those grievances, which were perpetually stated out-of-doors, and were acted upon without being avowed in that House. He now came to the consideration of this Bill. If it were deemed just and wise on the part of this House to reject the proposal made on behalf of the Dissenting body in this country, with a similar object in view as the measure before the House, with what consistency or justice could they assent to the proposal now made by the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland? They all knew that special facilities had been granted by law for the accession and preservation of graveyards by the Roman Catholic community. Acts of Parliament had also been passed to provide cemeteries to be open to all religious denominations in Ireland. Nothing, however, would satisfy the Roman Catholic hierarchy, but to gain possession of the property now held by members of the Established Church. They said that the Established Church in Ireland was an insult. Now, he knew at that moment that negotiations were going on through our Foreign Office to obtain sites in Spain for the burial of Protestants, and up to the present time the Government of Spain had refused their assent to such applications. Wherever the Roman Catholic Church obtained command, as in Spain, she would forbid the burial of any Protestant in any of her cemeteries. He would take an early opportunity of asking for the production of the Correspondence in order to verify his statement. He would mention the particulars of a case which occurred in Galway, and which had a bearing upon this subject. A College had been founded in Galway by Edward VI. Some years ago it was broken up, and the property divided into two or three rectories by the Ecclesiastical Commission. A Protestant gentleman having property in Ireland purchased the advowsons of those rectories. The clergy of the Church of England had shown themselves extremely tolerant as to the use of two graveyards which were not immediately connected with these churches. They permitted the Roman Catholic priests the free use of those graveyards, exacting no payment whatever from them, which they might reasonably have done. What was the result now? Those Roman Catholic priests had obtained a very considerable income by possessing themselves of these graveyards, which belonged to the Protestant Church, and it might happen that they would refuse to allow Protestants to be buried in those graveyards. As much intolerance of principle was shown in Ireland by the Catholic priests as was practised by the Catholic Government and hierarchy of Spain. He could not see how the House could justify to itself concessions to the pretended grievances on this subject put forth by the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland, when they knew that those very meek and humble petitioners were really the most aggressive and intolerant when they had the power of being so. By assenting to this Bill they would be making a concession to the Church of Rome which they refused to all religious denominations other than the Church of England in this country. Hon. Members might fancy that they were proving themselves very liberal; but the country would understand their motives for assenting to this Bill. The people would say it was passed under the pressure of apprehended disturbances in Ireland. They would feel that that House was endeavouring to propitiate those whom they never could satisfy without sacrificing the rights of property and the principles of justice in Ireland.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would not have interfered in this discussion, if it had not been for the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who seemed to be under a singular misapprehension, both as to the question before the House, and the scope of the Bill proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell). The hon. Member compared the present Bill with the Bill which had been introduced and defeated in 1863. Now, there was no sort of similarity between the two proposals. The Bill of 1863, which referred to English Nonconformists, was intended to give to those who dissented from the Church of England a right of interment in the graveyards which belonged to that Church. That right had been already conferred on Irish Roman Catholics and Irish Dissenters in 1824, by Lord Plunket's Act; and, therefore, it was not now sought to confer any right of burial. The hon. Member seemed to look upon this proposal as another concession to Roman Catholics, and as such he, of course, opposed it. He (Mr. O'Beirne) must remind him that if it was a concession, it was one which applied to all sects of Christians, and gave them equal rights to have the burial services performed over the graves of their dead. Surely such a reasonable enactment could not be seriously opposed. His right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick in quoting the Act of 1824, had correctly called it a mandatory Act. Lord Plunket, beyond all question, so understood it, as shown by his own words just read to the House. But there was still stronger evidence to be found within the Act itself, as he would show by reading the 5th Section, that Section enacted—

"That if such permission [referring to the permission for burial] be in any case withheld, the cause of withholding the same shall be specially and distinctly declared in writing by such officiating minister of the Church of England, one part of which written declaration shall forthwith be delivered to the person making such application as aforesaid, and one other part thereof shall be transmitted to the Bishop of the diocese in which such churchyard shall be situated, and shall be by him forthwith forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant, signed by the registrar, &c."

Now, he contended that that Section showed very clearly that refusal of the permission was only intended to take place in very special cases. It was, he thought, not a little surprising that this Section, although referred to by hon. Members opposite, had not been read to the House; and, moreover, the cases read by his right hon. Friend showed that the refusals which had been given in writing in no instance complied with this requirement of the Act. On the contrary, this provision that the causes of refusal should be distinctly and specially stated were, it would seem, systematically disregarded by the reverend gentlemen by whom those refusals had been signed. No case whatever had been made against the Bill; no argument had been used, unless, indeed, we were to accept as an argument the repetition by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire of his usual bitter invectives against the Roman Catholic Church and her hierarchy. He (Mr. O'Beirne) had no desire to occupy the House by offering any reply to the hon. Member on that part of his speech; but he could not allow a remark which fell from the hon. Gentleman as to the funds of the Irish Church Establishment, to pass unchallenged. The hon. Member stated, much to his surprise, that the Roman Catholic Bishops had demanded a restitution of the funds which had been taken from the Roman Catholic Church in centuries past. Now, the hon. Member must have known, when he made that statement, that it was wholly without foundation, and he heard him give expression to it with extreme regret, as the hon. Member had had ample and frequent opportunity of satisfying himself that such a charge was entirely without justification. Many hon. Members of this House, who were fully authorized to state the opinions of the Catholic Bishops and ministers, had over and over again stated in the most distinct and unequivocal language, that although it was quite true that the Roman Catholic religion—of which he had the privilege of being a member—had been despoiled and plundered, by unjust laws, of their Church property, in seeking religious equality, which they now demanded, they not only repudiated all idea of touching directly or indirectly one shilling of the funds now enjoyed by the Established Church, but they also very recently rejected all offers of such a nature. How, then, could the hon. Member—who enjoyed a just influence and respect in that House—permit himself to make a statement which, he repeated, he must or should have known was utterly unfounded and contrary to the fact? The hon. Member talked of publications and declarations out-of-doors, he (Mr. O'Beirne) had nothing to do with such publications or declarations. He repeated that the Roman Catholic Church would not touch one shilling of the moneys of the Establishment, and he hoped that such an assertion as that to which he now gave this unqualified contradiction, would not be again repeated within that House. He trusted the discursive remarks to which he had been obliged to give a reply, would not lead the attention of Members away from the fair consideration of the Bill before them. He believed it was a just measure; that it would correct an abuse which was irritating and mischievous; and, if passed, that it would be productive of much social good and give very general satisfaction in Ireland.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that Dr. Moriarty, who calls himself Bishop of Kerry, in a letter published, he thought, last autumn, stated that if the property of the Church of Ireland was placed at the disposal of Parliament a portion of it should be appropriated to Roman Catholic purposes. This was stated in a letter which had been published.

Mr. BRUCE said, that if the House divided he should give his vote for the second reading of the Bill, on the ground that its object was simply to give effect to the Act of 1824. At present the right of Roman Catholics to burial in the parish burial-grounds existed; but it was clear that, as a matter of fact, it had in many cases been refused, not merely to Roman Catholics, but also to Presbyterians and Wesleyans. Indeed the movement in favour of this Bill was far stronger on the part of the Protestant Dissenters of Ireland than on that of the Roman Catholics. He was at a loss to understand why Spain was so often quoted by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Was it that we should imitate her, or that we should act in the spirit of retaliation? In the name of both sides of the House he repudiated both courses. He had supported the Bill introduced by Sir Morton Peto, but which was unfortunately rejected. They must, however, consider the principles of this Bill in connection with the circumstances of the case; and was it not intolerable that in Ireland a small minority should have power to withhold Christian burial from the great majority of the people?

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the Bill had been introduced to prevent the continuance of a great scandal, and to promote conciliation, and not for the purpose of giving any right to the Roman Catholic Church beyond those of other religious bodies. He had supported Sir Morton Peto's Bill. He assured the House that there was in Ireland a strong feeling of reverence for the dead; and consequently there was a great desire that a religious ceremony should be performed over the grave. He recommended the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) to turn his attention to Lutheran

Sweden, where he would find a bigotry calling for the denunciation of one who so strongly condemned the religious feeling of Spain.

MR. HENLEY said, he believed it was generally conceded that, except in very few instances, the Act of 1824 had been carried out. If, however, there were cases in which it had not been acted upon, there ought to be an amendment in the law. This Bill would require amendment. No provision had been made for the preservation of order in the burial-grounds. If he did not consider that the Bill could be altered in that sense in Committee, he would not vote for the second reading. As the Bill now stood, the bodies of persons belonging to two or three different persuasions might be brought into the graveyard at the same moment. The services had to be performed within a limited space; and when persons entertaining different opinions thus came together, religious animosity might lead to unseemly scenes in the graveyards. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) evidently had some misgivings on that point, for, in the Bill, it was provided that burials should not take place during the hours of Divine worship. He (Mr. Henley) thought it would be desirable, when in Committee, to prescribe at what hours deceased persons of the different religious persuasions should be buried, or to give some power to the rectors to regulate the hours.

MR. HADFIELD said, the Bill did not merely relate to Roman Catholics, but also had reference to the members of other Christian denominations. He begged to point out that in the burial-ground belonging to the denomination of Christians to which he belonged a very simple arrangement was adopted. It was open to all classes of Christians who chose to use it, who might perform such religious ceremonies as they desired; or, if they preferred, there might be no religious ceremony at all. No difficulty had been found in arranging the interments of different classes, under reasonable restrictions as to time, and other matters of a reasonable nature. The sting of the Bill, in the opinion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, seemed to be, not the burial of Roman Catholics, but of Protestant Dissenters, in the Church of England burialgrounds. The hon. Gentleman seemed to have a greater dislike to Dissenters than to Roman Catholics, and lost no opportunity that the forms of the House permitted of opposing everything they wished. Their claim to interment in the Church burial-grounds in England ought not to be forgotten, and he hoped the Bill of 1863 would soon be revived. There was no reason why the privilege claimed by the Bill for Dissenters in Ireland should not be extended to their brethren in England. He hoped that a clause to that effect might be introduced in Committee; but if it endangered the passing of the Bill, he should not press it.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS hoped the House would not divide, but read the Bill a second time. The clergymen of the Church of Ireland had hitherto been placed in a false position. The Act of 1824 gave the right, not the privilege, of being buried in the Church burial-grounds in Ireland, which in many instances had been refused. Those who objected to the Bill showed that they had not advanced as they ought to have done as to their sense of what was due from them to the members of other religious denominations. At the grave all religious differences ought to be forgotten. If there was a wedge at all in this case, the thin end had been inserted by the Bill of 1824. He was, he believed, as sincere a Protestant as any Gentleman in that House; but he thought he acted in thorough conformity with Protestant principles in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HUBBARD said, this was not so simple a case as had been described, for the Bill was supported by different speakers on contradictory premises. He did not wish to refer to the question which lurked behind this Bill—namely, that of the Irish Church. The Act of 1824 had, in the great majority of cases, worked well. Power was by that Act reserved to the clergy, because on that power depended the whole legal position of the Church in Ireland; and if it had not been an act of indulgence, but a right as this Bill proposed, there would have been no Established Church in Ireland. They could not accept this Bill without anticipating the great solution of the Irish Church difficulty which was looming before them. The Bill now before the House would be as complete an abolition of the legal status of the Irish Church as any that could be effected by the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). This Bill was a short cut to the point which that right hon. Gentleman proposed to reach by a more circuitous route, and consequently he was not prepared to agree to the second reading of the Bill. The few instances of inconvenience that had arisen were not sufficient to warrant the passing of this Bill. Believing the Bill to be unnecessary, and seeing its indirect effect upon the Irish Church, he could not support it.

Mr. CRUM-EWING supported the Bill. As a Scotchman, he protested against the views of Gentlemen opposite who opposed the Bill. In Scotland persons of all denominations were allowed to have their own religious service at their burial. He hoped the House would not pledge itself by rejecting this Bill to pursue a bigoted policy in religious matters.

Mr. REARDEN said, that the people of Ireland were not only not allowed to live in their country, but were not even allowed to be buried in it. He protested against the practice of the hon. Members for North Warwickshire and Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Greene) of out-ging on all occasions the feelings of the Roman Catholic Members of that House. He had a high respect for the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; but he unnecessarily insulted Roman Catholic Members by his constant reference to the Reformation. He might reply to the hon. Member by saying that Nero was an angel in comparison with Henry VIII.; and as to Elizabeth, he would not say anything of her moral character. The Reformation had led to the establishment of as many different religions as the number of years that had since elapsed. He asked how long the grievances of the Roman Catholics of Ireland were to continue?

Mr. HUBBARD rose to move that the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member could not now make that Motion.

Colonel W. STUART said, as the hon. Member for Buckingham had omitted to make the Motion in his speech, he would do so. He said Protestants had as much, if not more, reason to complain of the language used by Roman Catholics towards Protestants than the former had of the latter. The remarks they had just listened to were not calculated to conciliate Protestants.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel William Stuart.)

SUNDAY TRADING BILL—[Bill 40.]
(Mr. Thomas Hughes, Lord Claud Hamilton, Mr. Lusk.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. THOMAS HUGHES rose to move the second reading of this Bill. It was precisely similar in character to the Bill which the House read a second time last year, with the approval of the then Secretary of State for the Home Department, and which was afterwards considered in Committee of the House, when certain Amendments were inserted. That Bill, however, ultimately became a dropped Order at the end of the Session, and what he now asked the House to do was to place the Bill in exactly the same position as that in which it was left last year. When the second reading was agreed to last year, it was upon the understanding that in case the Bill came out of Committee in an objectionable form, then every hon. Member should be perfectly at liberty to oppose the third reading. That was a perfectly reasonable understanding, and he was quite prepared to act on it if the same course were adopted this year. The Bill was printed in the same form as last year, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Recorder of the City of London (Mr. Russell Gurney), which had been agreed to by the Committee, not being embodied, he (Mr. Hughes) proposed to read the Bill a second time pro forma, and to introduce those words at once before going into Committee. Certain hon. Members were afraid that the Bill would affect the Act of Charles II., and in order to meet their views he would be perfectly willing when the Bill was in Committee to allow a clause to be inserted to prevent the Bill in any way interfering with the operation of that Act. Under these circumstances he hoped the House would consent to read the Bill a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

Mr. FRESHFIELD, who had given notice to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he entirely dissented from the principle of the Bill, believing that it would be improper to alter the law which for 300 years had regulated the observance of the Sabbath in this country. But after the statement of the hon. Member, that, in Committee, he would consent to the introduction of a provision to the effect that the Act of Charles II. should not in any way be interfered with, he would consent to withdraw his opposition at this stage.

Mr. GRAHAM opposed the second reading. The exceptions contained in the Bill were so numerous as to weaken the legal sanction hitherto given to the observance of the Sabbath. They would constitute a fulcrum by means of which the enemies of the Sabbath observance would work hereafter for the further infraction of the Sabbath. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR thought it was most undesirable that the question of Sunday observance should be muddled by a Bill which would involve two conflicting principles. Until the question could be dealt with in a much broader and more satisfactory way we had better leave things as they were. He should, therefore, second the Amendment, though upon quite different grounds from those urged by the Mover.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Graham.)

Mr. FRESHFIELD said, the course which the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hughes) proposed to adopt would secure the object which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) had in view. If he had thought that it would not do so he should certainly have pressed his own Motion for the rejection of the measure to a division. At the same time he was bound to say that he was of opinion that if the Bill did pass into law with the provision of which he had spoken, it would be a dead letter in its operation.

Mr. REMINGTON MILLS thought that the House would stultify itself by passing a measure involving two opposite principles. If the Bill would be a dead letter after the insertion of the provision respecting the Act of Charles II., what was the good of passing it at all? He should certainly vote against the second reading.

COLONEL FRENCH wanted to know what was the use of the House spending time in the discussion of Bills introduced by private Members when there was not the slightest possibility that any result would be arrived at? There were certain public measures as to which the Government would be bound shortly to state what their intentions were with regard to pushing them forward,—as, for instance, the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills—and until the course of Public Business had been settled he should certainly oppose the second reading of this private Bill.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON considered that hon. and gallant Member was under unnecessary alarm in supposing that this Bill would occupy any great length of time. Its principle was fully discussed last Session, and the objections then taken to it had been satisfactorily met. He hoped no further objection would be raised to its progress to-day.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY hoped that the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel French) would be prepared to facilitate the passing of the measures to which he had alluded. But, as the House knew, certain questions had been raised, for which the Government were not responsible, and which interfered with the progress of those measures; and the sooner those questions were out of the way the better the Government would be pleased, in order that they might go on with the business before the House. With respect to the present Bill, he thought there would be ample time to discuss it, and, without committing himself to the support of the third reading, he was prepared to accept the position taken last year by his predecessor. He thought the Bill should be allowed to go into Committee, and it would afterwards be seen whether the measure in its details was one which could be approved by the House. That was the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) last year, and he (Mr. G. Hardy) thought the course was one which might be adopted with convenience now. At the same time he thought that considerable weight was to be attached to the objections both of the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 31: Majority 37.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

(Mr. McLaren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baxter.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'LAREN, having presented several petitions in favour of the measure, said: It is not my intention to occupy the House with any very minute details upon this question. The points which I intend to mention are only those which strike one as being the most salient. I will take up the question as it now stands, mainly as a question of practical grievance. It is the only remains of a church rate which now exists in Edinburgh. That part of it which is distinctly a church rate is the payment which, by an Act passed in 1860, is fixed at £4,200 annually out of the police rates of the city in aid of the stipends of ministers. There is also another small indirect impost; but I will not take up the time of the House by entering into that point at present. The tax has been very much complained of, and it has been a constant source of heartburning and ill-will. I will take the liberty of reading two sentences from a petition which I have presented to-day from Mr. Archibald Young. This gentleman states that he belongs to the Baptist denomination, and that the doctrines of that Church preclude its members from paying anything towards the support of any other Establishment, and that he and his father have resisted doing so. On three occasions he has been dragged through the Courts of Law; and since the passing of the Act of 1860 he has had to pay £50 for legal expenses for opposing the levying of the rate; and since that time he has been dragged into the Court of Session for payment of the arrears of the old Annuity Tax, and is thereby likely to sustain an additional loss of £150. He therefore approves of this Bill as likely to put a stop to this long-vexed question. The petition is but a fair example of others which might be quoted from persons who have been put to very large expenses on account of this tax. The tax has hindered the collection of the other rates of the city, which are mixed up with it, to such a degree that a very large loss occurs annually in the collection. Now, the remedy proposed in this Bill is a very simple one. I propose that out of the endowed churches of the City of Edinburgh the stipend of three of the ministers should be discontinued, and this would relieve a sum of £1,800 annually, and leave them with an endowment of £6,000 from other sources. It may be supposed by parties not conversant with the matter, that the Established Church will suffer by doing this; but I may say with confidence that nothing of the kind can by possibility occur. Hon. Members would hardly believe the paucity of attendance in some of these churches, and the extravagant expenditure which is kept up in three of these churches. The whole of the seat-rents amount to only £278, and the number of seats let in these three churches is only 790. In the other churches of the city there are no fewer than 6,674 seats unlet and free, so that if these 790 persons were to go into other churches no inconvenience could possibly arise. In the whole of the thirteen city churches there are only 8,840 sittings let, and 6,600 unlet and free; and all that is asked by this Bill is that the future ministers of the three churches I have mentioned shall not have any right to the stipends now payable. Vested interests, however, will be respected, because under the arrangement of the Bill the stipends will only cease when a vacancy shall occur in any of these three incumbencies; and after vacancies have occurred in these three cases, there will be no longer any direct church rates levied in the City of Edinburgh. Surely for such a small matter as this it is reasonable that the persons interested should consent to make this small sacrifice. When the stipends in connection with these three Churches have ceased, they may do anything they like with them for the spread of Christianity; and, under some new system, perhaps they may be better able to fill them than they are at present. I should now like to say a word or two as to the accommodation for religious bodies which at present exists in the city of Edinburgh. The Established Kirk of Scotland has 26 places of worship within the extended bounds of the municipality, but only 13 are endowed from this Annuity Tax, while 11 have no public endowment, and depend strictly upon the voluntary offerings of those who attend them, just as the Dissenting places of worship do. Then there are 2 suburban churches which have other endowments. So much for the Established Church. One great cause for this Bill being necessary is the disruption which took place in the Church of Scotland in 1843 because a great number of places of worship have since then been opened in Edinburgh. While there are only 26 Established churches altogether, 35 new Free churches have been erected since 1843, and I have reason to believe that the number of seat-holders in these 35 Free churches is more than double the number of seat-holders in all the Established churches put together. Then there are 18 churches connected with the United Presbyterian body, who are identical in faith with the Free Church, and they are now in treaty for union with the Free Church. If you take these two bodies together, therefore, you have 54 churches, as against 26 belonging to the Established Church; and I have no hesitation in saying that anyone conversant with the facts of the case will say that there are at least four times as many seat-holders in connection with them as are connected with all the Established churches put together. Then we have 12 Episcopal churches, 4 Baptist, 3 Congregational, 3 Evangelical Union, and 3 Roman Catholic. The number of Roman Catholic churches, however, does not give a fair idea of the number of Roman Catholics attending them; for there are no less than 15,000 Roman Catholics in the city of Edinburgh. Then there are 11 churches connected with other denominations, so that, altogether, there are in Edinburgh 115 places of worship. With this fact within their knowledge, can any hon. Member in this House, or any man out of it, stand up and say that, by suppressing 3 of the Established churches, you would do the slightest injury to the Church of Scotland, or to the cause of Christianity? No man would, I think, venture to take such a stand, or to make such a statement. There is plenty of room in the other Established churches of the city. Those who oppose the Irish Church would be very inconsistent if they did not support the Bill which I now ask the House to read a second time. This measure does not seek to suppress the Scotch Church; but is only a measure for lopping off one of its superfluous parts, which circumstances have rendered altogether useless. It is, in fact, just such a measure as the First Minister of the Crown shadowed forth as that which he and his Colleagues would be willing to pass for Ireland—namely, to remove anything in the shape of superfluous accommodation—anything which was not wanted. This Bill points out superfluous accommodation which confers no practical benefit; and now that the times have so changed that all the other sects in Edinburgh—far more numerous than the Established Church—are obliged to contribute more or less directly for the support of a small minority of church-going people, I think the grievance is as great in Scotland as it is in Ireland, and, in some respects, even greater. The time was when the Church of Scotland included, perhaps, not a majority of the inhabitants, but still probably one-half; but I think at present the proportion of the people belonging to that body is so very small in Edinburgh that those who attend these churches are not one-eighth part of the population of the city. Why, then, should all the other classes of religionists who support their own ministers at their own expense be called upon to support three surplus congregations. One of these churches is the High Church, which the Queen attends when in Edinburgh, and which the judges and magistrates attend officially; but there are only 117 sittings in it which are let, and the seat-rents only amount to £42 6s.! The sight it exhibits is very distressing. The arrangements by this Bill are such that a grievance such as this could no longer exist; it would be entirely abolished. There is one other subject upon which I should like to touch, because a good deal has been said about it out-of-doors, and a good deal has been said in the Lobbies of this House—about some alleged compromise that took place in the year 1860, when a Bill was passed for reducing the payment for ministers. The Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh, at whose request I have brought in this Bill, have published a statement which has been pretty extensively circulated, in which they state the facts of the case in a condensed form. They show that they were no parties whatever to any compromise in 1860; but, on the contrary, opposed the Bill at every stage, and that even after the Bill had passed and become law there was a great meeting called in the largest room in Edinburgh, when a solemn protest was agreed to be signed against the measure; and was subscribed by 7,600 ratepayers, of whom upwards of 3,000 were Parliamentary electors, and which was presented to the Town Council; and they have never ceased in their endeavours to get the Act of 1860 repealed. In consequence of all this, they have done me the honour to ask that I would introduce this Bill for the practical repeal of that Act, and I assented with great pleasure. In so far as respects that portion of the original tax still payable under the form of a police rate, amounting to £4,200, the former Bill undoubtedly made a financial improvement. With regard to the lesser sum still paid, it was not only obnoxious in itself, but the conditions under which it was levied were also exceedingly objectionable. Having been a member of the Town Council of Edinburgh for many years, and an attentive observer of events in that city for the last fifty years, I say with confidence that no measure would give more general satisfaction to the inhabitants than that this Bill should pass into law. This is a subject which Her Majesty's Government ought to have dealt with, and I was in hopes that the learned Lord Advocate would have been able to introduce a Bill of his own; in fact, I delayed my Motion for nearly two months expecting this; and if he had brought in a satisfactory measure I should have been only too glad to have given him my support, and to have withdrawn my Bill. However, I see no chance of anything of the kind being done—in fact, it appears to be entirely out of the question, and therefore I must ask the House to be kind enough to affirm the principle of this Bill by voting for the second reading.

MR. CRUM-EWING: I beg to second the Motion. I shall only say that if this House is of opinion that justice in matters of religious belief ought to be done to the people of Ireland, it will also do justice to the people of Scotland, and do away with a tax which has been a fertile source of discontent and strife in the city of Edinburgh. After the very excellent reasons given by my hon. Friend who introduced this Bill why it should be read a second time, I will not occupy the attention of the House by any further observations.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."
 —(Mr. M'Laren.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said:—I cannot help saying that any hon. Member interested in this question, who has inquired into the facts, must be quite sensible that the result of the arrangements made in 1860, and so late as 1867, has been to produce a greatly improved state of feeling in Edinburgh; and the tax is now collected in a way which is very creditable to the people of that city. I do not found upon the absence of agitation as a reason for withholding justice to the people of Edinburgh. Quite the contrary. But I hope the spirit which has existed of late in regard to this matter will have its effect, and that we shall in future find that the Annuity Tax is not that bone of contention which unfortunately it has been for so many previous years. This tax has existed, as explained by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) from the time of Charles I. There are many places in Scotland in which the ministers were supported by the burghs, without having any teinds for their maintenance. At the time of the Reformation, the burghs having obtained Church property on certain conditions, the obligation was imposed upon them to support the ministers. In Edinburgh, it appears that there was some arrangement of this kind; but unfortunately there was some failure of the property given, and the people of Edinburgh applied to have a tax imposed upon them for the support of their ministers. That tax has existed from that down to the present day. It was originally placed at 6 per cent., and comparing it with the rental, it amounted to 10*d.* in the pound; but from 1820 the ministers ceased to be stipendiaries, and became entitled to the whole proceeds of the tax. Previous to that time they had been to some extent stipendiaries. The city of Edinburgh had accumulated a sum in excess of that which they had paid to the ministers, amounting to £50,000. The ministers subsequently to 1820 having become entitled to the whole proceeds of the tax, considerable dissatisfaction was felt in regard to its payment. In the first place, it was held that 10*d.* in the pound was too large; and, in the second place, the tax was held to be unjust in this respect, that a large and wealthy class of persons in Edinburgh, who answered in this country to the barristers and attorneys, were wholly exempt from the payment of the tax. This caused a very natural agitation among the people. Thirdly, and more especially, the tax was objected to by those who, professing the voluntary principle, were opposed to an Establishment; and I recognize the hon. Member who introduced the Bill as a prominent objector to the tax. In the progress of that agitation in 1848, Sir John Lefevre was sent by the then Government to Edinburgh to inquire into the operation of the tax, and made a Report on the subject. He found that there were fifteen churches, and eighteen ministers in Edinburgh, and that there were some of them what were termed Collegiate churches. He recommended that the double charges should be reduced to single ones, and that the ministers should become stipendiaries; and that after the death of the existing incumbents they should have right only to a stipend of £550 a year, it being then somewhat more than £600 a year. He also recommended that exemption in favour of the legal profession should be abolished. Notwithstanding this, nothing more was done till 1851, when there was the Report of a Select Committee of the House; and the Report pointed to the reduction of the Ministers from eighteen to fifteen, and recommended that there should be a fund created for the payment of the Ministers, of which £2,200 should consist of the Annuity Tax. The Annuity Tax was therefore adhered to. Several attempts were made to settle the matter, and in 1860 the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Moncreiff) introduced a measure for the purpose of bringing it to a termination; and he proposed that the exemption in favour of the legal classes should be abolished. The result would, of course, be that there would be a large addition to the proceeds of the tax; and he proposed further that the tax should be continued in order to accumulate a fund which should be sufficient at the end of fifteen years to put an end to the tax altogether. That was a proposition which I regret exceedingly was not carried into effect; because the result would have been that by this time we should have been more than half through the period, and we should have been able to see a prospect of the complete termination of the tax. But the Lord Provost of the day addressed a letter to the hon. and learned Member, who held the office which I have now the honour to hold, suggesting that the Bill would give no relief to the parties aggrieved, and that it would be much better to reduce the amount of the tax, so that there should be a sensible relief given to the people. My hon. and learned Friend was reluctant to adopt this course, but it was pressed upon him by the authorities; and there is no doubt that it was a principle which was not combated by one individual at that stage of the proceedings—namely, that a certain portion of the Annuity Tax should be retained. Unfortunately, a discussion arose on the part of some persons who objected to the kind of security which was to be given, and to some other matters which I do not think affected the question of principle. Well, my hon. and learned Friend thought proper to proceed with the Bill, which proposed to go further than the recommendations of the Select Committee and those of Sir John Lefevre, in not only proposing to abolish Collegiate charges, but to take away the ministers from two of the churches of the Old Town, which was very distasteful to the ministers of the town of Edinburgh. But, at the same time, looking upon it as a Bill which would bring about the settlement of a long-vexed question, the result was, that these ministers did not oppose the measure, and it was passed. There were certain advantages attending the measure. The condition of the payment to ministers since the passing of the Bill of 1860 was this—A bond was granted by the city of Edinburgh over their property for an annuity of £4,200 in perpetuity. That was secured on the property of the town, which was a security that, being considered in all other cases to be a very good one, was offered to the ministers. This bond constituted the security, and the town was empowered to impose a tax for the purpose of relieving itself from the payment of the bond. No doubt it was a substitution for the Annuity Tax, which was not to be levied as such; and it was thought that it would relieve the scruples of those who objected to pay it as an Annuity Tax that it should be paid in the same way as the police tax. Further, the ministers were entitled to the seat-rents, which amounted to about £3,000 a year. There were certain burdens upon this sum—namely, the repair of the churches. The people were relieved of church rates, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners undertook to make payment for all the repairs of the churches. It was hoped that the result of passing that Bill would have been to have put an end to all further agitation upon the subject; but the arrangements proposed were not altogether agreeable to the Church in Edinburgh, because it was thought a great grievance that some of its ministers should be taken away. The result has been this—The property of Edinburgh has for many years been increasing year by year, and if the ministers had continued to be entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the Annuity Tax, or even if they had remained stipendiaries, they would be realizing incomes of from £800 to £1,000 a year; but instead of that they consented to restrict their stipends to £600 a year, and ultimately to £550. There was also this great advantage accruing to the citizens, that the professional classes, in order to conciliate the general public, agreed to forego the exemption to which they had been up to that time entitled, and to render themselves liable to the tax; so that, for six years previous to the introduction of this Bill, the professional gentlemen who had before been exempt have contributed towards the support of the clergy, thus relieving the general public from a burden which would otherwise have fallen upon it exclusively. Therefore the House will observe that the clergy abated a large amount of the legal claim; and the professional classes subjected themselves, for the first time, to the payment of the Annuity Tax, and continued to pay it from that time to the present. Matters went on in this way down to 1866, when application was made to the House to appoint a Select Committee to report upon the subject. That Committee took evidence, but made no Report, not considering it necessary to do so. In 1866, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) introduced a similar Bill to the present—indeed it was almost precisely the same as the present. It was proposed that it should be read a second time at the end of February last year; and on the second reading it was rejected by a considerable majority. In the month of May one of the ministers of the Canongate died. The Canongate is under a separate municipal government, and was not included in the Bill of 1860, so that the inhabitants of the Canongate were subject to the grievance of having still to pay 10*d.* in the pound down to last year, while those of Edinburgh only paid 3*d.* in the pound, which certainly is a very considerable reduction. As soon as one of the ministers of the Canongate died, it was brought under the notice of the Government, who considered it right that the Canongate should be placed in the same position as the people of Edinburgh; and accordingly an Act was passed last Session reducing the Annuity Tax in the Canongate from 10*d.* to 3*d.* in the pound, and this Bill is now working very satisfactorily. Well, then, I confess that I do feel surprised that now, in 1868, one of the first measures brought forward is what is called the Canongate Annuity Tax Bill, after the passing of the Act of last year, one of the provisions of which is that the Annuity Tax should be abolished altogether in the Canongate—that is to say, that the reduced tax of 3*d.*, provided for by the Act of 1867, should be extinguished. And what is the provision made for the support of the ministers of the Canongate? Only one of these ministers has a claim upon the Annuity Tax for a stipend of £250. What is the provision made in this Bill for the support of this clergyman? The proposal is to give him the seat-rents; but in the Canongate, which is a very poor district, the seat-rents do not amount to more than £16 or £18, and any further provision for the minister must be made by those inhabitants of the Canongate who are able and willing to pay.

MR. M'LAREN: I beg to explain that that is not so. The Canongate minister is not to depend upon the seat-rents in his own church, but those seat rents are to be amalgamated with the seat-rents of the city churches. The Canongate seat-rents and the city seat-rents, with the income from the other accumulated funds, would give the minister of the Canongate £250.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: That may be so; but I do not know why the burden of the Canongate church is to be thrown upon the city churches. The Canongate church and the city churches have always been kept distinct, and I do not know why the city should now bear the burden. Then it is proposed by the Bill to abolish three of the city ministers, which is going further than the Report of the Select Committee or Sir John Lefevre. But five of the city ministers were taken away in 1860. I object to any further reduction. And, with regard to the city ministers, what provision is made for them? They are to be supported out of the seat-rents. These seat-rents produce at present from £1,600 to £1,800 a year, after provision has been made out of them for the repairs of the churches. For the repairs of these churches it is now proposed that the collections at the church doors should be appropriated, amounting to about £1,400 a year. But these collections at the church doors are given for the support of the poor, and we find them a most valuable fund for preventing the spreading of pauperism. There are many persons who, by a little timely aid, are kept from actual pauperism. By this Bill, the collections at the church doors will be taken from the poor; but it does not follow that the congregations will contribute them for the purpose of repairs. I venture to say that, to take this sum away from the poor is a step which this House will not sanction. I submit, therefore, that our proper course is not to countenance this Bill by reading it a second time. It must not be supposed that the Established Church is negligent of its duties. There are other Churches doing their best for the poor throughout Edinburgh; but the Established Church is pre-eminently the Church on which the poor have claims. Dr. Maxwell Nicholson, a minister of the Tron Church, speaking of the poor in the Old Town of Edinburgh, says—

“We have to prepare for the services of the Lord's-day. We have to visit the sick, both of our parishes and congregations; we have to visit our congregation, and the inhabitants of our parishes from house to house; we have to set agoing schools, to keep going Sunday-schools; we have to set agoing Bible-classes, we have the poor to attend to. In the Tron Church Parish we have our regular kitchen for providing food for the poor, where there is regular cooking for them. We provide them with clothing, we provide them with coal, we provide their children with education; either paying for it or seeing they are sent to schools where no payment is required. Finding that so many girls who remained in the parish went to utter ruin, we set agoing an industrial school for girls, in order to train them for domestic service. Then, in the Tron parish we have services on the Lord's-day. I do not think I shall be able to carry it on now; but during the life of my venerable colleague we had two services in church at ordinary hours, and then I had a service in the parish for the very poor on Sunday evening. Then we had two other meetings during the week for public worship; one during the day, and one in the evening. The one was superintended by a missionary, and the other was conducted by ourselves. Then, it is to be remembered, that we and the city missionaries have to do with hospitals, and charitable societies; and for myself I have to do with the Infirmary, where I have acted as colleague with Mr. McLaren very frequently; and I believe I am well employed in attending to the noble charity, because my own parish is very greatly benefited by it. My own congregation is benefited by the Heriot School, by Heriot's Hospital, by Donaldson's Hospital, by the Destitute Sick Society, and by a great many other societies with which I am connected.”

Now, these are the duties which are performed by these gentlemen in the Old Town district of Edinburgh, and they are assisted by missionaries, who are paid either by the congregations connected with the Church, or by the aid of more wealthy people in the New Town. Reference has been made to the fact of their not being many seats taken in some churches. It is unfortunate that in the case of two of these churches the clergymen are in very indifferent health, and that may to some extent explain the reason why the churches are not so well attended; but the other Old Town churches are full. I believe there are no seats to be had in them. I venture, therefore, to think that the proper course will be not to countenance this Bill, which repeals the Act of 1860 and the Act of last Session. Whether it be possible to obtain some relief for the citizens of Edinburgh from any other ecclesiastical funds in the country is a question which I certainly should be very happy to see solved in the affirmative, and I shall do my best to give some assistance in that way; but, whether that be so or not, I think it would be exceedingly dangerous to countenance this Bill by allowing it to be read a second time. I therefore move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. MILLER seconded the Motion, not so much on the grounds which had been so excellently stated by the right hon. and learned Lord as on account of the injustice that it did to the interests of Leith. It provided that the stipends of the Edinburgh ministers should be provided out of £4,200 to be obtained from seat rents and £2,000 from the revenues of Leith Docks. It was true that for some time past this sum of £2,000 had been levied from the Leith revenues. His constituents had never agitated for its abolition, because they felt that in any scheme for abolishing the Annuity Tax their claim would also be attended to. But now it was proposed that while the tax was to be abolished as far as Edinburgh was concerned, it was to be maintained upon the harbour and port of Leith. If he asked the hon. Member for Edinburgh why this tax was to be continued, no doubt he would say, as he had often said before that the docks and harbours of Leith were originally the property of the city of Edinburgh. It was, however, very easy to prove the fallacy of this argument. In 1838, the Corporation of the city of Edinburgh being bankrupt, brought in a Bill to sell the Leith harbours and docks to a joint-stock company, for £25,000, and the titles of the city were inquired into, and it was then found that the city had no right of property—that the harbour was public property, and was vested in the corporation in trust. If Edinburgh were to be relieved from the burden of supporting her ministers Leith ought to be relieved also.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. CANDLISH said, he apprehended that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would rather have the vote than the advocacy of the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Miller). As he understood the hon. Member, he would disestablish the Church, at any rate disendow it, by withdrawing from it that which has been made its property by Act of Parliament. Whatever might be said of taxes, dues must be of the nature of property; and yet the hon. Member had proposed that the dues on the Leith Docks should be abandoned. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of the services rendered by the clergymen in the Old Town of Edinburgh. There were two answers to these statements. In the first place, their industry, Christian effort and zeal had never been called in question; and in the second place, there were other ministers in Edinburgh as zealous and as industrious, having charge of congregations as poor, and labouring in as poor a locality—yet, these rev. gentlemen had no aids external to their Churches, and were dependent for support on the voluntary efforts of their congregations. The right hon. Gentleman led the House to believe that by this Bill the income of the clergy would be reduced; but it will not reduce the stipend of a single clergyman in Edinburgh. The stipends of the clergy would remain as at present; and even their successors would be in precisely the same position, barring the three churches that were abolished by the Bill. No personal interest would be affected by it, presently or prospectively. The Bill did not ask the congregations to increase their contributions towards the maintenance of their clergy, or, if any advance was expected, it was not more than £100 in £4,000; and he apprehended that the clergy of the Established Church did not labour amongst the poor more exclusively than the Dissenting ministers; but that, on the contrary, their congregations were composed of the richer classes of the Old Town. He apprehended that there was no objection to the principle of the Bill, for it conformed to principles already adopted by Parliament in the Act of 1860. It would neither diminish the provision for the religious well-being of the city of Edinburgh, nor touch the religious belief of persons it affected. Even if they had to have recourse to other churches, there were thirty-five of the Free Church, and eighteen of the United Presbyterian Church, where precisely the same form of worship was observed as in the Established Church; but there is ample room in the churches of the Establishment for all who would be withdrawn from the churches dealt with by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had failed to show what damage will be done by the Bill. A case in its favour is made out by the fact that there is ample provision for the spiritual wants of Edinburgh in the existing churches, and by the fact that by the present law an injustice is inflicted upon seven-eighths of the people of Edinburgh. He was surprised that any one should defend this tax of 3d. in the £1, for it degraded the clergy to the position of a police force, the tax being collected in connection with and as a police tax. It appeared that the Bill of 1860 was not satisfactory either to the Dissenters or the members of the Established Church, and therefore he should support the Motion for the second reading of this Bill.

MR. MONCREIFF: As I carried through the Bill of 1860, I will say a few words on the Motion before the House. I shall vote in favour of the Amendment of my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, not so much on the merits of the Bill, as because I think the settlement of 1860 was fair and equitable under the circumstances of the case; and it is not desirable to disturb that arrangement. But on the subject of the merits of the Bill, I will simply say that I doubt very much whether its finance will at all come up to the representations of the hon. Member. The substance of the Bill in point of finance is simply this—that the Established Church is left to its own voluntary resources, with the exception of the £2,000, about which the hon. Member for Leith has made so loud a complaint, the seat-rents, and the church-door collections. So far as the £2,000 is concerned, I do not think the hon. Member for Leith need be much disturbed; because if this Bill were to pass this year, next year we may find more empty churches, and on the same principle as that on which my hon. Colleague has introduced his Bill, Leith would be relieved from the payment of the £2,000. With regard to the rest of the finance of the Bill, the £4,200 can only be made available after the seat-rents—on the assumption that the church-door collections are sufficient to maintain the fabric of the building. I doubt very much whether that will be found to be the case, even if it were desirable to apply these collections in that way. If the collections were so applied, they would soon fall off in amount; and if it is intended to keep this as an endowment for the Established Church, I believe it will turn out to be an illusive idea. The question whether we should have an Established Church in Scotland is another matter altogether; but if you are to raise the question, it would be better to state boldly what principle of the Established Church should be given up, and should trust to the voluntary principle for providing the necessary appliances. I do not belong to the Established Church. I belong to the Free Church, and feel a pride in the great effort and sacrifice it has made, and the wonderful increase it has met with; but, on the other hand, let us not discuss this as a mere formal question—adopting the voluntary principle on the one hand, and rejecting it on the other. If the Established Church is to be maintained, it must be maintained with a reasonable endowment; but it is not on that ground that I shall vote with my right hon. and learned Friend. I wish to make an explanation about the settlement of 1860. That was a fair settlement of a question which had been long pending, but we are two parties—a good deal being surrendered on each side—and it would not be fair to take advantage of the surrender made by the Established Church as the groundwork of a second assault. It is, perhaps, unfortunate for me that I have been a kind of medium between the contending parties, without having much sympathy with the views of either. When I held the office now filled by my right hon. Friend, I was applied to by both sides to see whether the controversy could not be settled. There had previously been various attempts at a settlement. A Committee of the House of Commons in 1853 recommended a substantial reduction of the number of ministers, and that any deficiency in the funds for their support should be made up by an appropriation of municipal taxes. It was thought by the voluntary Dissenters of Edinburgh that if the ministers ceased to be the collectors of the tax, and it were left to the magistrates to impose, they would be able conscientiously to pay it, and that was the opinion of my right hon. Colleague in 1853, for in that year, he being the Chief Magistrate, asked me to introduce a Bill based on that principle. I introduced that Bill, and a great meeting of Dissenters in Edinburgh was almost unanimous in its favour, and the Town Council also supported it. But the clergy were opposed to the arrangement, and it fell through. In 1857 another attempt was made at the instance of the Town Council, who requested me to introduce a Bill not founded on the principle of a permanent municipal tax, but for continuing the existing tax for twelve years, doing away with the exemptions which existed, and forming a sinking fund of a capital out of which the ministers would be endowed. But that also failed. We were in this position in 1860—we had had thirty years of acrimonious warfare, and there was all manner of ill-feeling on both sides, and the greatest possible discontent, and it was felt that an arrangement should be come to by giving up something on both sides. I voted for Mr. Black's Bill in 1857. It passed the second reading with a considerable majority, but the House knew it had not the slightest chance of passing into law; and, if this Bill were carried, we should have years of conflict before us. In 1860, I made a proposal to continue the tax for fifteen years, and then put an end to it altogether; but the Town Council of Edinburgh changed their minds on this matter. I will refer to what was said by my Colleague at that time—Mr. Black—for whom this House and all who knew him have the most unfeigned respect. He said—and insisted on it in a speech at Edinburgh—that the tax should cease at the end of fifteen years; but a meeting, subsequently held, pronounced in favour of a diminished and perpetual tax, in the hope of promoting peace; and, accordingly, a Resolution to that effect was sent to me from the Lord Provost and a committee of the Town Council. At a public meeting held about the same time similar resolutions were passed, to this effect—that they would acquiesce in the proposal of a tax on occupiers, which would enable the Corporation to provide the funds for thirteen ministers at £600 a year, taking the seat-rents, the tax to be redeemable at the option of the ratepayers and undoubted security being given for the payment of the stipends. The meeting passed resolutions, and the Magistrates approved of them. I was not present at the meeting, but they communicated with me officially, and I was therefore entitled to conclude that they were agreed upon a settlement. The details, certainly, were not agreed upon; but the principle was, and it was to be a Government measure. Accordingly, my next duty was to communicate with those who were connected with the Established Church. Well, they were willing to have the ministers reduced to thirteen. The proposition in 1853 was, that they should be reduced to fifteen; so that there was a gain to this extent. No doubt it was a hard wrench, and galling to their ride as an institution, to submit to this ; and doubtless they conscientiously thought that it was a diminution of the means of religious instruction in Edinburgh. But nevertheless they acquiesced in it. They acquiesced in having their stipends fixed at £600. Therefore we had the inhabitants on the one hand, and the ministers on the other, agreed upon these general principles. Upon one matter only did they differ. The Town Council meeting had decided that the seat rents should be valued, rising from £1,600 to £2,500. I found that the Church would not consent to that, because they thought it would diminish their stipends. The consideration I had, therefore, was whether I would surrender the Bill altogether, and thus have a war for another thirty years. I came to the conclusion that it was my duty not to allow the opportunity of a settlement to be lost; and I did so the more for this reason, that the whole difference in the amount of seat-rents, promised on the one hand and refused on the other, was far more than compensated for by the fact that, at that moment, there were two vacancies not filled up in the city churches, and if the Bill was lost that year those vacancies would have to be filled up, and thus the city would be saddled with two more life-interests. Now, that was the position of the Act of 1860. Great opposition has undoubtedly arisen to that Act; but, on the other hand, I must say that I think the town has received very great benefit. The question is whether we ought to go back? For my part, I think we ought not to do so. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last appears to think that the ministers levy this tax for their own support. Now, the ministers have nothing to do with it. The settlement of 1860 was a settlement of this kind: the ministers were no longer paid by the tax, but their stipends were saddled upon the property of the town, and the tax was intended for the purpose of filling up the void made in the municipal funds. And this leads me to remark that I do not think my friends of the Council have been administering the town funds in the spirit of the Act. I find that they have been paying off debts; and I do not believe that they are entitled to levy this 3d. in the pound for municipal purposes and to pay off the debt. In conclusion I will say that it is an unfortunate matter that we should be still embroiled in this question; but I should have been discharging my duty very inadequately were I to give my countenance and support to the Bill under the circumstances which I have endeavoured to bring under the notice of the House.

COLONEL SYKES said, that some most scandalous scenes had taken place in Edinburgh in connection with this subject. The police tax was levied upon all denominations of Christians and Jews, so that the ministers were paid out of a tax contributed mainly by those who did not receive any religious benefit in return. He considered the case exactly analogous to that of church rates in England. He contended that it was most unjust to compel those who did not derive any advantage from the ministrations of these clergy — against whom, as a body, he did not wish to say a single word; on the contrary, very many of them were distinguished for their piety, zeal, and ability; but what he did say was, that persons of other religious persuasions should not be called upon to pay towards their maintenance and support. No Dissenter ought to be compelled to contribute to this tax. What had been the result of the present state of things in Edinburgh? The Dissenters had offered to pay the tax collector the amount levied upon them for police purposes, but not the proportion which went to the clergy annuity. Of course the tax collector would not receive this, and the arm of the law was brought in; and he would quote to them an instance of what had followed. A respectable shopkeeper was told that the power of the law would be brought to bear against him if he did not pay, and that a distress would be levied upon his goods. He put armour plates around his shop and door; but the local authorities were too strong for him, for they came with a posse of constables, who, armed with sledge-hammers, beat in his door, his goods were carried off to an auction room and offered for sale, amidst tumult and execrations; and such scenes had been often repeated. Was not this a scandal to a Christian country? Could anything be more irreconcilable with the principle of peace and good-will to all men? Well, the question for the House to consider was, whether they desired to have these scenes repeated? He hoped they did not. It was to be regretted that the proposition made by his right hon. Friend in 1860 was not acquiesced in.

Mr. M'LAREN rose to reply. He said, in respect to the alleged compromise, I will just mention a fact, rather than enter into any argument. When the Bill was before the House, there was a petition presented against it, signed by 14,000 inhabitants; and after the Bill had received the Royal Assent, there was a public meeting held to protest against it. A memorial to the Town Council was got up, which was signed by none but householders. It received 7,600 signatures; there being no less than 3,000 of these Parliamentary electors. I now come to the question touched upon by the hon. Member for Leith. Thirty years ago it was thought desirable to take the harbour of Leith out of the hands of the Corporation of Edinburgh, who held it by a charter from Robert the Bruce. In what I am about to say I speak from personal knowledge; because I held the honorary office of City Treasurer at that time, and came to London to get the Bill carried through. Well, the Government of that day sent down the Vice-President of the Board of Trade (now Lord Taunton) to value the interest of the city of Edinburgh in the harbour, and he valued the interest of the city of Edinburgh in the harbour at £7,680 as an annuity. A Select Committee was appointed to consider this proposal, and many of the first men in Parliament of that day were appointed Members of that Committee — Sir James Graham being amongst the number. I gave evidence before the Committee; and they unanimously approved of the proposal which had been made. A few years since the same process was adopted in Liverpool; but the Corporation of that town got an annuity of £75,000 for their interest, as against our getting £7,680. The Select Committee in our case said—You must, however, pay £2,000 to the clergy out of the £7,680, and abolish a rate levied for their behoof, called the Merk per ton. All this was done as recommended by that Committee, and it is, therefore, a pure delusion to think that this payment is a burden on Leith; because, if the Established Church were abolished to-morrow, the city of Edinburgh would continue to draw this £2,000. The whole of the public bodies of Leith have petitioned in favour of this arrangement. I had the personal friendship of one who was nearly related to the hon. Gentleman — Mr. Miller — he then being the Treasurer to the Borough of Leith.

MR. MILLER: I must claim the indulgence of the Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman

is out of order. If he has anything to say, he must reserve his explanation until after the hon. Gentleman who is now in possession of the House has concluded his remarks.

MR. M'LAREN: I am referring to the hon. Member's own father, who was a most anxious promoter of this Bill. Well, now, let me refer to another subject. I have been twitted with my opinions in 1853. That is a long time ago; and I have got wiser since that time, not only upon this, but upon many subjects. But let me say this much, that I was then in favour of household suffrage, and the abolition of the Irish Church; and yet hon. Gentlemen have made good speeches on these subjects now, while they were strongly opposed to them at the time I speak of. We live in changing times. It is said that by this Bill we are placing the Church on the voluntary system. But hon. Gentlemen who say so would appear not to know the meaning of the voluntary principle. Now, what is its meaning? Why, it means finding everything for themselves. But does this Bill propose anything like that? Certainly not. Under this Bill the clergy will get their £4,000 for seat-rents, and the £2,000 from the city of Edinburgh. Surely, then, this Bill cannot be the introduction of the voluntary system. The Lord Advocate knows well enough that this question will never be settled except on some such basis as that which I now propose. It is of no use blinking the matter. The attempt to put a stop to this grievance must ultimately succeed; and I think it would be a wise thing for the Lord Advocate to withdraw himself from the position which he has taken in connection with the matter. If the Bill fails once or twice, you may be sure the agitation will be continued; and ultimately you may find a measure carried going much further than the one at present under the consideration of the House. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will consent to read the Bill a second time.

MR. MILLER desired to make some observations upon the speech which had just been delivered; but—

MR. SPEAKER said, that it would not be competent for him, in explanation, to reply to the speech just made. He must confine himself to any point on which he might himself have been misunderstood.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had voted against this Bill on a former occasion, because he thought a compromise had been entered into between the parties; but since that time, having given the matter a fuller consideration, he had come to the conclusion that, on the present occasion, he ought to give the measure his support, and accordingly he should vote for the second reading. The question was parallel with the church rate question in this country; and the case proved how wise those who had advocated the abolition of church rates had been, in always declining to enter into any compromise whatever. Although the present measure was not the voluntary system, yet it was a step in that direction; and therefore he should give it his support.

ASSASSINATION OF MR. D'ARCY M'GEE. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that though their Lordships had come to a Resolution, requiring Notice to be given before Questions were asked, he nevertheless hoped that, inasmuch as he had no opportunity of placing on the Paper a Notice of a Question he desired to ask in reference to a matter of some importance, the House would permit him now to put the Question to the noble Duke at the head of the Colonial Department. Their Lordships were all aware that an exceptionally atrocious crime had recently been committed in Canada. Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, a public man of great eminence in the colony, after leaving the Parliament House, had been most cruelly and foully assassinated in the streets of the capital of Canada, and while on the door-steps of his own house. He deeply regretted the loss of Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, not only on personal grounds, but because he thought that gentleman's services would—at the present moment especially—have been most valuable, in connection with the recent constitutional changes in Canada. Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee was the leader of the Irish Roman Catholic party in that colony, and on more than one occasion he had, by his remarkable character, and by the influence he exercised over his Irish fellow-subjects, rendered essential service to the Crown, to his adopted country of Canada, and also to his mother country, the connection with which he dearly prized. The loss of such a man was deeply to be regretted. It was said that he had fallen a victim to that dark conspiracy which embodied itself under the name of Fenianism. Not knowing how far that suspicion might be well founded, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) should be sorry to make the Fenian conspiracy responsible for another atrocious crime until its responsibility on that head was clearly and absolutely made out. For the present he would content himself with asking the noble Duke the Colonial Secretary, Whether he could give the House any information respecting this lamentable occurrence?

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that it was unfortunately too true that Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee had fallen a victim to assassination on leaving the Parliament House at Ottawa. Little was known of the details beyond what had already appeared in the ordinary channels of information; but within the last twelve hours he had received from the Governor General Lord Monck, a despatch, a few passages from which would constitute the best Answer he could give to the Question addressed to him. The despatch was dated the 9th of April, 1868, and in it Lord Monck stated—

"I have the honour—with feelings of regret and horror, to announce to your Grace the assassination of the Hon. T. D'Arcy M'Gee, M.P., at about two o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, the 7th instant. Mr. M'Gee had left the House of Commons, which had just adjourned, and walked to his own residence, which was situated close by. It would appear that while stooping down to insert a latch key in the door of his house the assassin must have come behind him and put a pistol close to the back of his head, the bullet from which passed right through and out at his mouth, causing almost instantaneous death. The general impression, in which I concur, is that this atrocious crime has been the work of some member of the Fenian organization, prompted, most likely, by the eloquent and vigorous denunciations which Mr. M'Gee persistently launched against that conspiracy. . . . The Government of the Dominion has offered a reward of 5,000 dollars; those of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec 2,500 dollars each; and the cities of Montreal and Ottawa respectively 5,000 dollars and 4,000 dollars for the discovery of the perpetrator. The city of Montreal has decided that the funeral shall be a public one, conducted at the expense of the citizens; and it is the intention of my Ministers to recommend to Parliament that a provision shall be made out of the public purse for the widow and orphans of Mr. M'Gee."

In a private note written on the same day, just as the mail was closing, Lord Monck stated—

"I think we have the perpetrator of the crime in custody, and as we have every reason to believe that several persons were privy to the act, I hope the large reward which has been offered will induce some of them to give evidence."

He could add nothing to what had been stated by the noble Earl, in reference to the loss of Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee. He feared that Mr. M'Gee had fallen a victim to the principles that guided him, and he seemed to have risked his life for what he considered the good of his country. He believed that Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee was warned beforehand—and it seemed he was not the only one—of the fate which awaited him if he persisted in the course of loyalty and devotion which he was pursuing. Within an hour of the time of his death Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, in the course of the discussion in the Parliament at Ottawa, used as almost his last words, "Base is he who would not risk his popularity in a good cause—that of his country." It was sad to reflect that he should have fallen a victim to an act as foul as ever was committed, for his main object had been to keep his fellow-countrymen in the path of duty, and to prevent their being led astray by designing men; and his loyalty and devotion to Canada and to the mother country were his only crimes.

ABOLITION BILL.(Earl Russell.)

(NO. 55). SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships to give a second reading to this Bill. The reasons for the Bill, are contained in its Preamble. It is stated that the collection of church rates has ceased to be made or collected in a great number of the parishes in the country, and that in others their collection has given rise to litigation and ill-will, and it is pleaded that it is advisable that the abolition of compulsory church rates should take place. The first part of the Bill is exceedingly clear and exceedingly plain, and practically puts an end to the compulsory payment of church rates. Your Lordships will see from the provisions of the Bill that, so far as the objection to church rates is concerned, the grievances complained of are entirely abolished, and entire satisfaction is given to those who have hitherto opposed the levying of church rates. The first clause of the Bill enacts that henceforth no proceeding shall be instituted in any ecclesiastical or other Court to enforce the payment of church rates. The next clause of the Bill provides that where money had been borrowed on the faith of church rates, or in cases where the parish is liable for an extra rate, the re-payment of the money shall continue to be secured by means of church rates. Provision is also made in regard to particular cases. The words are very general; and if they do not completely answer their object, I should be ready to assent to the introduction of any words to carry that object into effect. The object is to preserve the sum or allowances made in certain places and parishes where sums which are not applicable to the building or repair of churches, or to any purposes for which church rates are usually levied, have been, by Act of Parliament or otherwise, set apart for the purpose of giving a salary or allowance to the minister of the church in lieu of other claims that he might have. There are several cases in this metropolis—Bishopsgate and Bethnal Green for example—where by Act of Parliament the tithes have been commuted for an annual sum collected upon houses, and those sums are called by the name of church rates. It is evident that it would be inequitable to abolish the collection of such sums; and persons deriving an income from such allowances would have a fair right to complain if their income was put an end to by Act of Parliament. The second part of the Bill, which begins at the 5th clause, is by no means of the same nature as the first, and is intended solely for the purpose of keeping up the machinery of church rates where it may be considered a convenient mode for obtaining the sums necessary for the repair of the fabric of the church. Your Lordships are aware that the circumstances in connection with the levying of church rates is very different in different parishes. I remember some years ago asking an archdeacon what his experience was in relation to church rates; and his answer was that generally in towns there was a good deal of difficulty, and very grave disputes, and that very often church rates were altogether refused; but that in country parishes his experience was totally different, that with a rate of a  $\frac{1}{2}d.$ ,  $\frac{1}{4}d.$ , or a  $1d.$  in the pound the repairs of the church were satisfactorily effected, and there was no difficulty in obtaining the vote for the rate, or in its collection. Now, the object of the clauses which commence with the 5th clause is to maintain the existing machinery in force where parishes would think it a convenient mode of collecting sums for the repair of churches; but the rate to be levied by means of that machinery will be entirely voluntary. Still, I should suppose there were a great many country parishes in which that machinery is very convenient, where there are few or no Dissenters in the parish, and all the Churchmen are willing to vote for a rate, and where therefore it would be very convenient that things should, as far as possible, be allowed to go on as usual without any disturbance of the existing system. There are further clauses in the Bill the object of which is prevention; and which declare that persons who do not happen to have subscribed to a former voluntary rate shall not be entitled to vote with respect to the levy of that which is about to be collected. Besides these there is a clause empowering owners to take upon themselves the burden of the charge instead of tenants and giving them power to vote accordingly. Such are the general provisions of the Bill, which are exceedingly simple, and which, having been brought in by Mr. Gladstone in the other House, has been received there with almost unanimous support. I trust, therefore, that it will also meet with your Lordships assent.

—(Earl Russell).

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he must confess that he had expected to have heard more reasons adduced in support of the Preamble of the Bill than had been advanced by the noble Earl on the present occasion. He certainly could not have thought that a Bill dealing with a question which had received so much discussion and consideration for the last thirty years, and with regard to which there had been so much diversity of opinion, would have been submitted to the notice of their Lordships' House with so little preface and with so few facts adduced in its support. The noble Earl rested his whole case upon the statements of the Preamble that, in certain parishes, church rates had been discontinued in consequence of opposition, and that in other parishes their collection had given rise to litigation and ill-will. But their Lordships were left without any facts to substantiate those statements. The Preamble was no doubt true to some extent; but only, as shown by the Returns which had at various times been laid before Parliament, to a very limited extent. From these Returns it appeared that the amount received for church rates and applied to church purposes was not now less than it was in former years, taking into account the large sums contributed in several parishes under special local enactments, and by means of voluntary contributions; and certainly the last Return laid before their Lordships, in 1867, showed that, in a large majority of the parishes of England, church rates were still made and collected, and that the amount levied by such process was even then largely in excess of that which the noble Earl opposite and the Government of which he was a member in former times thought was the right sum to charge upon the Consolidated Fund for the maintenance of the churches of this country. If he felt that it was the proper course for Her Majesty's Government to call upon that House to reject the Bill upon the second reading, there would be but little difficulty in showing that the actual facts with regard to church rates and the present position of the question ought rather to induce their Lordships to condemn than to support the Bill. But there were other grounds to be taken into consideration upon this question beyond those set forth in the Preamble of the Bill. The question had been repeatedly brought under the consideration of Parliament, and Members on both sides of the House of Commons had, at various times, endeavoured to bring forward some measure which would be accepted as a satisfactory arrangement of this difficult and troublesome matter. Although those endeavours had failed in producing any measure which had met with general assent, they had no doubt had the effect of sending up to their Lordships' House the Bill now under discussion without any decided or strong opposition in the other House of Parliament; and the measure was not opposed in the House of Commons by the Government upon the second reading, nor after it had passed through Committee was there any division affecting its principle. It therefore came before their Lordships with, no doubt, a strong approval of the principle contained in it from the other House. Moreover, it could not be denied that during the thirty years or so that this question had been under consideration the circumstances with regard to church rates had to a considerable extent changed, and that it could no longer be argued that it was the universal law of the country that the churches were supported or maintained by means of church rates. That state of circumstances had arisen, not alone from the opposition which there had been in many cases to the levying of church rates; but from the fact that the spiritual wants of the population had greatly increased, requiring in many places the erection of new churches and the formation of new parochial districts. These districts had been formed and churches had been built where no compulsory powers existed by which the parishioners could be called upon to contribute to the support of those churches. That had made a material difference in the state of the question from the time when it was first brought prominently under the consideration of Parliament; and the fact that there were a considerable number of the churches in this country for the maintenance of which no compulsory powers existed, and the numerous attempts made in the other House to effect by compromise a settlement of the question, might well justify the Government in not asking the House to reject this Bill on the second reading, but rather to place it in the hands of a Committee, who would consider the various points connected with it.

If the Committee succeeded in making the measure satisfactory, the Government would ask their Lordships to pass the measure when it came back to them, and if the Committee failed in doing so they would then propose its rejection. If additional reasons were wanting for the course he had indicated, they were, he thought, to be found in the Bill itself. It consisted of two principles; but signally failed in providing the machinery for giving proper effect to those principles. The first portion was devoted to the abolition of the present power of levying compulsory rates, coupled with certain saving clauses and qualifications to guard a number of local enactments, in cases where those enactments had provided for charges by what were called church rates. The second portion purported to provide a substitute — which he presumed was the substitute the noble Earl referred to when, on a former occasion, he said he should vote against the total abolition of church rates unless some substitute was provided. The substitute now proposed was the voluntary collection of rates, and the voluntary support of the Church. This was the proposition of the Bill to meet the views of those who had steadily opposed unconditional abolition. In its present shape, however, the Bill fell singularly short of carrying out these objects. Here was a Bill for giving back to the owners and occupiers of land in this country the rates which they now paid for the maintenance of the Church, and which amounted to something over £300,000 a year; and it was proposed to return this amount to persons who had hardly asked for it, and to rest the chance of recovering the loss upon the voluntary contributions of those persons. It was essential, when they were dealing with so large an amount of taxation—which was applied to the maintenance of the fabrics and services of the Church—one-third of which, in round numbers, might be stated to be applied to the maintenance of churches whose decadence the whole nation would deplore—that the machinery and conditions provided as the substitute for compulsory rates should be carefully and well considered. He was not disposed to think that ultimately the funds of the Church would fall greatly short, under a system of voluntary contributions, as compared with a system of compulsory rating; but it was essential to the well-working of such a system as was now proposed that the power of controlling and applying the funds raised should be kept under the public eye; that the whole district for which they were collected should have a right to see to their application; and that full powers to contribute should be given to all those who might wish to do so. Now, as the Bill was framed, although the 5th clause enacted that the parishioners in vestry might agree upon a voluntary rate to be assessed upon the occupiers, the 8th clause appeared to take away that right. By the 5th clause it would appear that it was the parishioners in vestry who were to decide on the question of the rate, which, under a voluntary system, would seem to be the proper mode; but, according to the 8th clause, no person was to have the right to vote upon the question of a voluntary rate, or to be churchwarden or other officer, who had not paid his share of the preceding voluntary rate; so that persons in arrears of rate, or parishioners who had not agreed to the rate, were practically deprived of all power over the application of the funds, the control and management of which would thus come under the control of a few instead of the whole vestry. He thought that, if the voluntary system was to be relied on at all, the full right of all parishioners to vote on any question connected with the church or the election of churchwardens should be retained; and it would, in his opinion, be a great misfortune if, under the voluntary system, the control of the parish church and its maintenance were to fall into the hands of a few wealthy persons connected with the parish. It was also essential that all persons being owners of property in a parish, or representing owners, should have power to contribute to the voluntary rate, but the 10th clause, while it enabled owners to pay instead of occupiers, and to claim the vote, failed altogether to enable trustees of property to contribute, a voluntary church rate not being a legal charge. Property belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for instance, would be unable to contribute, although the property so exempt might form a considerable part of a parish. He could not see, moreover, how the voluntary system could be carried out unless there was power to compel payment from those who had agreed to a rate; for it frequently happened, particularly in the case of small parishes, that the cost of repairing a church was spread over two or three years and over several successive rates. But those repairs under the voluntary system would depend on a rate being made, which there would be no means of compelling even those who were consenting parties at the vestry where the rate was agreed upon to pay. He thought a voluntary rate could not be successfully applied without some system by which those who agreed to the rate should be compelled to carry out their agreement. There was another point to which attention ought to be directed, and that was with regard to the liability of churchwardens and their duties with respect to Church property; and it must be recollected that it is not only the church but the burial grounds which the Bill makes dependent on voluntary contributions. Nor was it at all clearly set forth in this measure as it stood whether where a voluntary rate was refused in the first instance, and, therefore, had never been made, any rate could afterwards be levied. There were many other points which would require very careful consideration before the measure could be placed in such a form that the House ought to be called upon to say whether or not it would accept the voluntary system as a substitute for compulsory rating; and upon those grounds Her Majesty's Government had decided that it was better the Bill should be sent at an early day to a Select Committee, where a full opportunity would be given of completing and amending the measure in the points to which he had referred, and also with regard to the saving clauses and the nature and extent of the legal enactments which would be affected. There was one other point well deserving of consideration, and that was as to the means by which the incumbent and churchwardens or other persons might be incorporated as trustees to receive and apply funds given for repairing the church. There was no provision as yet in the Bill for that purpose; and there existed practically no mode by which funds not voted, but intended to be applied to repairs of the church, could be applied, except at the trouble of appointing separate trustees. He held that it must be a necessary complement of the Bill to establish some corporation, such as the incumbent and churchwardens, for the purpose of applying such grants. Believing that it would tend rather to facilitate than delay or obstruct a fair and reasonable settlement of this question to allow the measure to pass its present stage and to refer it to a Select Committee, he was not disposed to oppose the Motion for the second reading. The measure could be fully and satisfactorily discussed upon its return from the Select Committee, or upon the third reading. There was one thing which ought to be carefully guarded, and that was the maintenance of the Church of England as the Church of the many and not of the few. In any measure which established the voluntary system care should be taken to keep the control of the Church and the maintenance of its fabrics in the hands of the great body of the parishoners; so that the affairs of the Church might not be regulated by a few wealthy persons—by an autocracy sitting in close committee, where no one could vote except those who agreed to pay; but that the Church should still continue the Church of the parish in which all, even many who now objected to a rate or even to the precise form of worship that was carried on, might yet feel an interest, and take pride in supporting it and maintaining the fabric. It appeared to him that under this Bill, unless some material modifications were made in its provisions, there would be great danger that the Church would become the Church of the rich and not of the poor. Believing that the day when that occurred would be an evil day for the Church of England, and that any misfortune which happened to it, anything which should make it the Church of a sect rather than of the nation, would be a great source of ill not only to the Church but to the Empire, he wished to see the Bill modified in some important points. In announcing the views of Her Majesty's Government when declining to object to the second reading of the Bill with the intention of referring it to a Select Committee, he distinctly reserved the right of opposing it if he should think fit on the Report, and also on the third reading.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he rose at this early period of the debate, because their Lordships might be anxious to know the sentiments of the right rev. Bench on the measure before the House. He had another reason for rising—because he had been intrusted with a very important petition on the subject of one clause of the Bill, which he would explain in a few words hereafter. He had certainly no intention of opposing the second reading of the Bill. He was a member of a Select Committee of their Lordships' House eight years ago, which carefully went into the whole question of church rates and examined a great number of witnesses. On that Committee there were men who were likely to be able to form a correct judgment on the matter—the noble Earl the late head of Her Majesty's Government (the Earl of Derby) was one, the late Archbishop of Canterbury was another, and the noble Duke the President of the Council (the Duke of Marlborough), who had taken great interest in such matters, and had himself been the author of legislation regulating the condition of the Established Church. The result of the deliberations of that Select Committee was the recommendation of a system, which he believed in its essential features was embodied in the Bill of the noble Earl (Earl Russell). He very much regretted that the Report of the Select Committee to which he referred was not embodied by the noble Duke in some legislative measure at the time when it was presented to the House; for he thought the question might just as easily have been settled eight years ago as now. Since that time he had never been deceived by the apparent majorities in the other House of Parliament, which had led some people to suppose that the happy days were returning when church rates might be forced on unwilling parishes. He hoped, however, the noble Earl (Earl Russell) would forgive him if he ventured to say that it was not unlikely that some greater difficulty than might otherwise have been anticipated would be found in inducing the clergy of the Church of England to see the expediency of this measure at the present moment. They who represented the clergy more or less in that House were bound to consider their feelings on all such questions, and not their feelings only, but the feelings of the vast body who were attached to the principles of the Church of England. Now, he could not conceal from himself that the occurrences of the last six weeks had made the clergy somewhat jealous of anything which in any way affected the Established Church, and when they heard from the noble Duke who had last addressed their Lordships (the Duke of Buckingham) that this Bill dealt with the yearly amount of £300,000 of property now devoted to Church purposes, it would require, he thought, a very full statement of the merits and great calmness of discussion to restore confidence to the clergy of this country and to persuade them that there was not more in this Bill than the noble Earl stated. The noble Earl naturally took for granted that the Bill would be accepted at once, and especially on the ground, which he considered a strong one, of the names which appeared on the back of the Bill as its authors in the other House of Parliament. Now, it might be doubted whether this would recommend it to the clergy of the Church now in the same way in which it would have done some six weeks ago. He might also question whether there was not a double paternity in this Bill. They had heard from a great authority, of danger threatening the Church and State from a coalition. He expressed no opinion as to the reality of the existence of such a coalition; but they could not be blind to the fact that there were certain members of the Church of England—visionary theorists they might be called—who were in favour rather of a so-called free than of an Established Church. Those few visionaries if left to themselves would not have any great influence in the Established Church; but they were united in their view with a very compact body of opponents from without, and this Bill, in the general principle of which he acquiesced, had certainly the misfortune to have in it a clause which he thought had its origin in the Liberation Society. Now, with regard to that clause—the 2nd clause of this Bill—if their Lordships would take the trouble to read it they would find it rather difficult to comprehend its meaning. He happened to know a little about it, but only a little. The petition, however, which he held in his hand would explain it. The petition complained of the 2nd clause, which dealt with local Acts—a very serious matter to include in a general Bill—Acts which nobody had seen, which nobody had taken the trouble to read, which nobody knew except the vestries connected with them; and if they were suddenly to pass this measure, and say that all local Acts respecting church rates were from this time forward repealed, it certainly would be desirable to inform themselves as to what were the meaning and contents of those local Acts. It did, therefore, appear to him that the wise course to take with reference to a matter so complicated as this must be that suggested by the noble Duke of referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He thought the clergy of the country would be better satisfied if the matter were thus dealt with calmly and patiently, after full and due examination by their Lordships; for his opinion was, that, at this moment, there was a very uneasy feeling in the minds of the clergy on this and similar matters. Many persons supposed that because there had been no utterance on the part of the clergy nothing was felt: but deep feelings were dumb; and their Lordships might be persuaded of this—that there was at this moment a very anxious feeling on the part of the clergy of the Church of England with regard to this question and to measures which might be in contemplation, and which might affect the very existence of the Establishment to which they belonged. He should deceive their Lordships if he led them for a moment to suppose that this feeling would not be very dangerous unless proper measures were taken to meet the natural desire of the clergy that matters which so concerned their interests should be very carefully and dispassionately considered. It had been the glory of the Church of England, during the time he had been one of its ministers, to have nothing to do with party politics. They had 20,000 educated men, clergymen of the Established Church, each of them the centre of a great sphere of influence, and yet these persons had hitherto, as a rule, abstained from mixing themselves up in matters of party politics; but if the suspicion were once to enter their minds that there was any danger of that great institution to which they belonged being tampered with for any party purpose, he could not doubt they would soon see a great change on the part of the clergy in this matter. The heads of the Church would have great difficulty in restraining those who at present, he was thankful to say, used their pulpits and influence for the sacred purposes alone to which they ought to be devoted, if any rash step were taken that might endanger the institution which they rightly believed to have been, for many hundred years, the nurse of ecclesiastical and liberal learning, the defence against Papal aggression and the revival of mediæval tyranny, and the real educator of the people of this country. The clergy looked with great anxiety and considerable jealousy on any measures which might in any way whatsoever tend to alter the position of the Church of which they were the ministers. Hence, therefore, the duty of the right rev. Bench to be able to satisfy the clergy at such a time that this Bill—to which he gave his general assent—contained nothing inimical to the interests of the Established Church. The 2nd clause of this Bill—to which he had already alluded—dealt with property secured by local Acts of Parliament. The petition which he held in his hand, which was signed by the Rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, stated that the late Bishop of London, when rector of that parish, had procured a Private Act to be passed, by which church rates were totally abolished in that parish, the rector taking on himself and his successors the payment for the maintenance of the church and its services out of the tithes of the parish. But this Bill, by the 2nd clause, would sweep away all such private Acts. He held in his hand another petition to the same effect from St. Paul's, Covent Garden. He therefore thought that great care required to be taken so that the property of the Church might not be confiscated under the name of the abolition of compulsory church rates. Having made these statements for the purpose of shewing the difficulties which would have to be considered in legislating on this subject, he repeated that he desired to support the general principle of the Bill. He believed that they had already lost all that they could lose of church rates. There were country parishes in which church rates were regularly paid; but still he was afraid that disaffection was even there gradually creeping in. ["No!"] He trusted it was not so; but in the towns church rates were not as a rule collected; and, upon the whole, he could not help thinking that as regarded the town parishes the Church would gain more than she would lose under this measure. He did not think it was unimportant to surrender even that nominal right, but it was a matter of expediency; and it seemed to him that, if there were even the shadow of a grievance in this case, it were better to have done with it and to accept the compromise which was now proposed. He had spoken of the Church as an Establishment, and it was as an Establishment that it was dealt with by this Bill; but it was not as an Establishment only that its members were attached to that great institution. They believed that the Establishment conferred great blessings upon the country; but they also believed that they had the happiness of having in their Establishment a real, true, and pure branch of the Apostolic Church of Christ, purged of its errors at the Reformation; that it had been enabled to perform spiritual functions for the good of the people; and that, if disestablished, it would continue still to perform them, but that in its present connec-

ion with the State it held a position such as no other Church in the world held for encouraging and guiding the feelings of the people, and at the same time giving full scope to that spirit of free inquiry which was the characteristic of this age.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that after the declaration made on the part of the Government that it was not their intention to oppose the second reading of the Bill, it would be vain for anyone to suppose that that Motion could be defeated, and he did not himself intend, therefore, to offer any opposition to the proposal. But he rose for the purpose of satisfying his own conscience, by stating the reasons why he could not accept the principle of the Bill. He saw no essential difference between the present Bill and all former Bills for total abolition of church rates. It appeared to him, also, that the measure involved a great many difficulties and complications, through which he could not see his way, and which he believed would simply end in the adoption of the voluntary principle. Government, by majorities, was one of the great principles of our Constitution, and he could not see why it should be abrogated in the case of church rates. Many of the town parishes had rejected the rate; but it was still levied in the vast majority of the country parishes; and he did not see why those parishes should be deprived of the right which they had enjoyed for centuries — of making rates for maintaining the fabric of their churches. This Bill would give to landlords that which had never been theirs, and it would take away from the poor the privilege which they had for centuries enjoyed — of having the repairs and the services of the Church defrayed by the landowners. In behalf of the clergy, as well as the poor, he deprecated the adoption of such a measure. Their Lordships were well aware of the great sacrifices which the clergy had made for the promotion of education. They were overburdened already; and he feared that, if the ancient means for maintaining the fabric of the church were withdrawn, the burden of maintaining that fabric would fall upon the clergy. So many public men had given utterance to contradictory opinions on this question, that he thought the time for quoting Hansard was gone by; but the arguments formerly used in that House and elsewhere in favour of the maintenance of church rates still prevailed with him; and he could not see why, in such a case as this, they should yield to agitation that which they had declined to concede to reason and to argument. It appeared to him that the principle of religious equality laid at the bottom of the question. But let them consider the consequences of adopting the principle of religious equality. It would lead to the disestablishment of the Church, and to a severance of the connection between the Church and the State. For these reasons he entertained a strong objection to the principle of the Bill. It might be slightly amended in Committee; but as he did not anticipate that any material remedy could be applied to the evils he anticipated from the measure, he had thought it his duty to express his disapproval of its principle, although he would not move that it be read a second time upon that day six months.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I will not upon this occasion trespass at any length on the time of your Lordships but, with the opinions which I have long entertained upon this subject, I feel it is impossible for me to remain absolutely silent throughout this discussion. I cannot help expressing the very great regret which I feel that the House of Commons should, apparently from sheer weariness upon this subject, have acquiesced in this Bill; but I confess that the large majorities by which the Bill has been passed in the other House is a ground—a sufficient ground, although the only one—to justify the Government in not opposing the present Motion. Another ground put forward in defence of the measure is, that it is a compromise by which a question which has been long agitated, and which has provoked much animosity in many parts of the country, will be at last finally settled; and then it is further said that it is a compromise proposed by one who has always proved himself to be a staunch and firm supporter of the Church Establishment. Now, with regard to the latter of these two arguments, I must confess, as was confessed by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London), that a short time ago I should have attached more importance to it than I do at present. I must say that I do not derive any satisfaction, or any inducement, to vote in favour of the Bill from the character of its author—or of its supposed author—in consequence of the line of conduct which he has recently adopted upon Church questions. It is said the Bill is a compromise;

but I say it is no compromise, but is an absolute and entire surrender on the part of the Established Church of the whole principle that has hitherto guided our legislation in reference to that Church. Let me just remind your Lordships of the position which the Church of England occupies towards the State. It will not be denied that there exists an obligation—a legal obligation—on the part of each parish to maintain the fabric and to defray the expense of the services of the Church. This is a right—a legal right—but a right which the Courts of Law will not enforce, because it can be enforced in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Churchwardens thus found that the law imposed upon them the duty of maintaining the fabric and the services of the Church, and they sought the judgment of the Courts for the purpose of learning whether they could impose a rate—even although a minority only of the parishioners voted in its favour. The case was brought before the Courts of Law, and ultimately it was decided by your Lordships' House against the churchwardens; and, from that period to the present, there has been no means of levying a rate unless it has received the support of the majority of the parishioners. But we are told that a voluntary rate may be levied under this Bill. That, however, can only mean a rate which any one who pleases may refuse to pay; and, while they claim all the benefits of churchmanship, may, at the same time, refuse to contribute anything towards the maintenance of the church fabric. You impose rates for a variety of objects—for public libraries, for museums, even for baths and wash-houses; and no one can decline to pay his proportion of those rates because he does not visit the museum, or because he does not study in a public library, or because he does not choose to make use of a bath or of a wash-house. The majority of the parishioners in all these cases has a right to make a rate, and the minority is bound to accept that decision. And why, I would like to know, should the Church of England be placed in a worse position than such institutions as museums, or public libraries, or baths and wash-houses? Why, if no such plea is allowed in those cases, should any dissentient person be allowed to withdraw himself from his share of a burden which has been imposed for a great Imperial purpose. A voluntary rate! What does a voluntary rate mean? It is said that in many places there is no difficulty in raising a voluntary rate; and that by that means churches are supported in several of our most populous towns, in which church rates have been long done away. But how are they supported? They are supported mainly through that least desirable—to say the least of it—system of letting out pews. The consequence of that system is, that that which was intended for the benefit of all, and more especially of the poor, is limited to the rich, who can afford to pay their contributions; and the church fabric is maintained, but maintained only for those who individually bear the burden. My noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) who assented—I believe most unwillingly—to the Motion for the second reading of this Bill, said that there are many new districts in which no church rate is levied, and in which the churches are nevertheless kept in repair. But in the formation of a new district the first step taken after the endowment is to provide a repair fund for the maintenance of the fabric; and that is a permanent fund, not liable to be dealt with according to the caprice of any individual. For my own part, I cannot help seeing that the argument on which the Bill rests is the argument of expediency, and the argument of a false expediency, in violation of a true principle. It is one of the steps—and a large one—by which the Legislature of this country is, I am afraid, rapidly advancing in the direction of placing the Established Church on a level with all other religious sects and denominations in the State. That is the object which is avowed—not by noble Lords opposite—not by those Members of your Lordships' House who support the second reading of this Bill—but by those persons behind the scenes who are working for the overthrow of all ecclesiastical Establishments, and for the universal adoption of the voluntary principle. Whatever alteration you may make in the Bill in Committee, you cannot, I believe, get rid of this its fundamental vice—that it is an abandonment, without any compensation, of the great principle that the Church of England is the Established Church of the country. That is a principle which this country has always regarded as a vital one for its existence and its Constitution. I do not go so far as the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) went a few years ago, when he said, "If you do away with church rates you do away with the Church, and if you do away with the Church you do away with the Throne ;” but I say that by the adoption of this measure you will be unwittingly forwarding the objects of those who are opposed to all Establishments and all endowments for religious purposes, and you will be taking a large step towards what I consider a serious evil—namely, the equalization of all sects in this country, and the abolition of any distinction between the Established Church and all other denominations of Christians. At the same time I think that, considering the large majority who supported the Bill in the House of Commons, Her Majesty’s Government are justified in assenting to the Motion for its second reading; and, for my part, I am not disposed to interfere with the apparent unanimity which seems to exist in this House in favour of the Motion; but I must so far enter my protest against the measure as to express my belief that no alterations that can be made in the Bill in Committee will do away with the serious objections to its details, and that even if they did the vice of its principle would remain. It would continue to be of a vital and fundamental character.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that his noble Friend who had just addressed the House had admitted that his objection to the Bill was fundamental and unalterable. That, no doubt, was a position which their Lordships had to decide upon, and to determine whether they were to adopt the principle of “No Surrender” or would accept a compromise; and they would have to consider what interest the Church of England had in maintaining the existing state of things, or how far they would be benefited by the compromise. For his own part, he must frankly say that he differed in some respects from some of his noble Friends in estimating somewhat lower than they did the interest which the Church of England had in maintaining things in their present position. He saw that in many parishes throughout the country church rates were absolutely abolished; while in many others they were collected only after a process of vexatious litigation. He saw further that the amount realized was not very large, and that the existing state of the law often brought clergymen into collision with their parishioners upon that most odious of all questions, the question of money. Besides, after the decision in the Braintree case, the principle that the sustentation of the fabric of the church was a direct liability which might legally be enforced on a parish had clearly broken down. Under those circumstances, however cloudy the horizon might appear to be, believing that the Church of England had a greater work before her even than she had yet achieved, he was desirous to set her free as far as possible for the performance of that work, and he was willing to sacrifice what he looked upon as a comparatively small advantage to secure that great gain. For several years a succession of Bills had been brought before Parliament on the subject of church rates. Those Bills might be reduced to two classes—the one providing for the total and absolute abolition of the rate, the other, under the semblance of compromise, seeking, in reality, to maintain the existing state of things. Now, at the eleventh hour of the controversy, however, a measure of a different character was submitted to the notice of Parliament, which—although he should have been glad to see it different from what it was in many of its details—he must say he regarded as being drawn up in a tolerant and fair spirit of compromise. It differed, he thought, notwithstanding what had fallen from his noble Friend who had last spoken, in two or three important respects from a measure of total abolition. In the first place it had in its favour the great recommendation that it retained the churchwardens and vestry, and, indeed, the whole of the existing machinery—although, of course, in some parishes in which the levying of church rates was successfully opposed, that machinery with the charge itself would altogether disappear. There was one provision of the Bill which he deemed of the greatest value—namely, that those only who paid the rate should vote, and that those only who contributed to it should have a voice in its appropriation. He could not understand how the noble Duke (the Duke of Buckingham) could object to what was really the compensating and remedial clause for much to which he should otherwise object. It was, in fact, the essence of the compromise. Apart from these advantages possessed by the Bill their Lordships ought to consider whether there was any likelihood of more favourable terms. After the explanation that had been given of the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee he could not but regard it as an intention to shelve or destroy it; and the question for those who desired to retain as much as possible of the existing systems and to abandon as little as possible of the rights and interests of the Church was whether, by rejecting the Bill or by referring it to a Select Committee, which was tantamount to its rejection, they were likely to obtain a more satisfactory settlement. Now, neither the Government nor a single Member of the House had ventured to express a belief that better terms might be expected—and indeed it was obvious they were not. It was, therefore, now in the power of the House and the Government, by accepting the second reading of the Bill and referring it in the usual course to a Committee of the Whole House, to close this long standing controversy without any great sacrifice of the dignity, the honour, or even the material interests of the Church. If, on the other hand, they rejected the Bill by sending it to a Select Committee, they might perhaps prolong the controversy—protracting it, perhaps, till next Session, but he ventured to think not much later—they would have before them an alternative which they had more than once pledged themselves to reject—namely, absolute and entire abolition.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, he did not regard the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee as an attempt to throw it out or shelve it, and he might say he did not intend to give any vote which would embarrass or impede the progress of the Bill. It could not be expected that he should feel any enthusiastic approval of the measure; but he believed the time had come when it was necessary that the irritation and ill-feeling attending this controversy should be done away with. He should therefore vote in favour of the second reading, and should do nothing to impede the further progress of the measure. All compromises must consist of two parts; but while the first part of the Bill conceded for ever the right of compelling payment of church rates, he could not, after a most microscopic examination, find that the second portion offered any compensation. The measure altogether overlooked the state of things existing in the large towns; where church rates were already compensated by public subscriptions, the necessary expenses of the Church were raised without any application to a vestry at all. But the Bill proposed a kind of vestry, which in the first instance would consist, as it ought to do, of every ratepayer, but which would dwindle away by the exclusion of those who could not and those who would not pay into a sort of select committee, partly official, the status of which it would be impossible to ascertain. That body would levy, with an appearance of authority, a rate which they would have no power to enforce. It was surely much better to leave alone the cases in which public subscriptions had been substituted than to attempt to set up this miserable sham of a vestry; an attempt which he very much deprecated was made in the 6th clause to mix up the voluntary contribution or subscription system with the rating system. Why should voluntary contributions go through a vestry at all? The advantage of a vestry and of the rating system that at present existed was that an estimate was framed and such a rate levied as upon a known assessment would raise the requisite amount; the calculation of ways and means being accurately adjusted to the estimated expense. But he had received a letter from an archdeacon in the Northern province informing him that at a meeting of clergy and churchwardens, convened to consider a former Bill proposing a voluntary rate, a very intelligent farmer stated that in three years the farmers would universally cease payment; only one gentleman present dissenting from that opinion. Now, he would not say that such would be the case universally; but it was the impression of intelligent men as to a particular district. He could not conceive the use of agreeing to a rate of 1*d.* or 2*d.* in the pound, if the number of those who paid gradually diminished, and if in three years nobody at all would pay. Nor would the other advantage of a vestry, that the whole parish controlled the expenditure, be secured. It was already gone under the subscription system; and under this Bill every one who neglected to pay would be ousted from the vestry. What, then, would become of the vestry? It would have no power of compulsion, and therefore could not make a rate; it would be no popular assembly of the whole ratepayers, and would therefore not be a vestry. A former Bill proposed that anybody who did not pay should not have the right of being assigned a seat in church. Now, so far from regarding such restrictions as a compensation, he looked upon them as the greatest possible evil which could befall a national Church. Much had been said in another place of the compound-householder, and of a large class of the population who did not pay a rate, however small, for the simple reason that they could not. Now to shut out such a class from the vestry because, forsooth, they had not paid a church rate might have a semblance of fairness, but just as he should object to taking away their right to come and worship, so he objected to putting them under this other disability. It had hitherto been the glory of the Church of England, though with great shortcomings, that it had endeavoured to seek out the poor of Christ's flock, and to show that the Church of a parish belonged as much to the poor as to the rich. Voe to the Church if that glory should ever be taken away; but there lurked in some of the clauses of the Bill a principle which if applied would gradually turn the poor man's Church into the Church of the rich, and the consequences which had been represented would then too surely follow. The position of the Church of England would be taken away, because she would have ceased to be the Church of the nation, taking care of God's poor in every part of the nation, and would have become the Church of a clique or sect—a result which the clergy would deeply deplore.

LORD COLCHESTER, who requested their Lordships' indulgence as a young member of the House, said, he did not think it desirable that a question like this should be brought forward in the last year of the existence of an expiring Parliament; nor if the occasion had been suitable did he think the measure before the House a satisfactory compromise, or that it was framed on a satisfactory basis. Many wars had been undertaken by this country which were against the feelings of a majority of the people, and many other things were paid for out of public taxes to which many persons might be entirely opposed. It was not sufficient, therefore, to say that there were many in the country who were conscientiously opposed to the payment of church rates. It might be desirable that there should be some compromise, and that persons who conscientiously dissented from the Church should not be called upon to pay; but that was very different from what was proposed in the measure now before the House, which left payment entirely to individual caprice. They had heard much as to the cry of "No surrender," and something also of the wisdom of yielding in time. But he would remind their Lordships that though, in the history of wars, they had often read of a general who surrendered a fortress that might not fall in ruins, they had never heard of any who had allowed his walls to be dismantled in order that from those dismantled walls he might fire an unlimited quantity of blank cartridge. Then it was said that the new constituencies would be composed of those classes which were most under the influence of the Liberatorian Society. But he begged to remind those who raised this panic-stricken cry that where church rates existed they were imposed by the majority of the parishioners; whereas now an attempt was made to control the course of action of those who only used their liberty to maintain the rates. Why were they to suppose that in a national Parliament there would not be a stronger feeling in behalf of the national Church? The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had told them that they could not hope to get better terms than were offered by this measure; but several noble Lords had shown that they could not have much worse. He trusted they would not attempt to settle this question now without giving the new Parliament an opportunity of expressing their views upon it, and that the House would not deceive themselves and the country by agreeing to an absolute surrender under the veil of what he considered a one-sided and valueless compromise.

EARL GREY said, he concurred in the second reading with the purpose of referring the Bill to a Select Committee, very much for the reasons which had been stated by the noble Duke who spoke on behalf of Her Majesty's Government (the Duke of Marlborough)—that it was not expedient that the measure should be rejected without, at least, undergoing a very careful consideration. But he could not help declaring with respect to the general policy of the measure that the abolition of church rates would be contrary both to expediency and to justice. In his opinion, the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had greatly over-estimated the importance of the movement. That noble Earl said that church rates were already gone in a great number of parishes, and that it was only in certain places they could be maintained. Now, in a wealthy town there would be no difficulty in obtaining the money required for the maintenance of the fabric of the church; but in the rural districts the case was very different. To his surprise, his noble Friend who had recommended to their Lordships the adoption of the Bill (Earl Russell) had employed an argument which would tell against the simple abolition of the rates, because he said that, practically, in the great majority of country parishes the system of church rates at this moment worked quite successfully—the rates were levied, people took a pride in supporting the fabric of their church, and no man would run counter to the feeling of his fellow-parishioners by resisting the payment of the rate. But what would happen under this Bill? They were told that, where there was a general consent, things would go on just as before. It would be no such thing. It was a very different thing to say that, where the majority of the parish was in favour of the rate it might be levied, and to leave the law in such a state that one individual—perhaps some publican who was angry with the clergyman of the parish for discouraging tipping—by refusing to pay his share, might dispose other people also not to pay theirs; and thus the whole system would be practically broken down. He thought that those clauses which had been inserted in the Bill as compensating clauses were an absurdity and an aggravation of the wrong which the Bill itself committed. The tendency of those clauses was to take the control of the parish churches out of the hands of the body of the parishioners and put it into the hands of a few wealthy persons. The operation of this Bill, if it passed, would in a few years place the parish churches under the control of a party having extreme opinions on one side or another. If the Bill were to be passed at all, it would be much improved, he thought, by striking out those clauses altogether. He approved sending the Bill to a Select Committee. The Bill was not recommended by his noble Friend (Earl Russell) as a compromise, but as a measure which simply gave up the whole point of dispute, and as effecting a practical settlement of the question. He (Earl Grey) thought the right compromise to have been made on this subject was, taking the state of things as they found it, to endeavour to preserve what was admittedly useful and good, to enable the majority of the parishioners to apply a certain sum of money for Church purposes out of the general rate levied for relief of the poor. He should himself submit Amendments to that effect. He was quite aware that the adoption of such Amendments would lead to the rejection of the Bill in “another place;” but it was perfectly consistent with Parliamentary usage and practice that a new Bill embodying the principle for which he contended should be introduced; and it was most fit that their Lordships should distinctly bring before the other House the propriety of making some alteration of this kind, because they would be maintaining what he thought the right of the poor man to have his church kept up for him. He looked upon the Bill in its present shape as a measure simply for robbing the poor for the benefit of the rich. It was said to be unjust to Dissenters to compel them to pay church rates, because they derived no benefit from the Church. But that argument rested upon a total misconception of the principle on which church rates proceeded. We did not ourselves pay church rates simply because we derived advantage from the services of the Church, but because, from the earliest times, the obligation was binding on the owners and occupiers of property to maintain the church for the benefit of their poorer neighbours in each parish. The poor had a right to have the church kept up for them at the expense of those who held property in the parish. Of that right this Bill would deprive them; and he, for one, could not be a party to an arrangement of that kind. He acquiesced, however, in the second reading, in the hope of engrafting upon it in Committee the principle to which he had referred.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he desired to state in a very few words why he acquiesced as the noble Earl, who had just sat down, acquiesced, in the second reading of this Bill—in one word, he acquiesced on the ground stated by the noble Earl late at the head of Her Majesty's Government. He believed church rates to be just and to be a proper provision for the poor members of the Church of England; he regarded them as a charge on property, either inherited or obtained by purchase. Whether, therefore, that property was held by members of the Church of England or not it was no injustice whatever that that property should pay church rates. He had always held that doctrine, and he saw no reason whatever to doubt the justice of the principle. But the question now came to them under wholly different circumstances. It came with what they could not mistake to be the decision in “another place” of the representatives of the people of this country that they would not continue the system of church rates. He, for one, could not justify such a decision for a moment. On the contrary, he believed that it was a great misfortune to his country if the mind of the people under any circumstances had drifted into the position that it would be for the benefit of the religion of the poor if church rates ceased to be a charge upon property. But it seemed to him, when it was once thoroughly ascertained to be the mind of the people of this country that the change should take place, and when their Lordships had exhausted the power of sending back this question to the other House to be debated again and again, so as to ascertain what it was really the mind of the people, that the time had gone by for that House to continue its refusal. He went further and said that he could not refuse his assent to the second reading of this measure, however much be objected to it. Then the question arose, was this Bill any better than a simple abandonment of the principle of church rates? He believed it to be a great deal better. It seemed to him that the Bill promised to relieve them from the evils of a mere voluntary arrangement. The great advantage of the Bill was that it said that those who in future took the common management of Church affairs in each parish should pay a fair share of the common expense—that they must either pay that or give up their places amongst the maintainers of the Church. By that provision they got rid of the temptation under which selfishness would act of the single mean man pulling down the common subscriptions of all around him. Another great advantage was that the Bill kept alive the parochial machinery of the country for collecting and managing the church funds. It had been said that this would throw our parochial system into new hands; but it must be remembered that even now the vestry had nothing to do with church rates. The management of our churches was not by law in the hands of the vestry, but in those of the ordinary. The power of the vestry only extended to a refusal to pay in advance for anything they disapproved of. This Bill did not destroy the parochial vestry, but it confined the administration of the funds to those who gave those funds. The question to be decided was whether their Lordships would wait to see church rates abolished altogether, or whether they would accept some such provision as was offered in the present Bill? There were two provisions which he should wish to be introduced into the Bill. One was a provision to constitute the churchwardens and clergyman of each parish a corporation for receiving gifts for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners would not act so well for that purpose; for many persons who would be willing to give £100 for the maintenance of their parish church would not be ready to give their money unless they knew that it was invested in the hands of trustees connected with the parish, and whom they knew; the other was a provision, just and equitable, and he might almost say essential, before the principle of the Bill was carried out—namely, to give to the owners, and even life-owners of property the power of charging their estates with a sum equal to that which those estates now paid towards the maintenance of the fabric of the church, the Mortmain Act and other rights of property notwithstanding. He thought that, with these additions, the present measure would be anything but a real surrender; and if the parochial clergy were to take the matter kindly in hand and explain that the intention of the Legislature was not to do away with church rates, but to provide another mode of obtaining them, he believed that in a great many of our towns where the church rates were now lost they might be recovered under the action of this Bill. He was prepared to agree to the second reading of the Bill, with a distinct understanding that, as proposed by the Government, it should then be referred to a Select Committee, not to defeat the Bill, but to perfect it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if it were necessary at that stage of the measure to decide absolutely whether this Bill should be accepted as it stood or rejected, he owned that he should have great difficulty in giving his assent to it. In coming to that decision, he should not be at all appalled by the alternative proposed that evening—namely, that if the Bill were not accepted there was no other choice but the unconditional abolition of church rates; because, speaking for himself, he owned that if the choice were presented to him, to concur in this measure as it stood or to submit to unconditional abolition, much as he would deplore such a result, he should be willing to accept the latter alternative rather than assent to the clauses of the Bill as he understood them. But it appeared to him that there were good reasons why their Lordships should take the course suggested by the Government of referring the Bill to a Select Committee after passing its present stage. One of those reasons, no doubt, was founded upon the degree of assent which the Bill received in the other House of Parliament, not merely from one side or one party, but from Members on both sides of the House. Another reason was, that this was not the first Bill on the subject introduced into the House of Commons; but that, in previous years, measures had been offered by Members on different sides of the House which more or less proceeded in the direction of the enactments proposed by the present Bill. Another reason why he desired to see the Bill referred to a Select Committee was the very great difficulty he laboured under of understanding the effect and operation of the clauses as they were now worded. He regretted that the noble Earl who had moved the second reading (Earl Russell) had offered no explanation of what appeared to be the grave difficulties of the measure as it stood. He would not delay their Lordships by referring to that which was so well treated of by the right rev. Prelate who spoke first (the Bishop of London)—he meant the 2nd clause. It was a clause thirty lines in length, without breathing space from beginning to end, and before one had read it half through the mind was lost in utter bewilderment as to what possibly could be meant by it. They could only deal safely with local Acts of Parliament which provided for the exigencies of particular places by excepting those Acts altogether from the operation of the general measure, or by taking them up one by one, and making the alterations they intended. The cases that had been mentioned might easily be multiplied, and their Lordships might depend that every one of those Acts had been passed by way of bargain and arrangement; and if, by a general measure, Parliament opened up the arrangements that had been made, it could not fail to inflict grievous and gross injustice upon places which those local Acts at present regulated. He quite agreed with the noble Earl on the cross Benches (Earl Grey) that their Lordships could make no greater mistake than to suppose that, because at the present time, when a church rate once made was leviable under the law of the land, in the great majority of country parishes church rates were levied and paid, that therefore when the compulsion was taken away the rates would continue to be paid as they were at present. It stood to reason that it made all the difference in the world, when a rate had been made and the parishioners knew that payment could be compelled, whether the power to enforce payment were continued or taken away. But, passing from that, he wanted to know the meaning of the 5th section. As far as he could understand it, he did not believe it would have any operation at all. If he read correctly, the 5th clause did propose to act upon the old and well-known machinery and conditions, but gave new statutory authority to whom the voluntary rate was to be payable, and to whom was it to be paid? Power was given to the parishioners in vestry assembled to agree upon a voluntary rate. The necessary consequence was that there must be unanimity—a single dissentient voice would destroy the whole operation of the clause. The most he could say for the clause was that he believed it never could work. He apprehended the noble Earl would say that his understanding was that there was to be a majority and a minority; and if the majority carried the rate, their decision would operate upon those who concurred with that majority. But if that were the meaning, the clause was nothing but a device to take the fabric of the church and the management of the parish out of the hands of the parishioners. In that case the noble Earl on the cross Benches was perfectly right, and they might depend upon it that in the course of a very few years, under the operation of this clause, coupled with the 8th, a few monied men in the parish would remain masters of the situation, and would have the whole control of the church and everything connected with it. The right rev. Prelate who spoke last (the Bishop of Oxford) had said theoretically, with perfect accuracy, that the control was in the hands of the Ordinary; but they all knew how very different the state of things was practically. The control of the church rested with the incumbent and with those who had got the funds which were to be laid out upon the church. What might occur in any parish was that a few men with long purses, extremely anxious to carry out their own views, either æsthetical or ecclesiastical, would continually and vigilantly subscribe and pay the rates, and if the incumbent concurred with them they would become masters of the church, with such a margin of power as would enable them practically to operate upon it in any way they might think fit. Thus a small monied hierarchy would become members of the church of the parish, and would render what should be a glory and a blessing to the whole parish an object of antagonism and dislike. The 6th clause offered facilities for proceedings at law for the recovery of the voluntary contributions; but he must say that nothing could be more fatal to the principle of voluntarism than by bolstering it up with such a provision. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) considered that one advantage of the Bill was that it would keep the ordinary and recognized machinery of the parish in operation. But was that so? What happened under the 7th clause? The proper persons to undertake the ordinary management of the parish church would be the churchwardens; but if the churchwarden happened to be, as he frequently might be, a non-contributor to the rate, the contributors were to appoint a treasurer of their own, and the churchwarden was to be out of office for the purposes of receiving and applying the funds. How, then, were they to be applied? What right would the treasurer of these voluntary contributions have to approach the parish church, and oust the churchwarden in the application of the money to the fabric? They would have churchwardens deprived of their jurisdiction to receive and apply the funds, and a treasurer without the power of approaching the parish church to spend the money upon it; and he wanted to know what, under these circumstances, was to become of the money? By the 8th clause it was provided that no one was to vote who had not paid the previous rate. How was it to be determined on the first occasion who was entitled to vote? But suppose they got over the difficulty on the first occasion, and a rate was made by the select body entitled to vote, it appeared that the next year the same persons, and those only, would be entitled. Suppose a new contributor wanted to come in he could not do so; because he would not have qualified himself by payment of the rate of the previous year. Thus the body of contributors would be limited to the first contributors, and might dwindle away. He did not say that clauses could not be devised which would go far to render a Bill of this kind more palatable; but certainly their Lordships ought to see that the clause presented for their consideration was such as would have a tangible and clear operation. He quite concurred with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), that a most excellent provision, whether this Bill passed or not, would be to constitute a sort of special corporation—whether it were the incumbent of the parish and the churchwardens, or some other persons—to be the recipients of voluntary contributions for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. But the other proposition of the right reverend Prelate would be attended with very great danger. The proposition was that the owner of land should be authorized to charge his land with a rent-charge to the amount of the church rate, notwithstanding the Mortmain Act. What would be the consequence of that? When land was so charged matters would go on smoothly enough so long as the owner was a member of the Church of England; but if it came into the hands of a Nonconformist, the rent-charge to him would be the old church rate to him, and he would complain as much as ever. He trusted their Lordships would allow the second reading to pass, that the Bill might go to a Select Committee—not with the view of shelving it, but to see whether the arrangements it proposed could not be presented to their Lordships in a more acceptable form, and their Lordships could say on the third reading whether the Bill as amended ought or ought not to receive their assent.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that at any rate this discussion showed that their Lordships were about to read a second time a Bill from which they entirely dissented. From the beginning to the end of the debate there had not been expressed the slightest approval of the Bill. It would go to a Select Committee, and it would come out a Bill for introducing the voluntary principle in regard to the support of the church buildings. It was the thin end of the wedge, which was now about to be driven home hard, with the view of rendering the Church of England by degrees dependent on the voluntary system, by freeing it from the State. It would thus become as much a voluntary Church, and quite as sectarian, as the Wesleyan or any other body, for whom he had a very great respect, though he did not wish to see his Church placed upon the same level. For himself, he could not vote for the second reading of the Bill. Looking at the character of the times, he did not think it was a safe policy that their Lordships should, without making the slightest effort, yield in a case in which any oppression of the people was not involved in the slightest degree. If a foreigner happened to be present at the Bar of the House during the present discussion, he would naturally imagine that the churches of England were in a state of ruin, whereas, the fact was that they were never in better condition; so that, in that respect, there was nothing to complain of under the existing law. It should be remembered that in the parishes where the church rates were still maintained they must be enforced by the will of the majority of the parish. But if voluntaryism, pure and simple, were established, in how many parishes did their Lordships suppose they would be enforced? He would remind their Lordships that there were many parishes where there were no rich people to be found. He would take the case of the fens of Lincolnshire and Norfolk, and would ask what prospect there was in those districts of maintaining the churches without rates? In many cases the Dissenters—he spoke of the religious and not of the political Dissenters—were parties to the church rate. He felt bound to offer his opposition to the destruction of the present system.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, he had addressed letters to several clergymen asking them to give him their opinion as to the facility with which church rates were collected in the rural districts, and as to the probable results of the establishment of the voluntary system; and the unanimous answer had been that the charge was easily levied; but that if the voluntary system were resorted to the rates would probably dwindle away, and the consequence would be that in those districts the maintenance of the churches would be altogether thrown on the clergy and a few rich persons. He felt it to be impossible for him, after the discussion which had taken place, to resist the second reading of the Bill; but he should reserve to himself the right of opposing any of the provisions to which he might object at a future stage.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that although a nominal power of enforcing the payment of church rates existed, they had practically been abolished in all the town parishes, and that in those country parishes in which their collection was contested, ground was from year to year gained by those by whom they were opposed. It was, under these circumstances, not very difficult to foresee that the compulsory payment of church rates would before very long cease. Now, the Bill before the House was neither so very good nor so very bad as some persons seemed to imagine; and he thought it would be better that it should be dealt with by the Whole House than that it should be sent to a Select Committee, by whom alterations so considerable might be made in it as materially to endanger its prospects. The measure was a sort of compromise, and if it were materially altered there would be a danger of its not passing; and then they would have to face the danger of total abolition. They would never again meet the House of Commons under circumstances so favourable as the present; and he would ask their Lordships whether it would be wise to risk the losing all that the present Bill would save to the Church by adopting the foolish policy of "No Surrender?" He had known a Bill rejected one year, and the next year a Bill far more important in its consequences had been passed. Much, therefore, as he disliked this measure, he did not think any better terms could be secured for the Church; and he hoped noble Lords on that side of the House would not be induced by the Government, because some of the clauses were not altogether satisfactory, to run the risk of losing all the compensating clauses.

EARL RUSSELL, in reply, said, he was gratified to find that the reception of the Bill had been such that, with very few exceptions, their Lordships did not intend to oppose the second reading. Another circumstance which, he confessed, had given him great pleasure, and on which he must congratulate the House, was the presence in his place of the noble Earl lately the First Lord of the Treasury, who had spoken with such vigour as to indicate that he had greatly recovered his health. He had been somewhat surprised, however, at the position the noble Earl had taken; for he believed that some years ago Mr. Walpole, on behalf of a Government headed by the noble Earl, introduced into the other House a Bill for the abolition of compulsory church rates. He had also been surprised to hear the noble Earl compare the question of church rates to a rate for a museum or public library. In the latter case when a decision was arrived at the minority can have no difficulty in submitting to the majority; but a church rate was connected with considerations of religion and conscience, which led men to resist what, were it merely a money quesion, they would submit to. It was strange that after more than thirty years' discussion of this question the noble Earl should have used such an argument. But the real question which he (Earl Russell) desired the friends of the Church to consider was that this controversy had produced and was still producing ill-will and agitation, and that it was not for the interest of the Church that such agitation should continue. He believed the objectors to church rates might be divided into two classes. The first class was composed of moderate men, who really felt it a hardship and a grievance that, while supporting their own places of worship, they should be compelled to contribute to other religious edifices, which they never entered, and against the doctrines preached in which they protested. They were anxious to get rid of that grievance, and were, at the same time, willing to agree to clauses sanctioning voluntary rates. The other class were men who wished to keep this question alive for the purposes of agitation; and who thought this the best question on which they could oppose the Established Church, and they would consequently be delighted if their Lordships rejected the Bill, either by strangling it in a Select Committee or by openly refusing the second reading. He thought all judicious friends of the Church should be delighted to get rid of a question in which it can be more effectually held up to odium than any other. He thought it most unfortunate that the repair of churches was thrown centuries ago on a rate to be raised by the decision of the parishioners. In Scotland there was a different arrangement; for when a kirk or manse required enlargement or repair the heritors were summoned and contributed their share to make up the required sum. In this country the decision by a majority has given rise to great disputes and ill-will, and it appeared to him to be for the interests of the Church that it should be got rid of as soon as possible. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had complained that he (Earl Russell) had not explained the clauses of the Bill. It was not his Bill, however; he had not framed it, and he should not undertake to expound its clauses. This he knew, however, that his right hon. Friend Mr. Gladstone had taken very good legal advice; and he also knew from repeated instances that when one lawyer had framed a plea or proposition, there was always some other lawyer who could pick holes in it and show that it was utterly useless. He had no doubt, therefore, that if, in a Select Committee or otherwise, the noble and learned Lord inserted clauses, the objectors to church rates, on the clauses being sent down to the other House, would pick holes in them quite as plausibly as the noble and learned Lord had done with regard to the Bill as it stood. Objection had been taken to the expression that the parishioners should "agree" — as if a unanimous decision were thereby required for a voluntary rate; but it would be easy to clear away such a difficulty by inserting "a majority of" before "the parishioners." He had been pleased to hear the speech of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), and agreed with him as to the advantages of a voluntary rate as compared with a subscription; for if the parishioners decided on a rate of so much in the pound, persons would be called upon for their just proportion, and would feel morally bound to pay it; whereas, if no particular sum was asked each man might subscribe as little as he pleased. A rate would produce contributions in a much fairer proportion than would otherwise be the case. The Bill contained three important principles. The first was the abolition of compulsory payments, which, of course, was the essence of the Bill; and if it were modified, or struck out, the measure would virtually be at an end. The second principle was that all payments which, though made under the name of church rates, were, in fact, payments to the incumbent by way of commuted tithe should be continued. If it were thought necessary to recite the Acts in question, he should have no objection; for gentlemen who received their income in this manner, were as much entitled to it as other clergymen were to a rent-charge for commuted tithe. The third principle was provision for a voluntary rate, and the machinery was a question of detail. It was possible that the Bill could be better considered by a Select Committee; but he should be very reluctant to agree to that course, for if clauses were introduced in the Bill by a Select Committee in secret, and after a discussion unknown to the public, those who represented the objectors to church rates in the other House would certainly find some hidden meaning in those clauses, which they would not do had they been openly debated. Without, therefore, giving any definite opinion on the question, he was disposed to prefer the considerations of the Bill by a Committee of the Whole House. He would, however, think over the point as carefully as he could, and would inform the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) what course he would take on the Motion being made to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He would fix the Committee for Thursday next, before which day he would inform the noble Earl of his decision.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had been much disappointed at the noble Earl not having made the Bill intelligible to the House. The noble Earl had said that it was not his Bill, and it had apparently come into the House without father or mother. Nobody was present to explain it, and it was still consequently, as at five o'clock, when their Lordships met, unintelligible to both sides of the House. The noble Earl had said that he had taken the Bill upon trust from Mr. Gladstone, that Mr. Gladstone had trusted to a lawyer to draw it up, and that it was a case of one lawyer picking holes in the work of another. He certainly thought the noble Earl should have been prepared to make the Bill perfectly intelligible; whereas it was no disrespect to him to say that he did not himself understand the 2nd clause. For his own part he had asked several lawyers and others, but nobody could understand it. A large deputation from Marylebone, moreover, had waited upon him to ask what it meant, they being in the greatest consternation, because, if the meaning were such as they apprehended, it abolished local Acts, in which case five of their clergymen would at once lose a considerable part of their incomes. The important question before their Lordships was whether the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee or not. Again he must ask the noble Earl, in all courtesy, to make up his mind as to that point. They had had some conversation on the subject before, and he found the noble Earl then not unwilling to allow the Bill to be sent to a Select Committee—in fact, if he had not misunderstood the noble Earl, he said he was willing; but the next day, after consultation with his friends, he revoked that consent, and said he thought it better to have the discussion upon the clauses take place in Committee of the Whole House. He could assure the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government had no intention whatever of shelving the Bill; but to attempt to alter the Bill in Committee of the Whole House would produce nothing short of a perfect Babel of conversation. A Committee could be chosen to amend the Bill upstairs, and it would then re-appear before their Lordships in an improved condition. He must press the noble Earl to give an answer on this subject as soon as possible, because it was his intention, on the Motion for going into Committee, to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. The noble Earl wished to go into Committee on Thursday next. That was quite as short an interval as custom would sanction. But he hoped that by to-morrow evening the noble Earl would consult with his friends and be able to state finally his intentions.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What course the Government intend to take as to the reform of the Middlesex Registry Office, and whether illegal fees have been received there since the date of Mr. Greenwood's Report?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that an official inquiry had been made by Mr. Greenwood into the circumstances of the Middlesex Registry Office, which had been laid on the table of the House. The House was aware that the Landed Estates Court had not answered the expectations formed of it, and the Lord Chancellor had issued a Commission on that Court, and he had thought it right to add to the inquiry the subject of the Middlesex Registry, thinking the two subjects to be kindred. He had received a note from the Registrar that day stating that illegal fees were not received at the Office.

In answer to MR. HADFIELD,

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the inquiry would not extend to the Yorkshire Registry Office.

SPAIN AND PRUSSIA.—QUESTION.

MR. AKROYD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has received information that a Treaty of Commerce has recently been signed between Spain and Prussia on the part of the Germanic Confederation; and, if he can state what are the main provisions of that Treaty, and whether he can lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the same?

LORD STANLEY replied that he had received information that such a Treaty had recently been signed; but, as he had not yet received a Copy, he was unable to state its provisions. As soon as he received a Copy he would take steps for making them known. No doubt they would be a matter of interest to the commercial community of London.

CHINA—TREATY OF TIEN-TSIN.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the expected modifications in the Treaty of Tien-tsin this year, an opportunity will be afforded to Members of the House to consider any changes before they are finally adopted?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that there was no absolute necessity for modifying the Treaty this year; and he could only state in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that he had no power to depart from the constitutional practice under which Treaties were made upon the responsibility of the Executive Government. He was in communication with various Chambers of Commerce, and undoubtedly any observations which any hon. Member might have to make on the subject would meet with due attention.

In answer to MR. LAYARD, the noble Lord said the Treaty would not be renewed without some modification.

INDIA—HYDERABAD.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Why the Political Section of the Administration Report for 1862, made by Colonel Davidson, resident at Hyderabad, for which an Address was ordered on the 20th August, 1867, has not been included in the Papers laid before Parliament?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that there was no Political Section in the Administration Report of 1861-2; and though there was such a Section in the Administration Report of 1862-3, it had no bearing upon the Returns laid before Parliament.

ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Estimates he has received from Bombay of the sums expended on behalf of the Abyssinian Expedition are sufficiently full and accurate to enable the Government correctly to calculate its aggregate cost up to the present time?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied that the accounts received from Bombay were, he regretted to say, neither so full nor so accurate as he could have wished. They had, however, been placed in the hands of a gentleman of great experience in connection with military expeditions, and he had been engaged in making an Estimate which might be relied upon as much as any Estimate of the kind could be.

PARLIAMENT—THE CONFERENCE ROOM.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, On how many occasions the present Conference Room has been used for a Conference?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that, in point of fact, the Room referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had not for some time been used for the purposes of a Conference. It had been and was still used as a Committee-room for the House of Lords.

QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he would to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Report of his Highness Ali Pasha upon the condition of the Island of Crete has been communicated to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, he had received the Report alluded to by the hon. Member, and he proposed including it in the next collection of printed Papers on the subject.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would appeal to the hon. Member for Liverpool not to bring on a Motion which stood in his name on the Paper for tomorrow, on the ground that the subject-matter of that Motion was now under inquiry by a Committee of the House. The counsel for the Southampton Dock Company had urged upon the attention of the Committee the very point which the hon. Member proposed to bring forward. It was therefore very inconvenient to ask the House to debate the question before the evidence was taken or reported, and which had, by a decision of the House itself, been referred to the investigation of a Committee.

MR. HORSFALL said, he regretted that he could not comply with the request made by the noble Lord. The restrictions which had been imposed entailed a serious loss upon the importers, butchers, and consumers of meat, and he therefore felt bound to press his Motion.

WAYS AND MEANS.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the interest with which the Financial Statement is generally received—so far, at least, as regards the retrospect of the past year—is, on this occasion, somewhat lessened by the fact that a partial review of the financial position of the country was given to the House in November last. From the statement then made the Committee will, I think, be prepared to hear that the elasticity of the Revenue during the past year has not equalled that which we had the good fortune to hear of in connection with the years immediately preceding. But, considering all the circumstances of the case—considering we have been suffering from two bad harvests—considering that we have not yet recovered the financial depression of 1866 and the beginning of 1867—I think we have reason on the whole to congratulate ourselves on the financial condition of the country.

I propose, Sir, in the first place, to compare the Revenue, as estimated by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) at the commencement of last year, with the actual receipts; and then, in the next place, to compare the Revenue of the year 1867-8 with that of the year 1866-7. The original Estimate of Revenue given by my right hon. Friend on the 4th of April, 1867, was £69,130,000. When the supplementary Financial Statement was made in November last there was added to that original Estimate, on account of additional Income Tax, a sum of £840,000; which makes a total of £69,970,000. Of that Estimate there has been realized in round numbers £69,600,000 only, or £370,000 less than the amount estimated. Now, I have no doubt it will be interesting to the Committee to be informed under what sources of Revenue there was a failure, and on what an excess, of the Estimate. Those sources of Revenue which exceeded the Estimate in fruitfulness are Customs by £650,000; Stamps by £201,000; Taxes by £9,000; and Crown Lands by £5,000. Those heads which have yielded something short of the Estimate are Excise by £538,000; Income Tax by £863,000; Post Office by £20,000; Miscellaneous by £14,000. Thus those sources of Revenue which have exceeded the Estimate have done so to the extent of £865,000, and the deficits of those which have fallen short of the Estimate make a total of £1,235,000. Deducting the total of increases from the total of decreases we have £370,000 as the sum by which our actual receipts have fallen short of the Estimate. I will now compare the total Revenue of 1867-8 with that of the previous year. In 1866-7 the total Revenue was £69,434,568; in 1867-8 it was £69,600,219; showing an increase of £165,651. But with reference to this it must be remembered that in 1866-7 some extraordinary sources of Revenue came to the aid of the Exchequer—the China indemnity gave us £250,000, and the New Zealand Bonds £500,000, making £750,000 of extraordinary Revenue, which, of course, was not repeated in the past year; so that to make a just comparison between the two years we must deduct this £750,000 from the Revenue of 1866-7, and having by this means brought the total down to £68,684,568, we may compare it with £69,600,219, the Revenue of 1867-8, and show that the real difference in the yield of the two years amounts to £915,651 in favour of 1867-8. Then it will, no doubt, be said that during the past year we had an additional Income Tax imposed. In the month of November it was my duty to propose an additional tax of 1*d.* on the year, or, as it was put by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, of 2*d.* on the last half of the year. The House agreed to the proposal, and it was estimated that the additional tax would yield £840,000. This, however, was the first time that an addition to the Income Tax had been made at that period of the year, and the novelty of the proceeding prevented the whole circumstances of the case affecting the difficulty of collecting that addition within the financial year being taken into consideration. The result has been that we have failed to get into the Exchequer within the half-year half the amount we anticipated. The additional 1*d.* has brought us as yet only £377,000. It must also be remembered that last year a reduction of the marine insurance duty took effect, which caused a loss to the Revenue of £270,000; therefore, setting off the loss from the reduction of the marine insurance duty against the gain by the additional Income Tax, we have only as yet a real gain to the Revenue of £107,000. And if we deduct this £107,000 from the £915,651, which represents the increase in the yield of 1867-8 over 1866-7, we get £808,651 as the real expansion of the Revenue during the year 1867-8. I therefore think that, under all the circumstances, we may congratulate ourselves on the result. Notwithstanding the adverse circumstances to which I have alluded, we find that, although the Revenue has not expanded to the amount we have been accustomed to of late years, it has not altogether lost its elasticity, but shows a substantial advance.

Now, Sir, I have already stated the total amount of Revenue for 1867-8; but perhaps the Committee would like to know the amounts derived from each source, and the increase or decrease of each in 1867-8 as compared with 1866-7. The Customs, then, produced £22,650,000, an increase of £347,000 on the previous year; the Excise, £20,162,000, a decrease of £508,000; Stamps, £9,541,000, an increase of £121,000; Taxes, £3,509,000, an increase of £41,000; Property and Income Tax; £6,177,000, an increase of £477,000; the Post Office, £4,630,000, an increase of £160,000; Crown Lands, £345,000, an increase of £15,000; Miscellaneous, £2,586,219, an increase of £262,835; and there was the absence of anything to correspond with the China indemnity and New Zealand Bonds. It may be interesting to the Committee to have some further details regarding these sources of Revenue. Taking the Customs, I find that corn showed an increase of £71,000; dried fruits of £4,000; spirits, £126,000; tea, £168,000; tobacco and snuff, £87,000; and wine, £78,000. There were decreases in coffee to the amount of £7,000, and in sugar and molasses of £65,000. The totals showed an increase of £462,000 on the Customs receipts. But this does not appear on the sheet, because this sum is decreased partly by a reduction of casual receipts and partly by outstanding balances to £347,000. As regards Excise, I may mention an increase on licences of £371,000; on railways of £18,000; and on sugar used by brewers of £32,000; a decrease on malt of £538,000, on spirits of £240,000, on stage and hackney carriages of £40,000, and on chicory of £3,000. But it is remarkable that while spirits showed a total decrease of £240,000, there is in Ireland an actual increase of £150,000. I think this should be a subject of congratulation. [Laughter.] An hon. Member seems to treat that observation with ridicule; but an increase of revenue from Excise has always been deemed matter of congratulation, because, being an evidence of the consuming power of the country, it shows prosperity among the lower orders; and the figures I have stated may by that rule reasonably be taken as evidence of Ireland's material prosperity during the past year, notwithstanding Parliament has been obliged to pass special measures for the safety of the country. Therefore the total decrease for the year under the head of Excise is £400,000; and that has been increased to £508,000, in consequence of the whole of the current charges for the cost of collection of the Inland Revenue being now paid for the first time out of the Excise. It has been transferred to that Department for the purpose of simplifying the accounts; but that fact has the effect of interfering with the comparison, unless the matter is explained. With regard to the Stamps, the principal variations have been as follows:—There has been an increase in legacy and succession duties of £285,000, in the common law court stamps of £90,000, in the receipt stamps of £10,000, and in the fire insurance stamps of £33,000. On the other hand, there is the decrease I have mentioned in marine insurances of £270,000, a decrease on bills of exchange of £45,000, on probate duty of £20,000, and on deeds of £30,000. Then, with regard to the Taxes, the Committee will recollect that there was an alteration made last year with regard to the dog duty, which was then transferred from the Taxes to the Excise; the assessed tax duty for the last year of collection having been reduced from 12s. to 7s. But, notwithstanding this reduction, the Taxes show an actual increase, which is attributable to the increase in the house duty, of £41,000, and of an increase in the Income Tax of £477,000, which latter is partly owing to the extra duty imposed last autumn under that head.

Perhaps the Committee will now allow me to advert to the somewhat striking discrepancy between the Estimate of the Revenue taken by my right hon. Friend at the commencement of last year and the actual receipts as regards the different sources of Revenue from which the National income has been derived. Now, if we compare the Customs with the Excise revenue we shall find the following to have been the result. There is an excess over the Estimate in Customs of £650,000, while there has been a decrease in the Excise of £538,000—the excess of the Customs over the deficit of the Excise being something over £100,000. It has often been observed that, in those years when there has been a deficiency in the harvest of this country, the Excise revenue suffers while the Customs revenue increases. On those occasions we are obliged to have recourse to foreign markets for the supply of those articles which under unfavourable skies are not produced in the usual abundance in this country, and a portion of the usual revenue comes into the Exchequer through the medium of the Customs instead of through the medium of the Excise duties. Therefore, when we fail to find the amount we expect under the head of Excise, we naturally turn to the Customs duties to see if we can see anything there which will account for that deficit. And in this year, although not to the extent which might have been expected under other circumstances, we find that the Customs duties do, to a certain extent, afford some explanation of the deficit in the Excise duties. I have already stated that the Customs duties upon foreign spirits show an increase in the past year of £126,000. There has been, I believe, a falling off in the duty upon rum and brandy, but there has also been a considerable increase under the head of Geneva and other spirits. I am told that there is a spirit that comes into this country under the denomination of German spirit, which is largely used for fortifying, on account of its possessing but little flavour of its own, and it is the increased importation of this spirit which accounts for the increase under the head of Geneva and other spirits. This increase, however, must be attributed partly to the deficiency in our harvests and to our having recourse to foreign markets for spirits which we fail to get at a sufficiently low price in this country. Therefore this sum of £126,000 increase in the Customs I think may fairly be considered to have replaced an equal amount of revenue in the Excise. There is also an increase this year in the duty upon the sugar used by brewers. The excess of Excise duties upon this article amounts to £32,000, and as all sugar used by brewers, excepting the small quantity made in this country, pays Customs duty, besides paying Excise duty, it follows that part of the increase in the Customs Revenue must be attributed to the importation of sugar for brewing purposes. Now if we take roughly the proportion of duty payable under the head of Customs and of Excise upon this article, I find that the Customs duty is about three times the amount of the Excise duty. Thus we have a sum of about £100,000 of Customs revenue derived from the sugar duty, which no doubt must have replaced an equal amount of malt duty, which under other circumstances would have come under the head of Excise. These two sums taken together—the increase under the head of Geneva and other spirits, and that under the head of duty upon sugar—account for two-fifths of the difference between the estimated and the actual receipts of Excise up to last April. In addition to this, the fact I before mentioned, that the payments into the Exchequer on account of Excise revenues have been diminished by more than £100,000, must, of course, be taken into account, and that also reduces the payments under the head of Excise revenue into the Exchequer by that amount. After taking this into consideration, there is a deficit remaining of about £200,000, which must be attributed to a less amount of consumption having taken place than was anticipated at the commencement of the last financial year. Then, as regards the excess of the receipts of Customs over that which was estimated, I have already mentioned the sum of £226,000 as having found its way into the Customs which would in ordinary years have found its way into the Excise, and to that we must add £70,000 for the corn duty, also attributable to the bad harvests of the last two years. These three sums together account for nearly one-half of the excess of Customs revenue over the Estimate. The remaining increase upon the Customs receipts over the Estimate must be attributed to the increased power of consumption of the country of Customable articles, unless we assume—which I fear is too sanguine supposition—that the increase due to the receipts of tea duties is the result of a change in the habits of the people, and that the beverage “which cheers but not inebriates” has taken the place of those ardent liquors which so often are more profitable to the Exchequer than beneficial to the individuals who consume them.

There has been a deficit in the Income Tax received, compared with the Estimate, of nearly £663,000, which is attributed by that Department to an actual loss of revenue of £200,000, and to arrears amounting to £463,000, which sum is expected to fall in during the current year. The deficit upon the Post Office arises solely from the change we have made by determining to omit from the Estimates votes for the Postages for the public Departments. We came to the conclusion that it was useless to ask Parliament to vote money which had afterwards to be paid into the Exchequer as Revenue, and therefore we determined not to submit to the House Estimates for such postages.

Had this determination not been arrived at, it would have been necessary to have submitted to this House a Supplementary Estimate for Postages for public Departments, which would have brought up the revenue of the Post Office to the sum which it was estimated to produce. The deficiency upon the Miscellaneous Receipts is only in round numbers £14,000 short of the Estimate; but in the statement made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) last April he took into account a certain amount he expected to receive from the operations of the Fees and Fines (Ireland) Bill; but the House showed such a reluctance to pass that measure and sanction that transfer that the Government did not press it, and the consequence has been a certain loss to the Revenue under the head of Miscellaneous Receipts. The result of all that I have stated is a deficit of £370,000 upon the Estimates, which would have been more than counterbalanced had it not been for the delay in the collection of the Income Tax at the close of last year.

The Committee will no doubt wish to be informed of the effect of the small alterations which took place in our system of taxation last year. The alteration in the marine insurance duty was estimated to cause a loss of £210,000, but the actual loss was £270,000. I am, however, informed that this loss is more apparent than real, because there were certain old stocks of stamped papers in the hands of persons concerned in that business which have been exchanged for new ones; and this accounts for some of the loss. Then there is another matter which, although it was not dealt with as part of the Budget, must be considered as forming a part of the financial arrangements of the year—namely, the alteration in the dog duty. When the Bill upon that subject was introduced last year, this tax was estimated to produce £300,000; but the produce of the Excise duty upon dogs last year amounts to £366,000. The Committee will remember that during the year of the alteration the Excise duty was taken for merely nine months. The new duty commenced at the beginning of the last financial year. Of the £366,000 a sum of £207,000 was collected during the nine months ending 31st December, 1867, and the remaining £159,000 during the first three months of the natural year 1868. The Committee may like to have a comparison between the number of dogs brought into charge under the old system and that under the new. The number of dogs charged under the assessed taxes up to April, 1867, was 445,645. The number of dogs brought into charge under the Excise licences between April and December, 1867, was 828,341; and the number of dogs for which licences had been taken out this year up to March was 637,000. I think the Committee will be of opinion that the change which was made has been a success; and this result gives rise to the consideration whether, at some future time, it may not be desirable to make a like change as regards some others, if not all, of the assessed taxes. The advantage of turning assessed taxes into Excise duties is this—that you pay for the year in which the articles are kept. Under the assessed tax system no one is called for a return of the articles kept till the year has expired; and it frequently happens that the most conscientious persons, anxious to make a most correct return, are not able to do so, not remembering exactly the date of the changes made in their establishment. Besides, in making such charges it seems more reasonable that the tax should be on the number of articles kept on the year for which the charge is made, rather than on the number kept in a previous year. Moreover, a great loss often falls on the Exchequer, because people keeping articles this year may become bankrupt or insolvent, or may disappear from the country, or from the world altogether; and consequently there is a great difficulty in collecting assessed taxes to the full amount they ought to be collected. Therefore I say it will be well to consider whether at some future time it may not be well to follow the initiative taken with regard to dogs in respect of the other assessed taxes.

I now come to the Estimate of the expenditure compared with the result:—and in taking the Estimate of expenditure I am taking the Estimate of the interest of Debt and of the ordinary charges on the Consolidated Fund, as stated by my right hon. Friend at the commencement of the last year; but the Supply Services I am taking as they were voted, because, some alterations were made in them—some diminutions and some increases. I am afraid there was more increase than diminution after these Estimates were originally presented, and therefore I am taking them as they were voted. With regard to the interest of Debt, the actual payment was £26,571,750, being £178,000 less than the Estimate. The other ordinary charges on the Consolidated Fund were £1,893,898, being £6,000 less than the Estimate. The Army expenditure amounted to £15,418,582, being £118,000 more than the Estimate. The Navy charges amounted to £11,168,949, being an excess of £102,000 over the Estimate. The Miscellaneous Civil Services amounted to £8,491,342, being £83,000 more than the Estimate. The Revenue Departments took £4,883,203, being £170,000 less than the Estimate. The Post Office Packet Service was £808,518. With regard to the Extraordinary Expenditure for the Service of the Abyssinian Expedition, the Estimate was not exceeded. The whole shows a total expenditure of £71,236,242, as against an Estimate of £71,287,000; so that the expenditure was less than the Estimate by £51,000.

I now proceed to compare the expenditure for 1867-8 with that for 1866-7. In the interest of the Debt there was an increase of £489,972; on the other ordinary charges on Consolidated Fund an increase of £29,567; on the Army there was an increase of £743,042; on the Navy of £492,848; on Miscellaneous Civil Services of £678,648; on the Revenue Departments £59,245. Then there was an extraordinary item of £2,000,000 for the Abyssinian Expedition: thus making the total expenditure for 1867-8 a sum of £71,236,242, as against an expenditure of £66,780,396 for the year 1866-7, showing a total increase for the past year of £4,493,322. Of course, the Abyssinian Expedition accounts for nearly half that—namely, £2,000,000.

I come now to state the Revenue and expenditure of the previous year, as compared with each other. I have already stated the expenditure of 1867-8 at £71,236,242; while the Revenue was, in round numbers, only £69,600,000, showing a deficit on the year of £1,636,000; but I think it would be right to call attention to the fact that some part of this expenditure was not due to the year just past, but to the previous year; because there were Excess Votes taken to the amount of £228,000 for sums paid in respect of money spent in 1866-7, though they come into the account of 1867-8. The deficiency I have stated was £1,636,000; and it will be remembered that when the Supplementary Financial Statement was made to the Committee of Ways and Means in November last we estimated for a deficiency. We estimated for taking out of the balances a sum of £960,000, to which the Committee assented. The Committee would, no doubt, wish to hear how the difference between those two sums is to be accounted for. At that time we estimated a surplus of £200,000, which has not been realized. On the contrary, the Supplementary Estimates and Excess Votes have swelled the expenditure by £362,000. The expected saving of £100,000 on expenditure has not been realized in the way we then anticipated. This shows how the difference between the deficit which we estimated in November and the deficit which appeared when the accounts were actually made up is accounted for. This deficit has however been met out of the balances in the Exchequer. There was besides an excess of expenditure over income on the Revenue and expenditure of the year, also an excess of payments over receipts in the Exchequer accounts other than the Revenue and expenditure to a considerable amount, which further reduced the balances by £876,000. That is principally—indeed, I may say entirely—due to payments on the Sinking Fund account. The result is that the balances which on the 31st of March, 1867, stood at £7,294,000, were on the 31st of March, 1868, reduced to £4,782,000, showing a diminution of £2,512,000, between the two periods. I do not think that the balances stand as high as they should do; but, at the same time, we found at the commencement of this quarter sufficient to carry us through without having recourse to the Bank for advances. We have been able in this quarter to pay the interest of the Debt, the charges on the Consolidated Fund, and all other demands on the Exchequer, and to leave a sum remaining without having recourse to the assistance of the Bank. Therefore, though the balances are lower than I think they ought to be, I cannot say that, up to the present time, that has caused us any practical inconvenience.

The Committee may wish to have some account of the alterations which have been made in the Public Debt during the year that has passed. In addition to the conversion of the Bank Debt to the amount of £24,000,000 there was further a conversion into Terminable Annuities to the amount of £2,500,000 under the Acts of last Session. Besides this, we cancelled stock to the amount of £888,766 under ordinary powers. Then, Exchequer Bills have been cancelled under the permanent Acts to the amount of £45,700, while stock has been cancelled by conversion into life and other annuities under old Acts to the amount of £804,102. Then, in accordance with what I stated to the Committee in November last, Sinking Fund money to the amount of £901,638 has been applied in repayment of Bank advances, which would, if our Exchequer had been in a more flourishing state, have been applied to the extinction of the permanent Debt. The power given to the Government to renew Exchequer Bonds to the amount of £1,700,000 has been exercised, and the Bonds have been renewed; but they have been renewed on more favourable terms than before—namely, at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest, instead of  $3\frac{3}{4}$  per cent and 4 per cent.

And now I come to the present financial year, 1868-9, and I think I shall best consult the convenience of the Committee if I first of all deal with the estimated ordinary expenditure and income, putting aside the Abyssinian Expedition for the present. We can afterwards see what must be added to each side of the account in consequence of that Expedition. The interest of the Debt I take at £26,700,000; other charges on the Consolidated Fund, £1,865,000. Then, as regards Supply Services, the estimated expenditure will be as follows:—For the Army, £15,456,000; for the Navy, £11,177,000; for the Civil Services, £9,173,000; for the Revenue Departments, £4,968,000; and for the Post Office Packet Service, £1,089,000. The total of these amounts is £70,428,000. It may now, perhaps, be convenient to the Committee to hear what alterations have been made in the charge for the interest of Debt in consequence of the operations of the previous year. There is an increase in respect of Terminable Annuities expiring in the year 1885 of £801,134, and on account of interest on life and tontine annuities there is an increase of £47,253, making a total of £848,387. Against this, however, savings on other accounts must be set. In the first place, a deduction of £292,870 must be made in respect of “the dead-weight annuities” which have expired. Then there is a diminution of interest on the permanent Debt, to the extent of £438,569; and on annuities for terms of years to the extent of £2,297; saving, in consequence of lowering the rate of interest on Exchequer Bonds, £11,000; a similar saving on the interest on Exchequer Bills to the amount of £26,169, and a small saving of £387 in the management of the Debt. The total amount saved by these means is £771,292, leaving only £77,095 as the net increase of the charge for Debt.

And now, I should like, if the Committee will allow me, to say a few words about the increase in the Estimates for the present year; and I think it is the more necessary that I should do so in consequence of the remarks which the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) began to make the other evening when, by the ruling of the Chairman, he was prevented from concluding them. These remarks had reference to the great increase of the Civil Service and Revenue Department Estimates for the present year. Now, the greater part of that apparent increase is entirely due to a different mode having been adopted in making out the accounts. It was formerly the practice in the case of regular Votes to apply the extra moneys received by a Department to the reduction of the amount it required, and only to ask the House of Commons to vote the balance; but in the early part of this Session, an Act of Parliament was passed which provided that the Treasury might require that all such extra receipts should be paid into the Exchequer, the object being that the House might have a greater control over the expenditure of the various Departments. The new system was followed in making out the Estimates for the present year, the consequence being that the Votes have been greatly increased in nominal amount. The desirability of making that change was carefully considered by the Government, and it was thought expedient to make it for this reason—because a Department might, by estimating its extra receipts under the amount it was likely to receive, really get more money to expend than the House of Commons intended it to have. Indeed, during the last few years, some glaring instances of this have occurred, and the Government, therefore, recommended the House to pass a Bill on the subject. There existed considerable difference of opinion, I am aware, as to the expediency of the change; but we were in favour of it because we were greatly impressed with the desirability of bringing under the notice of the House the whole of the expenditure of each Department, and we, therefore, introduced the Bill. To those, however, who have not carefully studied the Estimates, or the abstracts of them, the change will be exceedingly misleading, and I regret that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should have been led to think that the Government had been indulging in very extravagant notions and propositions. The fact, I believe, is that on the Navy Estimates there is really an increase of £10,000 only. In the Army Estimates, it is true, there is an increase of £200,000; but the cause of that has been already explained to the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. There is an increase on the Civil Service Estimates of something over £400,000. A great part of that increase—I think about £170,000 or £180,000—is attributable to the intention on the part of the Government to extend education; and the exact amount will be found under the head of "Education in England and Ireland," and "Science and Art." About £198,000 is under Class 1, for Buildings. Now, I believe that, with the exception of about £34,000, these sums are taken for the purpose of continuing works which have already received the sanction of this House, and which must therefore be of necessity followed up. I do not, of course, say it necessarily followed that the additional sums should be asked for this year; but, at all events, it was desirable to complete without delay the buildings which had been commenced. Some other items in excess this year are owing to the legislation of last year. The House has recently shown increased anxiety to prevent the food of the people from being adulterated, and also to protect the people in their employments; and in accordance with these beneficent views, Acts of Parliament were passed last year which required a great deal of inspection of people in their employments under the Home Office, and of the articles of consumption to be made use of by people at sea, under the administration of the Board of Trade. This circumstance also accounts for a considerable increase in the Civil Service Estimates. In addition to this, the Bill passed last year in regard to the Irish constabulary made a considerable increase in the Estimates; and there is also a proposition to be made this year for an increase of the Metropolitan Police, to which it is proposed that the Government should contribute in the same proportion as they have hitherto done. I believe I have now indicated the principal sources of increase in the Civil Service

Estimates for the present year, and having said this much, I will pass on to the rest of my statement.

I have stated that the total estimated ordinary expenditure of the year is £70,428,000, and I now come to the estimated Revenue, in order to see what we have to meet this expenditure. The Committee is, of course, aware that the tea duty expires in the course of the year, and that the Income Tax has already expired; and if I were strictly accurate, I might treat these duties as being entirely out of the question, and thereby show a very considerable deficit. But I think it will be more convenient that I should assume that the tea duty will be continued at the same rate as at present, and the Income Tax at the rate of 4*d.*, at which it stood in the beginning of last year. I will proceed, then, upon this assumption. I estimate the Revenue from the Customs at £22,800,000; the Excise £20,330,000; Stamps, £9,650,000; Taxes, £3,540,000; Property and Income Tax at 4*d.*, including estimated arrears, £6,900,000—those arrears amounting to £1,070,000; Post Office, £4,650,000; Crown Lands, £350,000; Miscellaneous, £3,130,000. The last item, which is very considerable, is swollen by the extraordinary receipts to which I have already alluded; and there is also a sum which we propose should be paid over to the Exchequer on the winding up of the the Irish Court of Chancery Fee and Fine Fund, but that will in reality be a repayment of moneys paid out in previous years. It is only the part payment of a debt; and no Member of the Committee representing Ireland, however much impressed with the notion that Chancellors of the Exchequer are anxious to filch money from their country, could raise an objection to that proposition, as was done in the case of the Irish Fines and Fees Fund. The total Revenue derived from these sources we estimate at £71,350,000. Therefore, we have as the Revenue of the year on the estimate I have made £71,350,000, as against an expenditure of £70,428,000, leaving a surplus of £922,000. Now, it is right the Committee should fully understand that the whole of that surplus, and something over, is due to the arrears in the collection of the Income Tax of the previous year. Considering the state in which the balances had been left, I think the greater part of that sum ought really to be maintained as a surplus in order to strengthen the balances.

I now come to the extraordinary expenditure of the year—namely, that for the Abyssinian Expedition. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that, in moving a Vote of Credit for that Expedition, my right hon. Friend stated that a sum of £2,000,000 would be required to place the Expedition on the shores of Abyssinia, fully equipped. We have no reason to suppose that that Estimate has been exceeded. It was contemplated at the time that Sir Robert Napier would land with the whole of his force by the 1st of January, 1868, and it was stated to the Committee that, as the expense to be incurred over and above the £2,000,000 during the financial year 1867-8 would be defrayed in the first instance by the Indian Government, there would be no chance of our being called to account for that expenditure within the financial year. My right hon. Friend stated that the expenditure for the Expedition alone up to the end of April was then expected to amount to £3,500,000, or possibly £4,000,000. Considering all the circumstances of the case—considering the unknown character of the country to which we were sending our troops, and the disadvantage we were under in regard to obtaining information, owing to the distance from this country—I think the officers of the Indian Government, on whom we principally relied for our data, deserve very great credit for the Estimate which they made. But since that statement was made we have heard that the supplies to be obtained from the country itself were much less than it was anticipated they would be. The consequence is that supplies have had to be conveyed from a distance, and the estimate of transport expenditure has been considerably exceeded. Taking it that £2,000,000 will pay the expense of the Expedition up to the end of the year 1867; on the information that we have now before us, we estimate that it will require from the commencement of the natural year, from the 1st of January, 1868, £600,000 per month to defray the cost of the Expedition. Considering that the £2,000,000 clears off the account up to the end of the year 1867, we start the natural year 1868 with an expenditure of £600,000 per month. I propose to lay on the table the Estimates that have been prepared at the India Office; but I will state to the Committee the heads under which the expenditure falls. The ordinary pay of the troops is excluded, that being defrayed by the Indian Government. Sea transport will cost £400,000 per month; provisions for troops, £28,000; provision for baggage animals, £90,000; extra allowance to troops over and above their ordinary pay, £10,000; coals, £26,250; and miscellaneous items, £35,000; making a total of £589,250 per month, or in round numbers £600,000. We expect that the Expedition will last until the end of May, and that five months will have to be paid for at the rate named. ["Oh!"] The information my right hon. Friend has received from Sir Robert Napier is that he anticipates, if all goes well—and the accounts lately received lead us to suppose that all things are going on well—he shall be on his way homeward, with his back upon Theodore and his army, by the 20th of April. If there be any further charge we believe it will be very small in amount, and it will probably be met by the supplies taken back by the Indian Government. Therefore we have no reason to suppose there will be any additional charge of more than an insignificant amount; assuming, of course, that the Expedition closes by the end of May. I am told that I used an expression of a somewhat ambiguous nature with regard to a British commander turning his back on his enemy—of course I meant after the enemy had been defeated, and not before. According to information at our disposal we estimate the total expenditure for the Abyssinian Expedition, supposing that it is successful, and supposing, as we have reason to hope, that it leaves the country by the end of May, at £5,000,000. Of that £2,000,000 has been already provided for, and £3,000,000 has now to be provided. The Committee will be desirous of knowing how the Government propose to meet this expenditure. If there were reason to suppose that that expenditure would be of anything more than of a temporary nature—as we have every reason to suppose it will not be—if there were reason to suppose that it was likely to last for any considerable time, we should certainly have felt it to be our duty to propose to the Committee the imposition of extraordinary taxation upon articles of consumption. But we consider that the expense of this Expedition will cease within a very short time; and, under these circumstances, it appears to us very objectionable to cause great disturbance of trade by alterations of the Customs tariff. The imposition of extraordinary duties upon articles of general consumption would cause two disturbances—one when the duties were put on, and another when they were taken off. Our experience has been that when such changes are made the general public usually gets the worst of it, and a large profit goes into the hands of those few people who are highly intelligent in the pursuit of their trade. I gather from the expression of opinion around me that the view of the Government in that respect is approved by the Committee. Then there comes the resource which the most obtuse Chancellor of the Exchequer would naturally think of, and that is the Income Tax. In estimating the ordinary Revenue of the year, I have supposed that the Income Tax would be continued at 4*d.* If it were taken at 6*d.* for the present year the additional 2*d.* would give us this result: we should get, according to the estimate of the Department, by an addition of 2*d.* to the Income Tax for the year, £2,900,000, or very nearly the sum we estimate will be required for the cost of the Expedition. [Mr. GLADSTONE: But not all within the year.] The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) says "Not all within the year." But the right hon. Gentleman has shown us the way of doing so: for I think it was part of one of his financial schemes to impose extra Income Tax, and throw it all upon the first half year; and that is a mode of raising the money within the year. There is this inherent fault in the Income Tax, that, if imposed upon the whole of the year, in the ordinary way, the greater part of it does not come in within the year. The right hon. Gentleman has before now got over that difficulty by imposing the extra Income Tax on one half of the year. If that course can be avoided, it is one that I think ought not to be followed. Suppose the Committee assent to my proposition, and fix the Income Tax at 6*d.* this year, and we were to collect the extra 2*d.* in the first half-year, it would be virtually laying an 8*d.* tax upon the income of that half of the year. That, I think, would be a course more oppressive than there is any necessity to adopt under present circumstances. And, in addition to its being oppressive, there is a certain amount of inequality in it; because, when property changes hands, it is difficult to adjust the burdens falling upon it unless they fall equally throughout the year. Therefore, I think it is desirable that that course should, if possible, be avoided.

Now, what I propose is to impose a 6d. Income Tax in the ordinary way, and spread it over the whole of the year. Then the necessities of the Exchequer will be such that if we merely take the extra 6d. in the ordinary way we shall not obtain the money we want. According to our Estimate we should obtain by an extra 6d. of Income Tax in the present year £1,800,000, and in the year to come £1,100,000. Now, what I have to propose to the Committee is this—that we should take power to issue Exchequer Bonds for one year to the amount of £1,000,000, to anticipate the receipt of the extra 2d. of Income Tax, which will fall into the Exchequer next year. We ask the Committee to assent to that course on the full understanding that, if it be adopted, this £1,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds is to be paid off next year. At the time we are asking for power to issue these Bonds we are actually providing by taxation within the year for the means of paying them off, and, therefore it cannot be said that we are trusting to the future. We ask for this power, but it does not at all follow that we need exercise the power. Though we have estimated the expenditure of the Expedition now unpaid at £3,000,000, it does not follow that that sum will be called for within the present financial year. The expenditure is defrayed in the first instance by the Indian Government, and the experience of past arrangements between the Imperial and Indian Governments leads us to suppose that it is quite possible that the accounts will not be adjusted by the end of the financial year, and in that case the whole of the money will not be called for within that period. I believe that in the case of the last China War the accounts are still open between the Indian and the Home Governments. Then, again, there is another reason why it is possible that, if we are intrusted with this power, we may not be called upon to exercise it. The past year has been a year of depression. It has been exceedingly difficult to estimate the Revenue for the present year, and we have thought it prudent under existing circumstances to make a careful and a low Estimate. Under these circumstances it is possible that if commercial prosperity returns, and the elasticity of the Revenue all return with it, that the proceeds of the year may suffice without our having recourse to any such power as that we now ask for. Of course we cannot calculate upon that. We must estimate the Revenue according to the best of our judgment, and we must endeavour to provide this money in case the expenditure should all fall within the year; and the estimate of Revenue we propose should not be exceeded.

Well, Sir, suppose the Committee accept our proposition, this will be the result—We have the surplus of £922,000 on the figures I have already mentioned. Then we should receive by the additional Income Tax, £1,800,000; and if we were to issue Bonds for the amount proposed, we should receive £1,000,000. Thus there would be available £3,722,000, leaving a surplus of £722,000 to strengthen the Exchequer balances. On the other hand, if no Exchequer Bonds were issued, we should only have £1,800,000 in addition to our surplus, or £2,722,000 available to meet the expenditure, and there would consequently be a deficit of £278,000.

I think, perhaps, it would be advisable to see whether the proposition I have made is one which ought to be supported on general grounds. Now, taking the total cost of the war at £5,000,000, let us see how far we have met it out of taxation. We raised by taxation on the income of 1867-8, though it was not all collected within the year 1867-8, the sum of £1,450,000. We now propose to provide by taxation on the income of this year £2,900,000. Thus, we have provided by taxation within two years £4,350,000 out of the total of £5,000,000, throwing upon the balances in the Exchequer—that is, the accumulations of general Revenue—the difference—namely, £650,000. Well, I think it cannot be said that we are throwing upon the future the burden of this expedition. Questions, of course, may be raised, and probably will be raised, as to the desirability of meeting the whole of this expenditure out of direct taxation; but I think the arguments I have used appear to recommend themselves to the Committee—that it is not expedient, when the expenditure to be provided for is of so temporary a character, to disturb trade by increasing taxation on articles of consumption. These, Sir, are the propositions I have to make, and ask the assent of the House to.

There is a passage in one of the minor poets of antiquity in which he laments over his unhappy fate in having been born in such late times that the whole poetic harvest had been gathered in by the great masters of song, and that there were few flowers left for him to cull. I do not think the time has come yet for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to take up that strain. I do not think he need say there is nothing in our financial system that requires further reform. "Much has been done, but more remains to do." If there are not many flowers to cull, there are many noxious weeds in our fiscal system still to be rooted up; there are blots in that system which have often attracted the attention of the House, and which have been much urged upon successive Chancellors of the Exchequer; and there are other blots in our system which have not, in my opinion, yet received sufficient attention. Holding these views I hope I shall receive some sympathy at the hands of the Committee if, on this occasion, the exigencies of fate have obliged me to propose a most unambitious Budget. I felt that the circumstances of the time were such that it would be out of place to propose extensive changes in our fiscal system, and, therefore, it has been my lot to propose a very matter-of-fact Budget. I think the Committee will, at all events, agree that it is a very simple and intelligible proposition; and I feel that I can recommend it to the Committee as being financially sound, and I think I am justified in saying that we propose to provide for the extraordinary expenses entailed upon us in a manner which will not be unduly oppressive to the people of this country. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by proposing the usual formal Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1868 until the 1st day of August 1869, on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland: viz. s. d.

Tea . . . the lb. 0 6."

MR. GLADSTONE: I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon this—that if he has been in some respects, as I think, unfortunate in the circumstances under which he has acceded to the duties of an arduous office, he has laid before us, with great pains and ability, a very full statement of all information which, as he thought, would tend to improve our means of judgment upon the important question he has submitted to the Committee. I need not say that I do not propose to enter at large upon the matter contained in the right hon. Gentleman's speech; but the occasion is one of importance, and one on which, taking such a view as I am able to take of public affairs, it is right there should be a special meaning attached to the assent which I, for one, shall be quite prepared to give to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to our freedom of future action upon the state of affairs he has made known to us. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the retrospect of the Revenue of the country, all things considered, is not unsatisfactory. I think that the augmentation which he has stated to have taken place in the Revenue, under the circumstances of the year, is quite as much as, or more than, we were entitled to expect. I am also glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman is well satisfied with the result of the transfer of the Dog Tax from the head of assessed taxes to that of Excise; and no doubt there is very considerable force in the argument he has urged in favour of other similar transfers, though, perhaps, some points may likewise be urged on the other side of the account. I must also make this admission to the right hon. Gentleman—that I think, if we are to assume the charge of the country to remain as he has stated it, the manner in which he proposes to meet that charge as he has described it is simple and sound. I have nothing to object to it. Viewing the exigency with which he has to contend, I think he is eminently right in not attempting to disturb the trade of the country by any change in indirect taxation. I think, likewise, that the amount of the provision he proposes with reference to the account between ourselves and what we call posterity is a fair division of the charge. That which weighs upon my mind is a point of a different character. It is one which the right hon. Gentleman has by no means kept out of view, for nothing, I think, could be more fair and ingenuous than his statement. But it is a point, at the same time, of the greatest importance, and one which, I doubt, whether the House or the country have at present taken into view. [Mr. WHITE: Hear, hear!] The impression which prevails out-of-doors, and which, I think, prevails extensively among Members of this House, and certainly prevails among persons generally well informed, is that we were to-day to be called on to make an addition to the taxation of the country in consequence of the Abyssinian War. Now, Sir, that impression is an erroneous one.

We are, indeed, called on to make an addition to the taxation of the country; but not in consequence of the Abyssinian War. It is in consequence of the additions made, and proposed to be made, to the permanent expenditure of the country; and that is the very grave fact which induces me to rise for the purpose of at least stating it. I will give the House the few particulars which are necessary to make my statement intelligible, reserving to myself what I may call the freedom—but the freedom to perform a duty—of considering the position of the accounts; because, although no grave question may arise on the nature of the provision proposed by the right hon. Gentleman if that provision be really necessary, the really grave question which arises is this—Whether we are embarked on a safe and prudent course as respects the general expenditure of the country? As I have said, it is not the war in Abyssinia which requires the augmentation of the Income Tax that is now proposed. With regard to the augmentation of the Income Tax made in November last, it was certainly due to that war; because, whatever might have been in the spring of last year the amount of our available surplus, the war in Abyssinia was not then contemplated; it was a sudden and unforeseen necessity, arising when the financial year was already far advanced; and it was not possible—at least, it would not have been equitable—to expect that the Government should have been in possession of resources to enable them to meet the charges for the Abyssinian Expedition. But I wish now to point out—taking the figures of the right hon. Gentleman—what I think is necessary in order to support the statement that I have made. I am bound to observe that it sounds to me as if the right hon. Gentleman had not been over liberal, to say the very least, in the provision that he proposes to make for the war in Abyssinia. I must own that I think him sanguine in that respect. He has taken the charge for five months from the 1st of January last, and beyond those five months he has taken nothing whatever. He assumes that on the 31st of May his troops will have been re-landed in India, his transports dismissed, his establishments reduced, and that he will have a clear stage for what follows that date; or, if I understood him aright, as far as any qualifications were to be made to that statement, a sufficient set-off would be found in the credits for supplies to be returned in the hands of the East Indian Government. Sir, the Government are so superior to us in their means of forming a judgment that I now go no further than to say I own that, in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, I am afraid he has not made a very liberal provision for the remaining expenses of the Expedition. But I take his figures as he has given them; and the state of the case is this—that the right hon. Gentleman shows us a deficit to be provided for of £2,078,000 on the expenditure of the year 1868-9. Now, my proposition, which is a very simple one, is this, that if our permanent expenditure—that is to say, our expenditure on the ordinary heads of charge—had been less than it is by £2,078,000, the right hon. Gentleman would not have been required to make any call on the country for any new tax whatever. And although I entirely approve the nature of the call which the right hon. Gentleman has made, if the necessity for it be established, yet I think we must carefully distinguish between an appropriate mode of finding the Ways and Means and the propriety of the charge itself, which the Ways and Means are intended to meet. Now, how do we stand? As I have said, there are £2,078,000 to be provided. This, Sir, is the very simple comparison that I propose to make. I propose to compare the Estimates as they are now on the table with the Estimates which were on the table two years ago. That comparison is one which, at least, is fair to Her Majesty's Government, because, undoubtedly, they have been unfortunate in the number of Supplemental Estimates which it has been either their fault or their misfortune—I do not say it has been their fault—to submit; and they have been still more unfortunate in the Excesses—which appear to have become almost normal—of expenditure over and above the sums voted with which they have had to come before the House of Commons. Therefore, the comparison I am about to make, if it be unfair, is not unfair to Her Majesty's Government. I will not trouble the Committee with any question as to the Debt and permanent charge of the country; but will confine myself to what may be called the variable or optional charges—namely, such as are voted in Supply; and I take the original Estimates of the years 1866-7, 1867-8, and 1868-9. The Estimates of 1866-7 amounted to £38,165,000; those for 1867-8 to £39,733,000; and those for 1868-9 are £41,863,000. Prima facie, there is an increase of £3,700,000; but the right hon. Gentleman has observed with perfect propriety that there are deductions to be made from that increase, because some considerable amounts now appear on both sides of the account which formerly appeared on neither side. Sir, I have endeavoured, and with the assistance of my hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), to ascertain, as well as we can, what are the items that fall within that class, so as to learn how much of this formidable amount of £3,700,000 is merely a nominal and not a real increase of charge. As far as we are able to arrive at a conclusion—and I am very confident that we are not very far wrong in it, though I by no means submit it as a conclusion positively and minutely exact—the reduced and corrected Estimates of this year, making allowance for those charges, may be said to stand for comparison with the Estimates of two years ago, not at £41,863,000, but at about £41,000,000 in round numbers.

MR. GLADSTONE: £860,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The deductions should be more than that.

MR. GLADSTONE: Very well, there are some points which might be made matter of detailed argument; but the margin of dispute between us is not very large, and even if I accept the data of the right hon. Gentleman it will not in the least interfere with my proposition. Therefore, I have to compare £41,000,000 with the sum of £38,165,000, at which the Estimates stood in 1866-7; and I show an addition to the permanent charge of the country, within what has not yet been the full financial year, of £2,840,000. Well as the whole of this Abyssinian deficit amounts to £2,078,000, the appearance of the matter is this—that had we continued at the point of expenditure where we were two years ago—and I, for one, have never concealed my opinion that that was a very high point—instead of the right hon. Gentleman being now obliged to condole with himself, and my being obliged to condole with him on the nature of the appeal that he makes to us, he would have appeared before us, notwithstanding the financial crisis, notwithstanding the bad harvest and the comparatively unfavourable state of the Revenue, with a clear surplus of £800,000. That is a matter which, on the simple statement of it, I own I think requires grave reflection. The state of things for the last two years has been somewhat peculiar. During the Session of 1866 it would have been most invidious and offensive if even Independent Members of the House—still more if the Members of an out-going Government—had cavilled too sharply at such an augmentation as was then made to the Estimates of the year. During the Session of 1867 it was very natural that the absorbing impatience and anxiety of the House to close the subject of Parliamentary Reform, at least as far as regards the most populous of the three kingdoms and the most difficult portions of the question, placed in abeyance almost entirely the function of an Opposition with respect to criticism on financial proposals. The case having been so, I do not at this moment, and without further examination, mean to enter into the question whether what was done in former years in this respect is matter of blame or not; but I do mean to reserve to myself the power of considering whether, as I have said, the course in which we have embarked is a safe and prudent one. An augmentation not far short of £3,000,000 sterling to the permanent charge of the country, when it was already high, brings that permanent charge I think I may say to a higher point than in time of peace it ever has attained. I do not think that, under the anxieties of the years 1859, 1860, and 1861—if we strike off the distinct war charges of that period—our permanent, normal, and regular expenditure was nearly as high as that which the right hon. Gentleman calls upon us to sanction in the arrangements of the present year. These arrangements are still to a great extent in our power. And I must say, without presuming to give a confident opinion—for it would be most presumptuous in me, as an individual, to do so—that I do hope the House will examine for themselves the statement that I have made—namely, that this augmentation of Income Tax which is now demanded from the people is not a demand made for the purpose of meeting the Abyssinian war ["Oh!"]; but is a demand made for the purpose of meeting an augmentation of the permanent charge upon the country. And if this allegation is not shaken—if the augmentation is, as I should put it, £2,840,000; or, as the right hon. Gentleman would put it, £2,700,000—for I will not quarrel with him as to the difference—that is more than enough to make good my allegation that it is the increase of permanent charge which requires us to make good this new demand upon the country. And if that be so, I will not go further than to say that it will be our duty very carefully to consider whether this augmentation of permanent charge is really necessary; whether we can justify it in the face of the country; or whether it may not be our duty to make some effort for bringing the expenditure of the country—I mean the permanent and ordinary expenditure—within more moderate bounds. I raise no objection, Sir, to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

COLONEL SYKES said, that as the right hon. Gentleman had referred to his remarks the other night, he wished to say now, that if the Chairman of the Committee had not ruled him to be out of order, he was prepared to prove the statement he had made, that the Civil Service Estimates had been steadily and rapidly increasing. In the matter of salaries alone there was a net increase of £48,000. Other items were in proportion, and the result was, that the net increase in all the Departments amounted to £1,207,476. His right hon. Friend appeared to think that he had not deducted those sums which now appeared on both sides of the Estimates for the first time; but he begged to say that he was not in the habit of dealing so loosely with figures; and he found that the actual increase of permanent charge, after those deductions, amounted to £431,000. The contrast between the military and naval expenditure of the present and former financial years was not less striking. The Navy Estimates, as compared with those of two years ago, showed a net increase of £201,037, and those for the Army of £203,200. In the French Navy budget for 1868-9 there was an increase of £607,451; nevertheless, the total charge was only £6,529,510; while the charge for the British Navy was £11,177,290. The charge for the French Army was increased this year by £1,342,532; but the whole cost for 1,200,000 men, including reserves, was £15,267,782; and the British charge was £15,455,400 for 136,650 men and officers, exclusive of militia, reserves, &c. The same contrast is exhibited in the total expenditure of France for the year, which is £65,111,367; and that of England £69,600,218, besides £2,166,023 for the Abyssinian Expedition; in all £71,766,241. This increase in expenditure was going on, and he believed it would continue to go on, unless the House felt that it was dangerous to their popularity in the country, and Members attended to the duty which he was sorry to say so many of them now neglected, to guard the public purse. Year by year the taxation was increasing, and the rate of pauperism was keeping pace with it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated that the Abyssinian Expedition would be over and the troops recalled before May. He was afraid the right hon. Gentleman had not taken into account the fact that the south-western monsoon blew up the Red Sea from the month of May until September. Including steamers, there were now employed as transports 261 vessels. Did the right hon. Gentleman suppose that these could re-embark not only the soldiers of the Expedition but all the stores by the end of May? It had taken the troops three months to reach the district into which they had now advanced, and he expected that it would take them two months to march back again. Then there was the accumulated transport agency, including 8,000 mules and forty-five elephants carrying the guns. It was much more likely that the last of the Expedition would leave in August than in May; and he could not bring himself to believe that the "if" of the right hon. Gentleman rested upon any very substantial basis. The cost of transport alone, independent of coals, was £414,000 a month; and supposing that the Expedition lasted a twelvemonth the expense in this direction would be £4,968,000, an expense which the right hon. Gentleman might regard as almost certain; for he could scarcely expect that the duties of this service would be completed by that time. He thought, under the circumstances, that it was impossible for the Civil Service of the year to be performed for the Estimates laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. T. BARING: I hope the House will indulge me for a few minutes, in order to express my opinion on this question; and I think it the more my duty to do so, for unfortunately my opinions are in opposition to those who have already addressed the House, and certainly they are not in accordance with what is represented to be the general and popular feeling. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman is, that the whole charge for the

Abyssinian War shall be placed upon income and property. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has truly said that it requires no ingenuity, that the most obtuse Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it easy to come down to this House, and by the imposition of another penny or twopence meet every exigency that may arise. But, Sir, is that just to the country, and is it likely to contribute to the permanent prosperity of the country? The right hon. Gentleman says that he wishes to avoid any disturbance of trade. Well, Sir, but this argument will apply at any time; at any moment, in any event, we may be told that it would be unwise to disturb trade, and that, therefore, an addition to the Income Tax must be imposed. We see the practice growing; for the precedent is seductive to a Government that is guided by popular feeling, but from it I augur the greatest misfortunes to this country. The precedent will not be neglected in after times. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire thinks that the war will not come to an end so soon as the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposes. But if it is continued, shall we not have more expenditure, another want of money, another increase of direct taxation, under the plea that we must not disturb the trade and commerce of the country? Let me say that I doubt whether, if we were to impose indirect taxation, the disturbance to the trade of the country would be so great as the right hon. Gentleman assumes. If you were to propose an additional 5 per cent on the Customs duties, it would raise the sum of £1,500,000, and it would not involve that injury to trade which he imagines. There would be great complaints, no doubt; but if, on the other hand, you are to adopt systematically the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman; if the Income Tax is to meet every want which a popular Government may devise, you will soon be landed in an expenditure to which the present amount is a trifle. It would, indeed, be the greatest disgrace to the present generation, if they were to propose to meet the wants and necessities of this war, which, in my opinion, has been created by previous diplomatic errors, by throwing the burden upon posterity. Having got into the scrape, it would be dishonest in us to throw the taxation for it upon future generations. But what is the right hon. Gentleman about to do? He says, "I do not, however, merely propose to issue

£1,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds which we shall pay off at the end of the year." But has not the right hon. Gentleman heard of former Exchequer Bonds borrowed with the same intention, but which have never been met, and which are renewed from year to year? And will the right hon. Gentleman, who is now no doubt sincere in his belief, give us any guarantee that he will not renew these Bonds next year? The whole thing comes to this—Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have his task made easy for him by being allowed another turn at the Income Tax screw whenever he is in difficulties; or is every class in the country to be made to pay their share in this expensive war?

MR. AYTOUN said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to one particular point. The right hon. Gentleman was about to meet a portion of the expenditure by the issue of Exchequer Bonds, which, whenever it might be paid, was still to be borrowed in the same way as the permanent Debt. Now, the right hon. Gentleman was aware that last year a charge was made upon the Consolidated Fund, which, however it might be acquired, was simply the addition of an annuity towards the extinction of the National Debt. He alluded to the Act known as the Terminable Annuities Act, by which the debt due to the Savings Banks was supposed to be wiped off; but the only result of it was that an annuity was charged upon the Consolidated Fund, out of the proceeds of which there was paid every year the sums necessary to meet the demands of the Savings Banks, and the remainder went to extinguish Consols. Now, when the right hon. Gentleman asked for power to issue Exchequer Bonds while this annuity was to be met, this was really to proceed upon the plan condemned by every financier—the paying off debt with borrowed money. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would tell him whether, in his opinion, it was a sound principle to go on paying off debt when they had to borrow money for an expensive war; or, whether he did not think the necessities of the State did not require them for the present to suspend the operation of the Terminable Annuities Act?

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, he wished to complain of a grievance which arose from an Act passed during last Session; but, before doing so, desired to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the manner in which he had performed a duty which had devolved upon him under circumstances in some degree depressing. The grievance to which he alluded arose under the tax imposed upon sheep dogs, a tax which bore very heavily upon some of the poorer inhabitants of the county he represented (Perthshire). Several petitions had been presented against this tax, which, although a small matter to the House, was no inconsiderable matter to the persons who had to pay it. Two of these dogs were required by every shepherd, and, as they were of little use to him until they were eighteen months old, it would be seen that the tax was not a light one. It had been imposed for the first time at a period when the business in which these men were engaged was in a most depressed state. He had been a warm supporter of the tax on general grounds, and it had proved very successful; but in that success he saw a good reason why the slight remission he asked for should not be made. He suggested that shepherds might be relieved from the dog tax on producing, in each case, a certificate under the hand of a justice of the peace. To use the metaphor of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would pull up this fiscal weed, especially as it was one of his own planting.

Mr. HUBBARD said, he believed the criticisms to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement had been subjected were founded on erroneous views of the case. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire had spoken of the demand made for additional taxation as being occasioned not by the Abyssinian War, but by an exceptional and unnecessary increase of ordinary expenditure; but before the Government was condemned on account of this, it was necessary to inquire whether that increase of ordinary expenditure could have been avoided. Now, he had heard from all sides, without contradiction, that the late Government had left the defences of the country at an improperly low ebb, so that the present Government was under the necessity of raising the expenditure to correct the error of their predecessors. And if we had spent less during the past two years on the Army and Navy than we had by £3,000,000, should we have been in possession of that sum as a surplus? He apprehended not. A reduction in our expenditure would have entailed a reduction in our taxation. The Abyssinian demand would, in that case, have come upon the Committee in the shape of an unexpected and additional charge of £1,000,000 or £5,000,000, and extraordinary means would have been resorted to to meet it. His hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Baring) had advocated an addition of 6 per cent to the Customs duties on all articles, large or small, as a means of raising Revenue; but he entirely disapproved of such a suggestion. It would be an inconvenience to everybody, it would disturb our arrangements with every country with which we were at present engaged in trade, and it would go a great way towards disturbing that simplification of our Customs duties which it was so desirable to retain. With regard to the method of raising the Revenue which had been adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he regretted that the Income Tax was still left in a condition so discreditable to the sagacity of the governors of the country, and so ill-fitted for becoming a permanent means of Revenue. It was not yet a permanent means of Revenue—it had to be levied from year to year; but he hoped at no distant date attention would be directed to the subject, and that it would be fitted to become a permanent source of Revenue. He noticed that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had alluded to the operation of the Terminable Annuities scheme, which was at present absorbing an extra £1,000,000 of taxation; probably the reflections it gave rise to were not altogether palatable to them, for if they had followed the old-fashioned course of raising sufficient Revenue for the year and applying the surplus as it rose to the reduction of the National Debt, this extra £1,000,000 would have been available to meet the Abyssinian Expedition; the Chancellor of the Exchequer's £900,000 surplus would in that case have been £1,900,000, and have diminished to that extent the strain upon the Income Tax. Upon the whole, however, he was bound to say that, considering the circumstances of the times and the difficulties under which the Government took office, with the Abyssinian Expedition before them—not the result of their own management, be it remembered—the Chancellor of the Exchequer deserved the thanks of the Committee for the very satisfactory proposals he had made.

Mr. WHITE said, it would seem, from what fell from the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), that the power classes of this country did not pay their due share of taxation. But if he should have the honour to be returned to a Reformed Parliament, he hoped to have the opportunity of showing, by the appointment of a Select Committee on the Incidence of Taxation—hitherto refused him—that the amount paid by the poorer classes was larger in proportion than that paid by the rich. The shadow of a householder Parliament was already upon them, and any attempt to increase indirect taxation would have to meet with no ordinary opposition in that House. A very intelligent constituent, who was largely engaged in trade, had given him some figures showing how much the poor man paid the Government out of every 1s. he disbursed in articles of ordinary domestic consumption. If 1s. were laid out in tea, the average cost of which was 2s. 9d. per lb., 1½d. went to the Government as duty. Of coffee at 1s. 6d. a lb. the Government got 1½d. out of every 1s.; and taking sugar at 4½d. per lb., 3½d. in every 1s. accrued to the Government. On every 1s. spent on currants 3d., and on raisins 1½d. were exacted by the Government in Customs duties; and to summarize the figures, they proved that of the money expended by the humbler classes in sugar, 27½ per cent was paid to the Government in taxes; 15 per cent upon tea, 10 per cent upon coffee, 25 per cent upon currants, and 15 per cent upon raisins. In addition to this, the duties paid upon spirits and tobacco were absolutely enormous; but for obvious reasons no one objected to those articles being largely taxed. It must not be forgotten, further, that the retailer charged his profit upon the duties paid, which would make an additional 10 per cent exacted from the consumer. He regretted that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) had objected to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, that the increase of Income Tax was due, not to the Abyssinian war, but to an increase in the expenditure, because it was clear to his mind, as he told the House last November, that had the expenditure of the country not been unduly augmented, the necessity of any increase in the direct taxation would not have arisen. The duty of the Opposition in regard to this matter was clear. Though he had not spoken on this subject since the November sitting, he had conveyed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire his opinion of the duty of Opposition Leaders—namely, not to abdicate their functions, but to strive to curtail the present excessive public expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had not succeeded with all his teaching to educate his party in economy, although when in Opposition he spoke strongly against the “swollen and bloated armaments” of the country; and, therefore, if his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire had concluded with a Motion of Want of Confidence in the Government on the ground of excessive expenditure during the last two years, he should have felt bound to support such a Motion. During the last two years the whole tone of society had been in the direction of economy; but the Government, in contemptuous disregard of the condition of the country and of public opinion, had gone on unnecessarily increasing the public expenditure.

MR. GREENE said, he was of opinion that a very considerable saving might be effected in the national expenditure; but he did not believe that would be accomplished until political strife was laid aside and the financial affairs of the nation were considered in a calm and deliberate manner. He had never heard the question fairly brought before the House during the long period the Liberal party were in power. In fact, during their tenure of office, particularly during the time of Lord Palmerston's Government, the expenditure had increased several millions a year. Speaking as a man of business, he could see many ways of collecting the taxes at a less cost, and also how taxation might be increased and yet be less burdensome than now. A large saving might be effected on the cost of collecting the national Revenues. But so long as they were engaged in party conflicts they could never settle down to the far more important business of taxation. Under all the circumstances he thought that the mode in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought the Budget before them was highly satisfactory. The country had had two bad harvests—last year and the year preceding. There was at present a prospect of a good harvest; and if that should turn out to be the case, the price of corn would fall, and there would again be an increase in the consumption of articles of Excise.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was so clear and conclusive, in what he did say, that he only rose to give a few figures as to one part of the subject which he had passed over. For the first time for many years there was a deficit last year, which was succeeded by another and a heavier one this year. Last year, omitting the Abyssinian expenditure and the proceeds of the taxes raised to defray it, the Revenue was £69,223,000, and the Expenditure £69,236,000, leaving a deficit of £13,000, and this year, making the same omissions, the Revenue was estimated at £70,280,000, and the Expenditure at £70,428,000, the result being a deficit of £148,000. Besides these the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated the Expenses of the Expedition to Abyssinia at £5,000,000, and calculated that the 1*d.* additional Income Tax last year, and the 2*d.* this, would yield £4,350,000. The position of their finances, therefore, was that out of the balances in the Exchequer they were to pay £650,000 for Abyssinia, besides deficits on ordinary expenditure for the last two years of £13,000 and £148,500. During each of the three previous years there had been a considerable surplus. In the year 1864-5 the surplus was £3,851,000; in 1865-6 it was £1,897,000; and in 1866-7, £2,654,000. These were the last three years of the financial administration of the late Government, and they gave an average surplus of £2,800,000 a year. The two years of the administration of the present Government gave deficits of £13,000 and £148,500. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire had pointed out that these deficits were due to the enormous increase of the expenditure of the country. The policy of the late Government had been, to the best of their information, to estimate what would be necessary for the requirements of the year, and then to keep down the expenditure within the limits which had thus been fixed. The result of that policy was, that in 1864-5 the Estimate of expenditure upon which his right hon. Friend's Budget was based was £38,560,000 for Supply Services. The actual issues were £38,190,000; so that the issues were less than the original Estimate by £370,000. In the following year, in which there was a large Supplementary Estimate, the original Estimate was £37,899,000, and the issues were £37,797,000; showing that under the most difficult circumstances the Government expended during the year £92,000 less than the original Estimate. But what had been the state of affairs during the last two years in which the present Government had administered the finances of the country? In 1866-7 the original Estimate of expenditure was £38,165,000, and the issues of the year were £38,834,000; so that the issues exceeded the original Estimate by £669,000. The original Estimate for the year 1867-8, including the Vote for Abyssinia, was £42,234,000, and the issues were £42,771,000; the issues being £537,000 in excess of the original Estimate. What did these figures show? They showed that the policy of the late Government, of which, as deficient in economy, many complaints had been made, was to keep well within the original Estimate; while the practice of the present Government had been to spend very much more than their original Estimate. He desired to add that he was able from a careful analysis of figures strongly to corroborate the statement of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, that, after making every possible reduction, the permanent expenditure of the country was £2,700,000 more than it was two years ago. Upon the fortification question he had ventured to interrupt his right hon. Friend opposite, who, he was sorry, had not before him the figures bearing upon that subject; for he believed it had been the universal practice of Chancellors of the Exchequer during many years past, after stating the surplus or deficiency, not taking into account the fortification expenditure, afterwards to state the matter over again, including the fortification expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had adopted this course during the last three years successively, and he had been able nevertheless to shew a large surplus each year. And if his right hon. Friend opposite had that evening followed a similar course, and had repeated the figures, including the fortification expenses, the results which would then have become apparent would have made the House very sensible of the great change which had come over our finances. He hoped that the House, having now for many years left the discussion of the Estimates to small Committees of Supply, consisting of twenty, thirty, or forty Members, now that they were landed in an annual deficit of £100,000 or £200,000, instead of having a surplus of £2,800,000, would give some assistance to those who were anxious to keep down the expenditure.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: From some observations which have been made in the course of this debate, it would appear that the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Abyssinian Expedition has been a little misunderstood. My right hon. Friend gave his calculation as to the probable amount of expenditure, supposing the expedition were to terminate by the end of May. He said he took that expenditure at the rate of £600,000 a month for five months, beginning with January and ending with May; and he mentioned among the items of which this was made up, one of £400,000 for transport. Upon this my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) assuming that the expedition would not terminate in May, says, "You will have this item of £400,000 a month for transport running on," and he calculated what that would come to in a year. But it should be understood that the mode in which the Estimate had been made was this—we had received information from Bombay upon which that statement was founded; and at that particular time we had a very large fleet of transports plying between Bombay and the Red Sea, and which vessels were required at that moment. The cost of that transport was, as well as we could reckon it, £400,000 a month; but it never was believed that the cost of transport would be permanent at £400,000 a month. It happened that the vessels which had been taken up were now to a large extent discharged; and if we had to employ means to fetch away the men and what remained of the supplies, we could do it at a much smaller expenditure than £400,000 a month. But in order to make the matter more safe, we thought it desirable that the cost of transport should be estimated at the same for the five months; and we fully believed that the expenditure would be covered by the Vote which we proposed to take. The quantity of stores sent to Abyssinia has been extremely large, owing to the great uncertainty in which we stood as to the probable duration of the Expedition, and also as to what would be necessary with the prospect of the rainy season in view. But there is now in the country a supply that would suffice for the whole force till the month of November, so that no more supplies will be required. When the time comes for the return of the troops, we hope that means may be found for disposing of a considerable portion both of these supplies and of the baggage animals, especially the mules, upon favourable terms—among others, to the planters in the Mauritius, perhaps; so that it will not be necessary to employ anything like the amount of transport that was required to place the Expedition in the country. I believe we may say that the Estimate which has been taken is a very safe Estimate; and supposing, what we all hope, that the Expedition has terminated successfully in the early days of the present month, there is reason to believe with some confidence that the sum which has been taken will be found amply sufficient to cover the whole cost of the Expedition. I am very sorry that, in consequence of the interruption which has taken place in the Malta and Alexandria Cable, no later information has been received within the last few days. As far as our information extends, we have reason to hope that the whole object of the Expedition has before this time been attained.

MR. LIDDELL said, he did not dispute the success which had attended the operation of the new dog tax, but that it had been attained partly at the expense of a very deserving body of men. The tax fell heavy upon shepherds' dogs, a result which was in direct antagonism to the principles which had always guided the House in legislating for the rural population, that of exempting animals employed in operations of husbandry. Cart-horses were exempted from taxation upon that principle; and could anybody say that a shepherd's dog was not equally indispensable in the performance of daily avocations upon the large grazing farms in the North of England? He thought that the tax upon shepherds' dogs was an improper tax; and on the proper occasion he should do his best to induce the Government to deal with the matter.

MR. FAWCETT said, he thought a good case had been made out against taxing shepherds' dogs. He could not help thinking that the Financial Statement which they had heard was much more serious than they might at first suppose it to be. Put it as they liked, the fact was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to borrow £1,000,000. He, indeed, said that it was to be a temporary loan; but were the finances in such a condition that they could see that next year they would be in a better position than they now were to pay off this temporary loan?

The whole hope of the Budget was that the Abyssinian Expedition would terminate by the end of May; but nine out of ten of the best informed men believed that this would not be so. If the Expedition should not be at an end by the time supposed, then the finances would be in a worse position next year than they were now, because there would then be an expenditure for which they had made no provision. Under these circumstances he thought that they were not justified in making the loan. The £1,000,000 would virtually be spent as a sinking fund. He objected to this principle when temporary annuities were proposed for the purpose of reducing the National Debt, because the system had the vice of the old sinking fund, that when the finances were in an unsatisfactory state they would have to borrow or increase taxation in order to reduce the Debt. He was as strongly as any man in favour of reducing the National Debt; but there was only one way of doing it, and that was the straightforward plan of getting a surplus by economy, and applying it immediately to cancel a certain amount of debt, or by granting terminable annuities instead of permanent annuities. He feared that the effect of the speech of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would be a little marred by the vice of over-statement. The proposition which the right hon. Gentleman sought to prove was this, that the 2d. addition to the Income Tax was not caused by the Abyssinian Expedition, but by the increase of the ordinary expenditure; and this was not an absolutely correct statement. He would have greatly strengthened his proposition if he had said that the addition to the Income Tax was caused just as much by increased expenditure as by the Abyssinian Expedition. Increased expenditure was caused in two ways. The increase was due either to policy or to detail. No man was so much responsible for the policy of extravagant position as the late Lord Palmerston, who frightened England by the bugbear of foreign invasion. He deluded the country and induced it to enter upon a career of rivalry with foreign Powers, which were now ruining themselves by bloated and extravagant armaments. Europe was now so frightfully overarmed that her industry could not bear the burden, and the countries were being rapidly led to bankruptcy. The expenditure of our own country could be controlled by looking after details; and he thought that the most serious charge against the Government was that they had not been sufficiently careful as to the details of their expenditure. He did not say this in a spirit of party animosity, for those on his side of the House were not guiltless in the matter. Did Independent Members, when discussing Estimates, ever receive any assistance from the front Opposition Bench? Sometimes it was said that our large expenditure was not now of much consequence, because we had got rid of our worst taxes; but he did not admit this to be so. We had still some of the worst possible taxes, such as the taxes upon locomotion and the 1s. duty upon corn. He complained that they had been hurried into the Expedition to Abyssinia without the representatives of the country being consulted, involving them in pecuniary difficulties with India, and risk about which they knew nothing. He was bound to say that the speech of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary at the end of last Session with respect to this question had completely misled him. He had considered that there was no risk of their being involved in a war without the House of Commons having an opportunity to express an opinion respecting the policy of that war. The expense and risk were great, without a prospect of glory, and it would be still more expensive, only they had unjustly and ungenerously cast a portion of the expense of the Expedition upon the people of India, who had no more to do with it than the people of Canada or Australia. He would far sooner that this country should bear an additional burden than that the people of India should be called upon to pay £300,000 or £400,000 for such an object; or that this country should incur a suspicion of putting on a dependency a charge which they knew they dare not cast upon the people of any of their colonies. He hoped the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would change the policy with regard to their rivalling European Powers, and join the Independent Members in protesting against every item of expense that could be looked upon as unnecessary.

Mr. M'LAREN submitted that the tax on shepherds' dogs was levied from the wrong person. The shepherd must keep two dogs—one to scatter the sheep and send them to the hill; the other to bring them back. The shepherd paid a tax of 5s. a year for each of these dogs, and that was very nearly equal to the house tax, where a man with a rental of £20 a year paid 15s. a year tax. The poor shepherd lived in a poor cottage, with a small income, and the tax should not be laid upon him who was the mere herd of the farmer to do a certain work, but upon the farmer himself; and the shepherd should receive the wages formerly paid to him without a deduction of 10s. for this tax.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that a considerable portion of the deficit now to be provided for might be as fairly ascribed to the operations of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire in converting permanent into terminable annuities as to the other causes which had been assigned for it. The Budget of last year was a contemptible exhibition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day; and as we had it on the authority of an ancient writer that imitators were a very servile race, the Chancellor of that day only said ditto to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and who he must still call the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. With regard to the proposed increase of the Income Tax, that particular species of taxation, though it might not press heavily on the richer classes, fell with peculiar severity upon small annuitants and clerks who had to keep up a respectable appearance upon less than £200 a year, while the well-paid mechanic escaped its incidence. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had naturally adopted the rough and ready mode which came first to his hand for raising the money he required; but, for his own part, he must reserve to himself the liberty of renewing the proposal he had made last year for the relief of incomes under £200 per annum from an impost extremely onerous to their possessors.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS hoped that nothing should be done to disturb the arrangements of the financial scheme of last year for creating annuities that were to terminate in 1885. When they compared the price of our national funds with that of other parts of the world, they might feel well satisfied not to disturb existing arrangements for the reduction of the Debt, and which tended to place the credit of the country in that proud position. This year, besides the arrangements made for the payment of the annuities, they had laid out about £900,000 in the reduction of the National Debt; and he would suggest that when it was necessary to issue the Exchequer Bonds, for which credit would be taken in the Budget, it should be enacted that these Bonds should be paid off in preference to any other reduction of the Debt. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see fit to introduce a clause into his Bill for the purpose of carrying out such an arrangement.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to ask upon what day the Government propose to proceed with their financial measures? The business of the House next week will be of a rather absorbing character, as there will be the three Resolutions on the subject of the Irish Church to consider. I am of opinion that it will not be convenient to run the risk of interrupting the discussion on them. And perhaps the Government will be kind enough to tell us, whether Monday week or some similar day, will suit them for proceeding with their proposal relating to the Income Tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said: Sir, I do not know whether any other Member of the Committee desires to offer any observations upon the Financial Statement; but with regard to the Question just asked by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I may at once say that we desire to put the Resolutions, which are necessary to carry out the proposals of the Government, for Monday week. I cannot, Sir, but feel gratified by the manner in which the proposals which I have had the honour to submit to the Committee have been generally received. My hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Baring) has taken objection to our proposal to meet from the Income Tax the whole expenditure for the Abyssinian Expedition, and he said that that was a precedent which could be easily and frequently followed. He omitted, however to observe that I stated that we proposed to limit that charge to the Income Tax; on the ground that this was merely a temporary addition to our expenditure, and that, had we contemplated that this extraordinary expenditure would continue, we should have felt it our duty to propose an increase of duty on some article of general consumption. Therefore, the views which I put before the Committee certainly did not lead to the inference which my hon. Friend drew from them. Several hon. Members who have spoken have objected to the proposition to issue Exchequer Bonds, saying it is the creation of debt. I hold that the transaction is a perfectly legitimate one; because at the time we are issuing these Bonds we are actually providing, by the taxation of the year, the means of paying them off. The transaction appears to me much like that of a trader who, having goods in his possession the value of which he is not yet able to realize by sale, gives a bill for the amount in anticipation of it. An appeal has been made to me by the hon. Member for Perthshire with respect to the taxation of shepherds' dogs. I do not think that that is a matter between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the shepherds, but one between the shepherds and their employers. I admit that it is hard upon the shepherd to have to pay 5s. for his dog; but I do not admit that it is hard for the shepherd's employer to have to do so. When we reduced the tax upon dogs to 5s. we thought no exemption was necessary. If you admit the principle of exemption it will lead to evasion, and, in this case, the tax would be evaded by nearly every dog being described as a shepherd's dog. Employers will lose nothing in the long run by paying the tax upon their shepherds' dogs, seeing that their complaint has hitherto been of the number of stray dogs which worried their flocks and destroyed their lambs; and I am sure that if the tax is continued, and the sheep farmers pay the tax for as many dogs as are needed, they will find their account in their relief from the predatory cases of which they have complained. In reply to a question from the hon. Member for Brighton, I have to state that the amount of the duty upon foreign corn imported into this country during the past year was £869,324, which at 1s. per quarter would give 17,986,000 quarters—a very serious amount to import from abroad in one year. I omitted to mention in my statement that on the 18th of March 1869, £600,000 of Exchequer Bonds will fall due, which I propose to take power to renew. In answer to the question of the hon. Member for Pontefract with regard to fortifications, I have to state that the sum raised for fortifications during the past year was £180,000, as against £500,000 during the previous year, and £530,000 has been expended during the past year. The hon. Member for Pontefract took occasion to felicitate himself and the Government of which he was a Member upon the large surplus which they were enabled to present to the House at the end of the three years of their administration, and he proceeded to contrast that surplus

with the deficit which it is the unfortunate fate of the existing Government to have to present to the House on this occasion. I do not know whether the hon. Member thinks that the different positions of the two Governments in this respect is entirely owing to the prescience, sagacity, and good administration of those who preceded us in Office; but I think that those who are not inclined to be as partial as he is, will think that the rains and the sunshine of Heaven have had almost as much to do with the prosperity of which he boasts as the Government whose lines happily fell in such pleasant places. Impartial persons will also be willing to admit that it is no fault of the present Government that has occasioned the extraordinary monetary disarrangement that has lately caused such contraction of trade and of enterprizes of almost every kind, and which consequently places the finances of the country in a less favourable position than they previously were. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—whose absence from his place at the present moment I regret—made a very severe attack upon the present Administration on account of the extravagance of their Estimates over those of previous years. That attack must have been directed against the Estimates of last year, for the Estimates of the present year are only slightly in excess of those of last year. I believe the observations of the right hon. Gentleman were pointed principally against the Military and Naval Estimates. I must observe, in reply to these observations, that the Estimates of last year were assented to by the House, and were assented to by the right hon. Gentleman himself. If the right hon. Gentleman held so strong an opinion as to the extravagance of those Estimates and as to the policy which led us to recommend those Estimates to the House, he, as a Member of this House, and as the Leader of a party which professes to have a majority in this House, was bound, in discharge of his duty, to have urged the House not to assent to them, instead of permitting a year to pass before he brings forward his objections to them. As the right hon. Gentleman did not think fit to make any objection to those Estimates at the time they were brought forward, I regard him as being as much responsible for the expenditure which he now denounces as extravagant as any Member of the Government. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that, as long as he confines himself to making war upon profligate and unnecessary extravagances, he may always rely upon my support; but when he denounces what he characterizes as an unnecessary, a profligate, and an extravagant expenditure, I would remind him that there is an unwise parsimony as well as an unwise extravagance, and should the right hon. Gentleman think fit to renew his attack upon the Government upon this point, the question will arise, whether the Government of which he was so eminent a Member is not as much, if not more, responsible for this large expenditure as those who are now in Office? It is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should have made these observations in the absence of the Secretary for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty; because, in all probability, they would have put questions to him which he would have found it very difficult to answer, and would have shown the Committee that the expenditure of which the right hon. Gentleman now complains was fully justified. I have said that there is an unwise parsimony as well as an unwise extravagance; and if, by an unwise parsimony, charges which ought to be borne in one year which are thrown on another or succeeding years, the result is that the tax payer of the future is saddled with a burden which ought to be undertaken by those of the present generation. When the present Government came into office did they find our troops armed with the best description of weapons? What was the first act of the Government of Lord Derby which led to an increase in the expenditure? Was it not to replace the rifles of the Army by Snider breech-loaders? Was not the last Government responsible for not incurring that expenditure before? But I will go further, and ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was not a party to the construction of enormous fortifications for which not a single gun was provided? As the Minister chiefly responsible for the expenditure during Lord Palmerston's administration, he assented to the construction of these extensive fortifications, and how can he now object to the present Government providing guns for them? The administration of the Navy of course does not come within my province; but I can say that when we came into office the Navy was in such a state that we had the greatest difficulty to find reliefs for our ships. Who was responsible for that state of things, the Government of the right hon. Gentleman or the present Government? Either the whole system of our Navy administration was wrong, or else those who were in power had neglected to provide for that service that which it was their bounden duty to provide for it. I have not that detailed knowledge of this subject which would enable me to go further into it than I have already done; but if the right hon. Gentleman chooses to renew his attack upon the Administration of Lord Derby and upon the present Government on this point, it will be his duty to show that the Government of which he was a Member handed down the Navy to those who succeeded them in a fit state to protect the country, and left the Army, as regards ordnance and small weapons, in a state of efficiency. I propose to-night to move that the Chairman report Progress, and that on Monday week we take the Resolution I have laid before the House into consideration. If no objection is raised to my doing so I will move now that the Resolution to continue the duty of 6*d.* in the pound upon tea be considered now.

Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1868 until the 1st day of August 1869, on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland: viz.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS ORDERS IN COUNCIL BILL.—[Lords.]

[BILL 69.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in rising to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, said that the object of the Bill was to give validity to certain Orders in Council relative to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Since 1852 eighteen Orders in Council had been made, and those Orders had been submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, and had gone through the same process as the two which had recently been pronounced invalid by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Under those Orders great changes had been effected, sales of estates had been made, and the position of persons had been

tered; and it seemed to him to be only that Orders, which were not objected at the time of their being made should not now be challenged. If any persons had felt themselves aggrieved through those Orders, those Orders might have been appealed against at the time of their being issued. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had not stated the reasons which had induced them to consider the Orders recently before them as invalid, and as far as his knowledge went, he did not understand the objections were of that character as necessarily to lead to the impression that the Orders were in themselves improper or unreasonable. He had received a letter from the Dean and Chapter of Norwich urging on him to remove the dead lock which the decision of the Privy Council had created. One of the Orders before the Privy Council related to the Dean and Chapter. They stated that they were favourable to it, and that they were ready to submit to it, and that it would, in their opinion, tend to the benefit of the Chapter and the Church alike. It certainly appeared to him that there ought to be some legislation on the subject, because the position of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had become, to a certain extent, untenable, inasmuch as they could not properly define their position with regard to capitular bodies, or ascertain the course they ought to pursue. They were very desirous that legislation should take place; and he could certainly see no injustice in proposing, as was done in the Bill, that Orders in Council, issued under the Law, and with the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, should be considered valid.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. BENTINCK said, he had placed an amendment on the Paper, that the House should resolve itself into Committee that day six months, not with a view to defeating the Bill, but for the purpose of inviting a full discussion. The Orders in Council which the Bill proposed to render valid were nothing but Acts of Parliament passed without the Parliamentary discussion to which those Acts were entitled. At the least objection to the proposed legislation was that it would legalize all the abuses of the old system. In old times Deans and Chapters systematically neglected the trusts reposed in them, and, thinking only of themselves, put the whole of the money raised under the trusts into their own pockets. Now, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners wanted to give such powers to the Deans and Chapters as would enable them to restore that undesirable state of things; the Commissioners desired to grant certain lands to the Deans and Chapters without taking any guarantee that the proceeds would be rightly dispensed. The grammar schools of Carlisle were entirely dependent on voluntary contributions; whereas he contended that, in accordance with the trusts affecting them, they should be sustained by the funds taken by the Commissioners. Of course, the Commissioners would reply that their business was to attend only to places where spiritual destitution existed, and they could therefore only increase small livings; if that were so, it was the duty of Parliament to amend their powers in accordance with the suggestions of the several Commissions and Committees who had reported on the subject. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would modify his Bill in this light, and to enable him to do so he moved that the House go into Committee upon it this day six months.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Bentinck,)

—instead thereof.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that though his hon. Friend had had his Notice on the Paper for a considerable time, no real opposition could be offered to the measure. The object of legislation had been to put an end to the abuses of the system under which capitular property had been managed, and if he wanted a strong instance of the advantages to be gained by the extinction of those abuses, he would take the Chapter to which the hon. Member (Mr. Bentinck) had referred. In 1852 the Chapter of Carlisle had a revenue of £6,200 a year, derived from fines. The estates whence it was derived were, in that year, handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in 1865 the Chapter was re-endowed, and the Commissioners proceeded to consider the claims of the poor livings. Under the new system the members of the Chapter would in future receive an amount fully equal to their former income. In addition to this, a sum of £15,000 had been laid out in the restoration of the Cathedral, and a fund, which if capitalized would be equivalent to £35,000, would be applicable to the future sustentation of the fabric, while to the maintenance of parsonage houses, and the augmentation of livings, a capital sum of £150,000 would be applied. And all this without sixpence loss to the members of the Chapter or the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. His hon. Friend had altogether mistaken the nature of the Bill; it did not provide for any suppression of Canons. That was altogether an imaginary evil which had been conjured up. A legal and technical defect had been pointed out in two recent schemes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the sole object of the Bill was to remove doubts, and legalize what had been done in all the previous cases. There was no sort of concealment about the matter. Successive Law Officers of various shades of politics had been cognizant of all that had been done; inquiries had been repeatedly made by Committees and a Royal Commission; in fact, the proceedings were matters of notoriety throughout the kingdom. Hon. Members had heard that the Chapters and Westminster were anxious to come in; of the remaining six, Durham, Lincoln, St. Paul's, and Hereford were anxious to come in and participate in the benefits of the arrangement; and the only two outstanding and offering opposition to the measure were the Chapters of Ely and Lichfield. The principle of the Bill was perfectly clear, and its object was simply to enable the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to provide for the spiritual destitution of the poor parishes that were scattered throughout the kingdom. He hoped the House would give its consent to the measure.

MR. AYRTON said, he had listened attentively to the illustration which the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) had given of the devotion of Gentlemen opposite to the abuses of the Established Church; but he thought it inopportune upon an occasion like that to enter upon a consideration of the general question of Cathedral establishments, or of the proceedings generally of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Bill recited nothing more than that certain errors had been committed which it was expedient to rectify; and in adopting the measure the House was expressing no opinion upon the general question. The time would come when the House would have to consider whether it was just and moral that there should be hundreds of thousands—probably millions—of persons in the country with no more idea of Christianity than the natives of Abyssinia were said to possess, while millions of pounds were spent in assisting a kind of dramatic performance of religion at St. Paul's and other Cathedrals.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had rather overstated the case in supporting the Bill. It did not recite that errors had been committed; but that doubts had been raised in consequence of the objections which had been taken to the schemes relative to the Chapters of Westminster and Norwich, which it was desirable to set at rest. The fullest publicity had attended every step that was taken with respect to the Orders it was proposed to declare valid. The Bill by no means stated that an error had existed. All it did was to provide that, in case any errors had been committed in the exercise of the powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, no person should suffer, and that the acts of the Commissioners should be valid from the time they had been done.

MR. MONK said, he had no intention of throwing any obstacle in the way of the passing of the Bill. In fact his only objection to it was that it did not go far enough, as it did not include the two schemes relative to the Chapters of Norwich and Westminster. The Bill ought also to contain a clause regulating the transfer of the estates of the other six Chapters. They ought all to be put on the same footing. He confessed that he could see no reason to doubt that the Orders in Council had the same force as the Act itself. He thought that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, was clear on that point, and he should like to hear from the Law Officers the grounds of the decision at which the Judicial Committee had arrived.

MR. POWELL said, the Bill was of a very beneficent nature, and he should be sorry to see any obstacle thrown in the way of passing it. The opposition to it, more especially at that time, was very inopportune. The question, stripped of its technicalities, was substantially one between the wealthy Chapters and the great Cathedral churches on the one hand, and the churches of the working clergy on the other; and as the House had decided by a majority of 60 that the Irish Church was to be disestablished, it behoved those who had a regard for the Established Church in England to make her endowments available in the highest degree possible for the promotion of those objects which it was the office of a Church to promote. They all knew the self-denying labours of the parochial clergy; but when they came to the Cathedrals they found vast endowments and but little work. The annual income of the Cathedrals, apart from the sums received by the Bishops, was, some years ago, £300,000. It was not less than £200,000 at the present time. He did not believe that, without endowments, it was possible to maintain for centuries an extensive ecclesiastical system; but he also believed there was no Establishment, however well endowed, which might not find room for the voluntary system. The working clergy had found that they were much aided by voluntary efforts. He believed that no less benefit would flow from resort to the same source of help in the case of the Cathedrals. Where the Cathedral authorities had thrown themselves on the people there was a ready response. The Cathedrals then ceased to be—what they had so much become—mere monuments of the past, but were crowded by throngs of willing and grateful worshippers.

MR. BOUVÉRIE said, he presumed that neither the hon. Member for Whitehaven nor any other hon. Member meant to oppose the passing of the Bill, because justice to parties affected by Orders in Council required that it should become law. He rose, however, to ask his right hon. Friend (Mr. G. Hardy) a question of some importance—namely, whether, if the powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were not when sufficient they, should not be enlarged for the purpose of dealing with those Chapters which they had not yet dealt with? Anyone acquainted with the subject must know that nothing could be worse than the management of those ecclesiastical estates under the old system. It was for the interest of the Chapters and lessees, and public at large, that this worst possible management should in all cases be put an end to. As the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the large means in their hands, afforded an opportunity of getting rid of that mode of managing property, it would be most unwise of Parliament if it did not confer upon the Commissioners power to deal with such of the estates of the Chapters as were not now within their control. Perhaps that could not be done in the Bill before the House; but he hoped the Government would legislate on the subject in another Bill before the close of the present Session. Such a Bill need not consist of more than one clause.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would accede to the appeal which had been addressed to him by his right hon. Friend behind him.

MR. LEEMAN said, he would appeal to the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck), in the interest of those who were the purchasers of property from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners since 1852, when the first of the Orders in Council was passed, to withdraw his opposition. An immense mass of property had been sold under those Orders, not only in York but in other dioceses, and it would be unjust to the present owners if the Bill did not pass. He was also in favour of extending the powers of the Commission to the other Cathedrals.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was very anxious that the question to which the right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock had referred should be settled if possible. Parliament seemed to have practically laid down, by having accepted what had been done for many years past, the process which ought to be adopted. Therefore the simple question to be considered—and that was the only point on which he felt any difficulty—was the manner in which a measure on the subject should be drafted in order to make the matter perfectly clear. If such a Bill could be prepared, and he thought it could, he should certainly be most happy to bring it forward.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 (Orders in Council specified in the Schedule to be valid).

MR. BENTINCK said, that after the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary he should not move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. POWELL stated, that for the same reason he would not proceed with the Amendment which stood in his name.

Clause agreed to.

MR. MONK said, he wished to move an Amendment in the Schedule to the effect that the Bill should apply to the Orders relating to certain benefices reputed to be in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol as well as to the Orders referring to the estates of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the decision of the Privy Council did not throw any doubt on the validity of the Orders affecting the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. He might mention that, in accordance with the usual practice of the Privy Council in such cases, the grounds on which they held certain Orders to be bad had not been stated.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill "to amend in certain respects the Act for the better Government of India," and another Bill "to define the powers of the Governor General of India in Council at meetings for making Laws and Regulations, and to make better provision for making Laws and Regulations for certain parts of India, and for certain other purposes," said: I might have put these two subjects into a single amending Bill, but they were separated for this reason—the first of the two Bills is one of a limited character, but one which, if the House want to alter the position of the Council in India, it is important they should pass this Session; the second Bill contains provisions of a miscellaneous character, which possibly the House might desire to take more time in considering. It is necessary, with regard to the first Bill, that anything which this House may do should be done at once; because, it is certain that, in the course of this year, several Members of the present Council of India will resign their appointments, and, according to the present state of the law, their vacancies must be filled up by other gentlemen who will hold their offices, under the present Act, for life. If, therefore, as seems to be generally agreed, the tenure of the office of Councillor is to be limited, this opportunity of altering the constitution of the body ought not to be lost. The object of these Bills is to amend in several minute particulars the system under which we now administer the Government of India. It is not necessary on this occasion to enter into any elaborate discussion of the principles upon which our administration of India is founded. Still less shall I enter into any general question of the particular relation between this country and India. It is, indeed, a wonderful feat for a country constituted as England is to administer the affairs of so vast a territory as India, situated at such an enormous distance, and comprising so many populations so diverse from one another and from our own. It reflects honour upon this country that it should be able to conduct such an administration with the success which has, at all events, in recent times, upon the whole, attended our administration of India; and, if we look back upon the last ten years, during which we have been trying the experiment of the direct government of India through a Secretary of State in Council, responsible to Parliament, we may fairly say that experiment has been a very successful one, and that India has been fully as well Governed since 1858 as before, if not better. Certainly, in rising to propose some amendment in the present system, it is far from my intention to pass any reflection upon the working of the existing system of Government. The main principle that has guided Parliament in administering Indian affairs may be said to be this: that we have endeavoured to govern India by means of an Executive machinery in India, subject to a controlling machinery in England. And, although the distinction between the Executive machinery and the controlling machinery has not been always very strictly observed; still, upon the whole, that is the character of our administration. The Executive Government in India rests with the Governor General and the subordinate administrations. The control which was formerly divided between the East India Company and Parliament has, since 1858, been vested in Parliament itself; so that Parliament has become directly responsible for the administration of the affairs of India. The machinery by which Parliament has exercised this control is that of the Secretary of State in Council. The Council, as hon. Members are aware, consists of fifteen gentlemen, of whom the greater part have served for a certain length of time in India. Half of them are elected members and half nominated by the Crown, and they have certain powers conferred upon them. They hold their offices for life, and act as the advisers, and, to a certain extent, the controllers, of the Secretary of State, in whom is vested the control of the Executive Government of India. The experience of the working of this system is very favourable to the general principles upon which it is founded. I am now speaking more especially of the Council, and it is right to bear my testimony—and I am sure my predecessors would also bear theirs—to the very efficient and invaluable assistance which they have derived from the gentlemen who have acted as their Council. I believe that, in some quarters, among persons not very cognizant of the nature of the business of the Council, or of the mode in which they discharge their functions, an impression prevails that the Council are more or less of a useless, and even of an obstructive, character. One frequently sees taunts thrown out against them as being old and superannuated members of Indian services, who have no acquaintance with the wants of the present day, and stand in the way of all improvement and reform; but any one who has had practical experience of the mode in which the Council has worked would feel that this was not only ungenerous, but a very untrue account of the matter. The greater number of the members of Council devote a large part of their time to the discharge of the duties of their office; many of them work as hard as any clerks or secretaries I have ever known in any public office; and, combined with the amount of work they do as departmental officers, they afford most valuable assistance as advisers to the Secretary of State. In estimating the value of the Council hon. Gentlemen ought to bear in mind the peculiar position in which the Secretary of State, as a general rule, is placed in administering the affairs of India. One who has had no personal experience of India is placed in an anomalous and difficult position, at least if he have not the assistance of a Council, because removed almost entirely from the control of public opinion in this country, deprived of the advantage which his Colleagues who are administering other Departments of the State have of free discussion in Parliament upon every question that arises, he is called upon to superintend and control the proceedings of the Governors of an enormous Empire at the other side of the world, upon thousands of details, embracing every class of business. He is at once charged with military duties, with financial duties, with the duties of home administration, with foreign affairs, with judicial affairs, with the management of great railway and other public works; and the enormous mass of business which comes upon him is perfectly overwhelming. How is he to deal with all these questions, unless he has the advantage of taking counsel with persons possessing such a considerable amount of practical knowledge and holding such an independent position as to be competent to enter into discussion with him? I do not know whether those who speak of the great advantages of personal government mean the term to be applied to the controlling authority in this country; I am quite certain, if they do, they are using a term of the significance and effect of which they are hardly conscious. Anything like an attempt to regulate and control the affairs of India through the personal authority of the Secretary of State alone would be a most disastrous failure and would lead to serious consequences. It may be said, no doubt, that the Secretary of State, if he were not assisted by a Council, would, of course, have the advantage of having heads of Departments who would be possessed of a large amount of experience and would be compelled to give advice; but that would not be equivalent to the advice, assistance, and control of a body of Councillors properly selected and holding a proper position. One of the objections urged against the present system is that these Councillors are able to overrule the Secretary of State upon various points of importance—that, in fact, his responsibility is frittered away by the circumstance that he has not the power to act as he himself pleases, and that, therefore, when he is taken to task in this House for anything done or omitted, he may shelter himself by pleading that it is not he but the Council that is responsible. In the first place, that is not strictly true; at least, to a very great extent it is not true. Except in questions immediately connected with the expenditure of money, and except in questions relating to certain appointments—of which I shall speak presently—the Secretary of State has always the power of over-ruling his Council if he pleases, although no Secretary of State would unnecessarily exercise it. Still, he has the power, and whenever he thinks a sufficient case has arisen, he is bound to exercise it. Therefore, he certainly ought not as a rule to shelter himself under the plea that it is the Council and not he that is responsible. No doubt he has the power, which has been from time to time exercised, of over-ruling his Council, and as he has the power he must be responsible when he does not choose to do so. With regard to questions of expenditure, I was some time before I was able to make up my mind as to the right proposal to submit to the House, or, indeed, whether I should make any at all. It is undoubtedly the case that the Secretary of State has not the same power of over-ruling his Council with regard to the expenditure of money that he has in other matters, and that is a very important limitation upon his powers. It might happen, for instance, that the Governor General might send home a despatch to this country calling attention to the sanitary condition of some of the great towns in India; and he might point out that it was necessary, in his opinion, that certain measures should be undertaken to improve the condition of those towns. The Secretary of State might be perfectly convinced that the Governor General was right; he might propose the necessary expenditure to his Council; they might by a majority, perhaps a small one, refuse to sanction it; and in that case the Secretary of State would be powerless. Suppose after a time a great calamity happened, an epidemic broke out in consequence of the neglect of sanitary precautions, a number of lives were lost, and the Secretary of State were called upon in Parliament to answer for that neglect, all he would be able to say would be that he was over-ruled by his Council. That is an illustration of what might happen under the present system. Undoubtedly, the controlling power is vested in Parliament, and if Parliament chose to hold the Secretary of State responsible it would seem reasonable that he should have ample power to exercise his authority. After full consideration, I am satisfied we may still leave things as they stand at present. I own that my first impression was that it would be desirable to give the Secretary of State power, when any expenditure was recommended by the Governor General, to over-rule his Council if he thought proper, and bring the matter before Parliament for approval; but, upon further consideration, I believe it is better and safer to leave the matter as it now stands. I do not know that the imaginary case I have put has ever happened, and, looking to the spirit which animates the Council in India—and which I believe always will animate any Council in India, if you have a Secretary of State who is really competent for his office—I think it will scarcely ever happen that the Council will refuse expenditure which he takes the responsibility of urging upon them, telling them that he must hold them responsible for refusing it. If they do so, he has it in his power to bring the matter before Parliament in such a way as to raise a full and fair discussion, and if the Council were objecting to that which was absolutely necessary, I believe he would be able to overcome them. Therefore, I do not think it is necessary to introduce any change in the present system, which has in it very great advantages, including this, that it furnishes a check to any rash or ignorant action on the part of the Secretary of State. There are certain disadvantages; but, considering all things, I do not propose any alteration. With regard to the other point on which the Council have supreme authority—namely, the appointment of certain officers in India, the members of the Governor General's Council, and of the Councils of the Governors of the Presidencies, I feel differently. I think we ought to lay down as the first principle of our proceeding that the Executive in India should be as strong as possible, and that the control should be exercised, not in India, not by any vexatious hampering of the Governor General or the Governors, as the case may be, but by the deliberate action of the Secretary of State in this country. In former times, when India was at a great distance in point of time from this country, when it was impossible to send home for instructions, and when the Governors and the Governor General had enormous power, it was undoubtedly right to put some check upon them, and Councils in India were, no doubt, invented for that purpose. In the days of Warren Hastings such control was effectually exercised. The state of things now is so changed that the occasion for this sort of control seems to have ceased. On the other hand, the character of the business done in India has materially changed as India has become more civilized. It becomes more and more necessary that the Executive should be able to distribute its business among Departments, as is done in this country, ceasing to be a controlling power over the Governor General, and becoming more ministerial to discharge particular functions with authority. It is becoming important that the Governor General should have the support in his Council of men upon whom he can rely, and who will be of use to himself, he retaining his responsibility, he being the person responsible to the Secretary of State, and not they; and if that is so, it would seem natural that the Governor General should have the power of selecting his Councillors. Speaking from my own point of view, I should have been very glad to give the Governor General directly the power of nominating his own Councillors. It has, however, been pressed upon me by men whose opinions I am bound to respect that there may be cases in which this would lead to inconvenience. I therefore propose, instead of giving the power directly to the Governor General, to give it to the Secretary of State—that is to say, to provide that Her Majesty shall by Royal Warrant nominate these Councillors, and that power Her Majesty will, of course, exercise, under the advice of the Secretary of State, who, it is to be supposed, will be guided by the advice of the Governor General in regard to the selection of those gentlemen. I cannot but think that there may be a tendency, on the part of the Council of India, composed of men such as Indian Councillors always must be, to look upon such appointments in a different light from that in which as I conceive they ought to be regarded. That is to say, that, being for the most part old civil servants, they are tempted to look on the position of Councillor as one which the members of that service, if they are persons of average competence, and of a certain standing, ought in due course to attain, and that it is a case of injustice or unfairness to pass over a man standing high in the Civil Service and put one who is his junior into the Indian Council. It is, in fact, thought that after a certain period of service a man earns his appointment to the Council. That is a state of things which I do not deem satisfactory, and I wish to get rid of any danger of that kind, because nothing could be more injurious to the Government of India than to turn it into anything that could be called a "bureaucracy." But if you pursue a system under which the majority of the Councillors are appointed by rising to a certain position in the Civil Service, you do, in fact, create a "bureaucracy." I therefore propose that the power of nominating the members of the Governor General's Council, and those of the Councils of the Presidencies should be transferred virtually to the Secretary of State. The only other point in this Bill that I need mention relates to the control over the expenditure. It is this—There is in the present Act for the Government of India a section which provides for the appointment of an officer called the Auditor General, who has great power vested in him by that Act. He has to examine all the accounts, and see that nothing is done, and no expenditure ordered without proper sanction; and, to secure his independence, direction is given in the Act that he shall be appointed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is also to fix his salary, which he is to receive for life, or as long as he conducts himself properly. All that sounds very well, but in actual practice, whether intentionally or through inadvertence, I do not know, that clause has been made a mere farce. Because, although a very distinguished gentleman has been appointed as Auditor General, and a salary which cannot be taken from him, has been assigned to him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, yet that salary is only £300 a year; and, inasmuch as he is a very valuable officer, and performs some important departmental duties, an addition of £700 a year has been made to his income by the Secretary of State in Council, which is quite independent of what he enjoys by Royal Warrant, and might be taken from him to-morrow by a stroke of the pen of the Secretary of State in Council. To say that a gentleman with a fixed salary of £300, and a variable one of £700, depending on the pleasure of those whom he is appointed to control, is an independent officer, is what I call a mere farce; and I therefore propose that the Auditor General shall continue to receive the same salary as now—namely, £1,000 a year, but that it shall be given him by the Act, and at the same words will be inserted, providing that he shall not receive any other salary from the Secretary of State. Beyond this, we do not propose that there should be any material alteration in the principles on which the control over the expenditure is exercised; but I do think it would be desirable that this House should take somewhat more interest in observing what the expenditure is. I have introduced some changes in the form of the accounts which will render them rather more intelligible to the House. I have called on the Auditor General to make his Report in such a manner as will show whether there are any points which he thinks ought to be challenged, so that attention may be directed to them; and I hope the House will consent to refer the accounts with the Auditor General's Report upon them to the standing Committee of Public Accounts, which examines the audited accounts of Imperial expenditure. And if that Committee will undertake this duty, I should propose that when the Secretary of State brings forward what is called his Indian Budget, instead of asking the House to pass a Resolution affirming simply that certain facts have been laid before it, he should propose a Resolution to the effect that the House has seen the Report of the Committee of Public Accounts upon the Auditor General's statement, and approves the same. That would be a kind of voucher which would not impose any great responsibility on the House, but which would afford it more opportunity, if so disposed, of challenging any particular portion of the expenditure. I may mention a matter which has been, I admit very properly, the subject of some criticism in this House. I refer to the expenditure incurred last year for the ball to the Sultan. Under the old form of the accounts that expenditure would never have appeared in any account presented to this House; but I have ordered the accounts to be prepared in such a shape as that any item of that kind would be easily seen, and that the House might have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. I do not, however, think it would be desirable so to alter these things as to call upon the House in any way to vote the expenditure for India, because that would change in an inconvenient manner the relations between the Imperial Parliament and India in financial matters. I have described to the House the whole of the first Bill which I wish to bring in for the amendment of the Government of India Act. There is another Bill I propose to introduce, which is intended to define the powers of the Governor General of India in Council at meetings for making Laws and Regulations, and to make better provision for making Laws and Regulations for certain parts of India, and for certain other purposes. That is a measure of a somewhat miscellaneous character. There are three or four provisions in it which I will very briefly mention. The first of them does not make any change in the law, but affords greater facilities to the Governor General for over-ruling his Council. At present the Governor General has by law the power, by a very cumbrous process, of over-ruling his Council in matters in which he thinks the safety or the good government of India is concerned. That is to say, it is understood that if there is a difference of opinion between the Governor General and the members of his Council, they may exchange Minutes the one with the other, and after that exchange of Minutes has gone on for a certain time, and they have failed to convince one another, then the Governor General may over-rule his Council. Now I propose a simpler method of doing the same thing—namely, that on the first occasion their difference of opinion has become decided, and they know that they do disagree, the Governor General shall at once be able to over-rule his Council, giving, of course, to his Councillors the power of recording Minutes, with their reasons for dissenting from him, and providing for those Minutes being sent to the Secretary of State. Another point of a rather technical nature, and which it will, perhaps, be best to leave till the Bill is in print, relates to the definition of the power which the Governor General in his Legislative Council has to make laws for British subjects in other parts of India. Then comes another point of considerable importance. The House is aware generally of the distinction drawn between the Regulation and the non-Regulation provinces of India, and probably also that under the Indian Councils Act of 1861, the power which was formerly supposed to be vested in the Governor General of making laws or regulations with the force of law for the non-Regulation provinces, has now ceased to exist, and that, in fact, there is no means by which he can legislate for the Punjab, the Central Provinces, or any of the outlying parts of India which has not a Legislative Council of its own, except through the Legislative Council of India. Well, the Legislative Council of India is a body extremely well qualified, no doubt, to legislate for the settled parts of India; but it does not appear to be very well qualified to legislate for the wilder, ruder, and more distant portions of that country. In the first place, its composition is not such as would enable it very easily to legislate for certain remote parts of India; and, in the next place, the very fact, that anything which is proposed for the regulation of those provinces must form matter of debate in the Legislative Council is a serious evil; because in those wilder districts what is wanted is something more in the nature of despotic ordinances to meet promptly and at once some difficulty that has arisen; and if those ordinances are made the subject of discussion in such a fairly advanced Council as now usually sits at Calcutta, there is every probability that misunderstanding and misrepresentation may arise, and those very discussions may produce much mischief in the provinces in question. What I propose in this Bill is to give powers to the Lieutenant Governors of the Punjab and the other provinces where there are no legislatures, and also to the authorities in such parts of India as may be specified by the Secretary of State, to propose regulations to the Governors in Council to which they may give the force of law. That suggestion emanates from Mr. Maine, and is entirely approved by Sir John Lawrence. There is another point which relates to the very important question of the Government of Bengal. The House will bear in mind much that happened last year in consequence of the melancholy and disastrous famine in Orissa, and the inquiries that were made into the steps that were taken to avert and relieve that distress. The House will not have forgotten the result of those inquiries was far from satisfactory as to the picture of our administration of Orissa. It was a difficult matter to say upon whom the responsibility of that failure directly fell—whether on the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, on the officers under him, or on the Government of India. The peculiar relations that exist between the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal were undoubtedly seen to be very inconvenient and embarrassing. These circumstances have naturally caused a great deal of attention to be bestowed upon the question of the administration of Bengal early in the autumn, I drew the attention of my Council to the subject; and the most convenient mode of proceeding. I thought, was to appoint a Special Committee of the Council of India, and submit to them certain questions as to the administration of India generally, and especially as to the future organization of the administration of Bengal. That Committee devoted considerable time to the examination of the subject, and ultimately presented a Report, which was signed by four out of six members of Committee; the other two put in a dissent. The view the majority took was this—that Calcutta ought to be the capital of India, that it was essential that the Governor General and the Government of India should be permanently resident in Calcutta, and that if the Government resided in Calcutta it would be inexpedient and embarrassing to have a separate Government of Bengal in the same city with the Government of India. They held, therefore, that the Government of Bengal should continue, as at present, under a Lieutenant Governor, but strengthened by the addition of secretaries and other officers, and they proposed to take the city of Calcutta out of the administration of the Lieutenant Governor and place it under the direct administration of the Governor General of India. They also proposed that the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal should be a member of the Governor General's Council. Two Members of the Committee dissented from those recommendations, however, and advocated the erection of Bengal into a full Government, like Madras and Bombay. It happened that Mr. Maine was in this country, and he put in a very interesting memorandum on the subject. After these Papers were presented and I had considered them, I adopted the view of the minority—that it was more desirable that the Government of Bengal should be erected into a Presidency on the footing of Madras and Bombay. I also came to the conclusion that the majority of the Committee were wrong in thinking that it was necessary to confine the Governor General of India and his Council to Calcutta, and that it was rather desirable that they should be as far as possible detached from any local or special administration. It seemed to me unnecessary to lay down the principle that there should be but one capital of India, and that capital Calcutta. I thought that by detaching the Government of India from local administration, and setting it free to place itself wherever its presence was required, the question of the capital would soon settle itself. I caused a despatch to be prepared for the purpose of being sent to India, and submitted it to my Council; they came to a division on the subject, seven in favour and eight against my despatch; I had power by giving a double vote to have turned the scale, but I was under this difficulty—I had been in private communication with Sir John Lawrence, and I knew his own opinion was adverse to the change I wished to propose. He thought it would weaken the authority of the Governor General that a Governor of Bengal should be sitting by his side; and, knowing that to be the opinion of the Governor General, and that my Council were equally divided, I thought it was not a case in which it would be right for me to exercise my casting vote to direct that these steps should be taken. I thought it rather desirable that I should direct a letter to be written to the Government of India, stating the case, and asking them officially to state their views. Accordingly, I had such a despatch prepared and sent out to India. I did so with the intention of bringing the matter before Parliament, and giving this House full knowledge of what had taken place, and all the arguments used on both sides of the question. I am sorry that I have not yet got the official answers from India; but I have received privately Papers from Sir John Lawrence, and from the present Lieutenant Governor of Bengal; and what I propose to do is to lay before the House the various memoranda which have been put in, and the despatch and Papers I have sent out to India; so that the House may have before it all I have as the means for forming their opinion. But in the Bill all I propose to do is to insert a clause giving power to the Secretary of State, if he please, to erect Bengal into a Presidency, on the footing of Madras and Bombay, either with or without a Council. I do not think I need enter further into that part of the subject. There is only one other point included in the Bill which I must mention, and it is one of considerable importance and interest. I am sorry I do not see the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) in his place, who has given a Notice with reference to the subject—it relates to the admission of the Natives into the Civil Service of India. It was always felt by the old Court of Directors, by the Indian Council, by all the home authorities, and, indeed, by the Indian authorities also, that it was most desirable, as far as possible, to make provision for the employment of the Natives of India; but the difficulty has been in what way it could be accomplished. When the hon. Member for Brighton brings forward the Motion for which he has given notice—that competitive examinations should be held in India I shall feel it my duty to state the reasons why I cannot assent to that proposal. I do not think it would be at all suitable to the condition of India that the Civil Service should be thrown open to anybody who can pass the best competitive examination among the Natives of India; for, although I am a strong advocate for competitive examinations in this country, I do not think they apply to such a country as India, where you require, not the cleverest men, but various other qualifications which you are not so well able to test by competitive examinations. It was felt, however, that a great deal more might be done with respect to the admission of Natives. In the Uncovenanted Service there are a great many appointments that are of considerable value, and a Return has been presented to the House showing the number of appointments in the Uncovenanted Service held by Natives and Europeans; and it is not pleasant for me to say that the proportion is, I think, about six Europeans to one Native. The impression of myself and the Council is, that the Uncovenanted Service should be, as far as possible, a Native service, though no doubt certain appointments should be given to Englishmen. In explanation of the large proportion of Europeans in the Uncovenanted Service I may mention that appointments were given to many Europeans who rendered services during the Mutiny, and other appointments were given to the sons and relatives of old officers. Still, I feel that the Uncovenanted Service is a dangerous service for Europeans, as it affords a scope for jobbing, and we ought to confine it more to Natives than to Europeans. In addition to this, I think it desirable that we should provide some mode by which Natives should be admitted into the Covenanted Service; and I therefore propose to introduce into the Bill a clause to open, to a certain extent, a door for that purpose. At present there is an Act by which a certain number of choice appointments are reserved to members of the Covenanted Civil Service which can only be entered by competitive examination in this country; but there is also, by a section of that Act, power given to the authorities to appoint other persons, provided they have resided in India a certain number of years, and have passed certain language tests. This latter provision, however, not being thoroughly effective, I propose to introduce a clause declaring that nothing in that Act shall prevent the authorities from appointing any Native of India to any post in the Covenanted Service, subject to such regulations as may appear expedient to the Governor General, and as shall be approved by the Secretary for India and the majority of his Council. Such a provision will afford a safeguard against the powers being abused to the detriment of the Covenanted Civil Service. I propose, also, to define a Native of India as being a person born of parents habitually resident in India, and not of persons merely established there for a temporary purpose. I have now gone through all the main provisions of the two Bills, and if the House adopts them I think they may tend to improvements in the Government of India, though I am far from saying that they go to the root of the difficulties we have to deal with. We must consider that India is not one undivided whole; and that we have to deal with an enormous variety of people in every stage of development. It is desirable to provide, as far as possible, the means of fair play among the different parts of India, and to bring about a state of things, in accordance with which there would be more of local administration, subject, however, to the general control of the Government of India. With respect to the financial relations of one part of India to another, those are questions into which it is impossible for me at the present time to enter; but they have been raised in India, and are now undergoing consideration there. Mr. Massey has proposed a scheme by which local administration and objects may be promoted by the expenditure of local funds, raised on a system of local taxation. This is a matter difficult to manage, and we must be cautious, for it is better to be a year or two too long than to be precipitate in our proceedings. However, in the general principle of Mr. Massey's proposals I cordially concur; and I hope it will not be very long before something of the kind is carried into effect. We must take care that the solidity of Indian finance is not shaken, and we must provide safeguards against reckless expenditure. We have a system which has raised the credit of India to the highest pitch, and therefore I would be the last to disturb it, and would be slow and cautious in introducing any change. Nevertheless, I repeat that in the principle of Mr. Massey's suggestions I concur. With regard to the two Bills, the objects of which I have now explained, I propose to introduce them to-night, and to name three weeks or a month hence for the second reading, and I will move for the production of those Minutes and Papers to which I have adverted. Some of these Papers are of a character that it is not usual, perhaps, to produce, they being more or less of a confidential character; but there is nothing in them which it will be objectionable to publish, and it will be for the convenience of the House that they should be in the hands of Members.

Bill to amend in certain respects the Act for the better Government of India, ordered to be brought in by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir JAMES FERGUSON.

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

STATEMENT.

EARL RUSSELL said, that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) had requested last night that he (Earl Russell) would be prepared to state this evening the course he intended to take on the proposal of the Government to refer the Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill to a Select Committee. While he confessed he had great doubts on the subject, yet, on the understanding that the principle of the Bill was not to be departed from, and that the Committee would be only for the purpose of going carefully through the details, he should not oppose the Motion of the noble Earl. He would on another occasion state more particularly his views on the subject.

BANKRUPTCY ACTS REPEAL BILL.

(NO. 74.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that since the three Bills on the subject of bankruptcy (the Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill, the Bankruptcy Bill, and the Judgment Debtors Bill) were laid before their Lordships, and had been made public, he had received a number of communications which induced him to propose modifications in various details of those measures. A noble and learned Lord had also given notice of Amendments, some of which he deemed to be improvements on the Bill, while to others he was not able to give his assent. Under these circumstances, he thought that the most convenient course to pursue would be to go into Committee on the Bills pro forma, with the view of introducing the Amendments on the Report, and he would then propose to fix the Committee again on Monday week.

LORD CRANWORTH thought it very necessary that, in abolishing imprisonment for debt, great care should be taken that the measure should not be made a simple means to enable a debtor to hold any property he might acquire after bankruptcy.

LORD ROMILLY said, that one of these Bills effected a serious change in the whole system of the English Law. It was proposed to be enacted that a bankrupt should be deemed guilty of misdemeanour, and be liable to imprisonment for three years, with or without hard labour, at the discretion of the Judge, for certain acts, if those acts were done with a view to defraud creditors. The bankrupt was to be held guilty unless he proved to the satisfaction of a Judge and jury that he committed the acts, perfectly innocent in themselves, without intent to defraud. For instance, in Part XX., sec. 365, it was enacted, that if within four months next before adjudication the bankrupt removes any part of his property to the value of £10, he is guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to be imprisoned for three years, with or without hard labour, unless he shows to the satisfaction of the Court and jury that he did not do so with intent to defraud. Therefore the bankrupt, when prosecuted under this clause, may have his account with his banker produced, and be called upon to prove that any cheque drawn by him for four months before adjudication, which exceeded £10, was not drawn for a fraudulent purpose. What answer could the bankrupt give to vindicate himself from such a charge? If he proposed to explain the transaction he is stopped at once; the bankrupt would not be allowed to give his evidence on oath, and unsworn evidence would be held to be no evidence at all. Can he call witnesses and prepare his defence? By no means. For that purpose he must employ an attorney; but he would not have the means of employing an attorney or procuring the attendance of witnesses, as every penny would have been taken from him by the process of bankruptcy. If Parliament were to do this, they would either enact a clause which it would be impossible to enforce, or they would authorize an act of the greatest possible injustice. Such a provision, even if it should be passed by their Lordships, would never be assented to by the House of Commons; and there was, besides, a great number of other clauses of a similar character. Nothing was more remarkable than the difference of feeling of the mercantile creditor in the abstract and in the concrete; always ready to enact clauses of the utmost cruelty against debtors generally—always most merciful and kind to the individual debtor who had become insolvent. The great evil of such legislation was that its tendency was to promote a system of reckless credit, instead of endeavouring, as it should do, to discourage that system, which was the principal cause of wild speculation and ultimate ruin.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he concurred in every word which fell from his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) with regard to the after-acquired property of the bankrupt. He thought it was very necessary they should be careful, when they were abolishing imprisonment for debt, not to hold out our bankruptcy proceedings simply as a means for a person to get what was commonly called "whitewashed." But upon that point the present Bill proceeded farther than that of 1866, which made after-acquired property liable if the dividend had been less than 6s. 8d. in the pound; whereas it was now proposed to make such property liable, under the direction of the Court, no matter what the proportion of the dividend might have been. With regard to the subject introduced by his noble and learned Friend the Master of the Rolls, he could assure his noble and learned Friend that the principle upon which the clauses to which he had referred were framed involved no novel principle in our criminal jurisprudence. There were many cases already in existence where the onus of proof was made by the law to rest on the person charged, that the acts charged were not the result of any criminal conduct on his part. This matter was one which had been much considered by the mercantile community; and they concurred in the view that if a person in trade was found, for example, falsifying or destroying books or removing property at particular dates, having reference to the particular circumstances of those dates, the onus should be thrown upon him of showing that he acted without any criminal or improper intention towards his creditors, and the creditors should not be left under the obligation of proving that which they could not prove—namely, what was passing in the mind of the debtor. He agreed, however, with his noble and learned Friend, that it was worthy of the consideration of their

Lordships whether, if they thought it right to throw the burden of proof upon the debtor, his mouth should not be so far unsealed that he should be allowed to give his own statement of the transactions in which he had been engaged.

LORD ROMILLY said, he believed it impossible for a Bill of this magnitude to be passed through Parliament in the ten or three months remaining of the Session; and that it would be as well before it was proceeded with, to take the opinion of three or four well-qualified persons as to its provisions. When he had the honour of introducing the Innumerable Estates Court Bill for Ireland, he submitted his measure to a number of persons whom he knew to be hostile to it, and in that way objections were pointed out which would not otherwise have presented themselves; and he thought a similar benefit would be derived from a further discussion of this Bill out-of-doors.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR reminded his noble and learned Friend that the measure had gone fully through the very process which he advocated. A Bankruptcy Bill had been introduced and freely criticised before a Select Committee in 1866. In 1867 another Bill, profiting by that criticism, had been brought in, and had also undergone similar criticism; and the present Bill was the result of the experience derived from those two previous occasions. He had, he might add, that day had the pleasure of meeting a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool, who had stated to him that they highly approved of the Bill, while pointing out two or three particulars in which they desired that its provisions should be modified.

EARL GREY said, he altogether disapproved that principle of commercial morality which allowed men to launch into all sorts of speculations, and to pocket the money derived from them if they were successful, while, if they failed, only a small dividend was paid to their creditors. There ought, in his opinion, to be some modification of the old system of imprisonment, to meet the grave offences which were in those cases the result of imprudence as well as of fraud.

BANKRUPTCY ACTS REPEAL BILL [H.L.] (No. 74)—BANKRUPTCY BILL [H.L.] (No. 75)—JUDGMENT DEBTORS BILL [H.L.] (No. 76)—House in Committee (according to Order); Bills reported, without Amendment;

Amendments made; Bills re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 4th of May next; and to be printed as amended.

RIOTS IN LANCASHIRE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD asked the Government, If it be true that a large Number of Staffordshire Colliers have been forced to leave their Employment in the Coal-pits of Lancashire, in consequence of the Magistrates and Police Authorities of that county having declared their Inability to protect them from Violence and personal Injury?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he was sorry to have to state, in reply to his noble Friend, that it was true the force for protecting the persons to whom he alluded had been withdrawn, and that they had therefore been obliged to return to Staffordshire. The first intimation received by his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary of what had occurred came from a deputation of coal-owners, who called upon him yesterday morning and stated the facts. Immediate inquiry was made by the Home Office, and a Report was sent to Mr. Hardy by the Chief Constable of the place—to the effect that he had not sufficient force to maintain—what he had for some time maintained—the protection of those Staffordshire colliers; that the riotous conduct of the pitmen had extended, and that, therefore, his force not being sufficient, he had been obliged to withdraw his men from that part of Lancashire. The same statement was made by the Mayor; whereupon Mr. Hardy telegraphed, both to the Chief Constable and the Mayor, that he expected them to obtain more assistance and to maintain the law, as it was their duty to do. Mr. Hardy further applied to the Horse Guards for an increased military force; and he understood a troop of cavalry and about 300 infantry were by this time ready to maintain peace and order on the spot. Beyond that, the Government had no information. Mr. Hardy, he might add, also communicated with the Clerk of the Peace, stating that he expected the Magistrates to use their utmost exertions to do their duty with respect to these riots.

POST OFFICE—WEST INDIAN MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to invite competition for the conveyance of the West Indian Mails on the expiration of the present Contract?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that the Government had no intention of inviting competition for the conveyance of the West Indian Mails at the expiration of the present Contract. The West India Mail Steam Packet Company had represented to the Government that it would be impossible for them to make the outlay which was necessary for the adequate performance of the service after the disastrous results of the hurricanes which occurred in the West Indies last year, unless their term were extended beyond the two years during which the Contract was to run. This request was regarded as a reasonable one and was acceded to. The terms upon which the Contract would be recommended were still under consideration, but one condition would be that the Packet Station should be removed from St. Thomas to some other place in the West Indies.

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY.

QUESTIONS.

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, when directing the Governor General of India to appoint a Commission of Inquiry into the circumstances attending the failure of the Bank of Bombay, "with full powers to conduct the inquiry," his attention was given to the 6th and 7th paragraphs of a Minute by his Excellency the Governor of Bombay, dated the 15th of August, 1867, in which he declared that—

"No investigation by a Commission can be complete, unless that Commission has power to compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of papers, vouchers, and books, and to examine on oath;" and that—

"An Act of the (Bombay) Legislative Council might give these powers within the Presidency only; an Act of the Legislative Council of the Governor General would give the more extended power throughout India; but neither would enable the Commission to examine parties in England, where, perhaps, the most important evidence might have to be obtained, and without which the inquiry could not be said to be complete;" and, if so, whether he has taken any steps to empower the Commission, appointed in pursuance of his instructions, to examine or to procure the examination on oath of witnesses in England?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that his attention had, of course, been directed to the observations which had been made upon this subject by the Governor of Bombay, and he was also perfectly aware that the duties of a Commission of Inquiry could not be properly carried out without legislative powers. He very much doubted, however, whether it would be necessary to give compulsory powers with reference to the examination of witnesses in this country. He had recently received a telegram from the Viceroy of India, who stated that he proposed to introduce a Bill in the Legislative Council with a view to giving to the Commission more extended power throughout India. The Viceroy also requested that he (Sir Stafford Northcote) would nominate one member to serve on the Commission, and he had accordingly nominated Sir Charles Jackson. He had further telegraphed to India and requested to be furnished with the names of the members of the Commission, but he had not yet received an answer. Considering that the Commissioners would find all records and books in India, and that nearly all the witnesses were in that country, it would probably be unnecessary to confer upon them powers for the examination of witnesses in England.

MR. J. PEEL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Act of 1863, which is said to have led to the mismanagement and failure of the Bank of Bombay, was not submitted to and approved by the Secretary of State for India before it was passed by the Council of Bombay?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied that it had not been submitted to the Secretary of State before it passed the Council of Bombay; but after it had been passed by the Council and had received the sanction of the Governor General it was sent home. It then appeared to have been reviewed by the Secretary of State, who wrote to India to say that he saw no reason for disallowing the sanction which the Act had received at the hands of the Viceroy.

STRIKE OF COLLIERIES IN THE WIGAN DISTRICT.—QUESTION.

MAJOR ANSON said, in the absence of his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is any truth in the report that the Magistrates and Police Authorities of Lancashire had been unable in the Wigan district to protect workmen from assault, and that they have through violence and intimidation been forced to leave their employment; whether it is true that trains conveying these workmen have been attacked with stones and slag, to the bodily injury of the passengers; and, if these reports be true, whether he can explain the cause of the failure on the part of the Magistrates and Police Authorities of Lancashire to give that protection to workmen which every citizen has a right to expect in a free and well-ordered State?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, said, in reply, that he feared that it was true that the occurrences alluded to in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member had taken place, and that many workmen had been deterred by violence and intimidation from pursuing their employment. No special information had been received as to the acts of violence referred to, but it was not unlikely that the particular instance had occurred. He was unable to give satisfactory explanation of the reasons why better protection had not been afforded to those workmen and labourers; because it was only yesterday morning that it was learnt at the Home Office that the protection given to the colliers during the long strike had been discontinued. A deputation of colliery owners called upon the Secretary of State and complained that the protection afforded to the workmen had been withdrawn, and that not only were many of the workmen who had accepted the wages proposed by the masters compelled to return to their homes, but there appeared to be danger of the strike extending to other works. The Secretary of State telegraphed to the Chief Constable and to the Mayor of Wigan to know whether they had sufficient force at their command to protect the workmen in the discharge of their duties. The reply from both quarters being unsatisfactory, the Secretary of State immediately requested that detachments of troops should be sent to Wigan, and these troops were sent on in the course of the afternoon. By the direction of the Secretary of State he had written a letter to the Clerk of the Peace for the county of Lancashire, which was to be read at the Quarter Sessions, expressing a hope that the Magistrates would do all in their power to protect the workmen and preserve the public peace, and promising that whatever other assistance might be required should be given.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. MONK: Mr. Speaker—Sir, it will doubtless be in the recollection of the House that early in last year the hon. Member for Galway brought forward a Motion in reference to the disturbed state of Servia and of Crete, and in a very able and temperate speech called the attention of the House and of the Government to the unhappy condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte in the Island of Candia. I am deeply sensible of the disadvantages under which I lie in approaching a subject which has been so ably treated by my hon. Friend, and which has risen considerably in importance during the past twelvemonth. I can only throw myself upon the indulgence of the House, feeling sure that that indulgence will not be asked for in vain.

There is, however, one difficulty under which the hon. Member for Galway laboured last year from which I feel myself altogether relieved. I allude to the apprehension, which he then felt, lest any expressions of sympathy with a suffering Nationality uttered in this House should raise false hopes which might tend to prolong what was then considered by many to be a hopeless contest. For more than eighteen months the struggle for independence has been carried on in Crete, and unless the Great Powers intervene it seems likely to be indefinitely prolonged. In the meantime the non-combatants have for the most part left the island, and vast numbers of women and children have been removed, so that on the ground of humanity there is no longer any cause for further reticence on our part. During the past year subjects of great national importance have so fully occupied the time and attention of Parliament, that the affairs of Crete seem almost to have escaped our notice; yet from time to time the atrocities committed in that unfortunate island have furnished occasion for questions in this House, and in November last a voluminous blue book was issued by the Foreign Office on the subject, and presented by Her Majesty's command to Parliament. No one can, I am sure, rise from a perusal of that blue book without feeling convinced that the insurrection had assumed far larger proportions, and a much more formidable aspect, in the autumn of last year than it had at the time when the subject was discussed in the early part of 1867; and, judging from the latest accounts received from Constantinople and from Athens—let me add, from no Philhellenic sources—I see no probability of an early cessation of hostilities.

In the debate which ensued on the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, while claiming credit to the Government for its sympathy with the Christian races in the East, expressly declined to give a semblance of encouragement to a hopeless insurrection, or to compromise the Government or the Cretans by a precipitate or premature action. And shortly before the Easter Recess the noble Lord, in reply to the hon. Member for Louth, who inquired whether tranquillity might be considered to be now re-established in Crete, said—

"The true state of matters seemed to be that the insurrection had dwindled down to very small proportions ; but it would be premature to say that tranquillity had actually been re-established."

Now, Sir, notwithstanding that reply of the noble Lord, I shall venture to ask him, before I sit down, whether he deems the insurrection to be absolutely hopeless; and, if not, whether he does not think that the time has arrived when a more decided action on the part of Great Britain, in concert with the other protecting Powers, would be neither precipitate nor premature? For my own part, I believe that the Porte cannot re-conquer Crete. Such, too, appears to have been the opinion of our Ambassador at Constantinople so long ago as in February, 1867. That opinion was conveyed in a despatch to the Secretary of State, which by a singular coincidence reached the Foreign Office on the very day upon which the noble Lord stated his belief that the insurrection was a hopeless one, though perhaps at that time the despatch may not have reached his eye. Lord Lyons writes from Constantinople, February 6, 1867—

"I did not conceal from Aali Pasha that I was far from being as sanguine as he was with regard to the success of the Porte in restoring tranquillity in Crete and satisfying the Christian inhabitants by the measures he contemplated."—[Blue Book, p. 8.]

But I will quote a much later authority—perhaps almost as high an authority as Lord Lyons himself. The able and distinguished correspondent of The Times at Athens, who is known personally to some, by name and reputation to many, hon. Members, writing from Athens in January last, says—

"The pacification of Crete is not likely to be the work either of Turkey or of Greece. It must be brought about by the political influence of the Great Powers, and by the public opinion of Europe."—[Times, February 8, 1868.]

Again, on the 17th of March, he writes—

"Skirmishes frequently occur between the Musulman Greeks of the island and the insurgent Christians, but the Ottoman troops have generally remained inactive during the winter, and almost all the volunteers from Greece have returned, on account of the difficulty of procuring subsistence where war is carried on without depôts or discipline. There appears to be no immediate prospect of a termination of hostilities."—[Times, April 8, 1868.]

Once more, on the 25th ultimo—

"The affairs of Crete continue in the same position. Blockade running is kept up, and the emigration of Christian families continues. The proportion of men who emigrate is now considerable, judging from the numbers that are seen at Athens."—[Times, April 9, 1868.]

Mr. Monk

Let us, then, consider for a moment what has been done during the past year towards the re-conquest or pacification of Crete. Has Turkey been able to maintain the blockade of the island? Why, Sir, the Arcadi made no fewer than twenty-three blockade-running voyages before she was captured and destroyed. The Enosis has made a score of successful voyages; and her consort, the Crete, is running with the regularity of a mail steamer between Syra and Candia. In the Pall Mall Gazette of the 11th ultimo, I find the following, from Constantinople, written on the 29th of February:—

"The subjection of Crete appears to be as remote now as when the Grand Vizier went on his mission. Omer Pasha openly expresses his opinion that it is perfectly hopeless to expect any success against the insurgents as long as the blockade is carried on in its present manner. It is certainly astonishing that a force of upwards of thirty vessels of all classes cannot in some way intercept the single blockade-runner, which keeps up communication with the island with the regularity of a Mail Service."

The insurgents themselves, who, since the removal of the inhabitants of the lowlands and of their wives and families, are almost entirely confined to the Mountaineers and Volunteers—the latter being very few in number—ridicule the notion of surrender. They thoroughly distrust the Turks, and will not even hear of autonomy. Annexation to Greece alone will satisfy them. The House is aware that in January of last year the French Government strongly recommended the cession of Crete. Mr. Fane writes from Paris, on the 24th of January, 1867, that the Marquis de Moustier said that—"He had now come to the conclusion that it would be far better for the Porte to give up Candia than to seek to conciliate the Christian population by giving some form of local autonomy to the island. He believed that the country was lost to Turkey, and that it would be better for the Sultan to accept this conclusion than to grant concessions which would not permanently reconcile the population to Turkish rule, while they would form a precedent on which every part of the Turkish Empire might found a claim to quasi independence. Crete, his Excellency said, had become a permanently sore limb of the Empire, and it was better to amputate it than to allow it to form the nucleus of gangrene, which might spread to every part of the Empire. . . . He felt convinced that the course he had suggested was the wisest which the Sultan could adopt. He added that, if he were himself in the Sultan's position, he would not hesitate also to abandon Thessaly."—[Blue Book, p. 2.]

To that policy, Austria, Prussia, Italy, and Russia gave in their adhesion in the course of last year. But, writes the noble Lord, in reply to Mr. Fane, referring more particularly to a conversation he had held with the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne respecting the cession of Crete—

"Nor could I conceal from him my opinion that the Porte, having, as it believed, put down by force of arms the insurrection directed against its authority, would at once, and decidedly, refuse to sacrifice a province which it had re-conquered at the cost of so much blood and treasure."—[Blue Book, p. 3.]

I must confess that the words of the noble Lord somewhat surprised me. More than a year has elapsed, and what progress has been made towards the re-conquest of Candia? What, in short, has been the policy of the Porte? Declining to listen to the Great Continental Powers, who recommended a Mixed Commission of Inquiry for Candia, and rejecting with disdain the proposal of local autonomy, the Porte sent the Grand Vizier himself to Crete. The mission of Aali Pasha, as the House is aware, and as might have been expected, turned out a complete failure. In his celebrated Proclamation of November last what are the means which he proposes for the pacification of the island, and for redressing the wrongs and grievances of the Christian inhabitants? Does he propose any organic reforms? Any measures for the amelioration of the condition of the Christians? Nothing of the kind. The "Instructions for the Commanders of a Military Circle," which are appended to, and form part of, the Proclamation, commence with a statement that is palpably untrue. They then proceed to breathe forth destruction and utter extermination against all who still continue in arms against the authority of the Porte.

"The Candian insurrection" writes Aali Pasha, "no longer exists." Let the House bear in mind that these words were written at the end of October last—

"The Candian insurrection no longer exists. Those who are at this moment maintaining the disorder in the island, and are preventing a portion of the inhabitants from peaceably devoting themselves to their labours, consist of bands of foreign and native brigands, which it is necessary to destroy, whilst effectually protecting, by God's help and under the auspices of our august Sovereign, the citizens who have submitted against their destructive incursions."—[Blue Book, p. 303.]

Are these words of conciliation? Are they words of wisdom, or even of common prudence? Are they calculated to inspire the Cretans with confidence in their rulers? Is it too much to say of the Turks?—

"Quos Deus vult perdere, prius dementat."

It has, however, been alleged that certain of the Great Powers have been playing fast and loose with the Cretan question. It may be so. I neither affirm nor deny it. This seems to me to be neither the time nor the occasion for discussing the motives of the other Powers. But so far as Great Britain is concerned, I must do the noble Lord the justice to say that there has been no vacillation, no temporizing on his part. The policy of the Government of Great Britain has been the same in 1867 that it was in 1830—namely, to preserve Candia to the Turks, and to uphold by means of moral support the tottering sway of the Porte over an island, which is a source of weakness to it, and of real danger to its very existence. But I will not take up the time of the House by recurring to the wrongs inflicted upon this unhappy island, by means of foreign diplomacy, in preserving it to the Turks in 1830. That policy was commented upon at some length, and in terms of just severity, by the hon. Member for Galway in the discussion of last year. The memorable protests of Earl Russell and of Lord Palmerston in this House will never be forgotten—

"Let Candia remain in the hands of the Turks, and what probability was there that the Greeks in that island would remain patient under that yoke which their brethren had shaken off?"—[2 Hansard, xxii, 563.]

Truer words were never spoken in this House. The prophetic speech of Lord Palmerston has been fulfilled to the very letter. At the same time, I admit that it is impossible for statesmen to disconnect or dissociate the Cretan insurrection from the Eastern question. In all human probability the solution of that momentous question cannot be postponed for many years. The march of events is as rapid as it is sure. Great Britain alone of the Great Powers has endeavoured to stave it off by opposing the views of France and of Russia as to the settlement of the Cretan question. The Government may have been perfectly justified in opposing those views, and in refusing to offer any advice to the Porte, the adoption of which might possibly lead to the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire; but I venture to think that the Foreign Secretary is scarcely justified in withholding from Parliament the important State documents, written by Prince Gortchakoff, for which I am about to move. Those despatches contain the views of Russia, not only on the Cretan question, but on the condition of the Christians throughout Turkey, and a sketch of the measures which Russia deems necessary for the amelioration of their condition. I have privately given to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a list of those State Papers. The first has reference to the probable consequences of the Cretan insurrection; the next, to the necessity for immediate action on the part of Great Britain; the third to the condition of the Christians in Turkey; and the fourth contains the Russian view of the reforms necessary to ensure progress and tranquillity in Turkey. I am surprised that those documents should have been suffered to remain in the pigeon-holes of the Foreign Office at a time when a heterogeneous mass of Papers was being presented to Parliament on this subject. It is true that we have had Consular Reports from all parts of the Ottoman Empire on the condition of the Christian subjects of the Sultan. Some of them contain valuable information; but I regret to add that a perusal of them can leave no doubt in any impartial mind that—in the words I believe of Lord Lyons—

"The status of the Christians in the Empire is still very far from what it ought to be," and that the "administration of justice is not only faulty, but oppressive to Mussulmans and Christians alike."

In the debate of last year my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) expressed a desire to see a Consular Report from Crete, in order that he might ascertain whether the complaints of the Cretans were justified or not. With the permission of the House, I shall be happy to gratify my hon. Friend by reading an extract from the Report of Consul Dickson, and I trust that he will find it satisfactory and conclusive on that point. It is written from Canea, on the 4th of April, 1867—

"With reference to the subject under consideration—namely, how the stipulations agreed upon by the British Government and that of Turkey in regard to the treatment of the Christian subjects of the Sultan have been observed in Crete—it behoves me, in replying to this question, to recur to the state of the island anterior to the insurrection, which has since placed the whole land under exceptional circumstances as to its administration. I can, moreover, only offer such remarks on this head as my short experience of the island itself enables me to make.

"The very fact of Delegates having in the course of last spring been elected by the whole Christian population of the island, for the purpose of peaceably deliberating in general assembly upon the legal course for obtaining redress to certain grievances preferred against the Government (a practice somewhat similar to that adopted in ancient times under the denomination of 'syncretism'); the catastrophe that has since ensued by non-compliance in due time with the popular demands, or, at any rate, by the Porte withholding some suitable concessions at so critical a juncture; on the other hand, the allegation put forth by the authorities that the true source of such discontent must be rather attributed to the innate Hellenism with which the Cretan Christian population are imbued, fomented as this sentiment continually is by agencies at work on the adjacent land of Greece, besides the many political changes in a liberal sense which have of late years been wrought in Europe; all the above stated circumstances, I regret to add, only convince me the more that the treatment of the Sultan's Cretan Christian subjects has not been such as might be desired, or even in strict accordance with Treaty provisions. I shall not recapitulate the several grievances specified in the petition to the Sultan (of which a copy was forwarded in my despatch of the 9th of June last year), and which I consider to be in a great measure well founded, yet, as I distinctly declared to the Cretans at the time, by no means to such a degree as ought to provoke insurrection.

"I may briefly state that I ventured on several occasions to suggest to the authorities the expediency of the Hatti-Houmayoun of 1856 being fully carried into effect not only in Crete, but, as I took the liberty of observing, throughout all the Christian provinces of the Empire."

In the despatches of Prince Gortschakoff remedial measures are proposed. Those despatches have, I understand, been published in the Journal de St. Petersburg. I trust there is no bar on the plea of diplomatic etiquette to their production, as I believe them to be essential to Parliament and to the country in order to enable us to understand the true connection between the Cretan Insurrection and the policy of our Government and the interests of Great Britain.

In February of last year the Foreign Secretary, in tendering friendly advice to the Porte, utterly repudiated all idea of interfering with the right of the Porte to exercise an independent judgment in its internal affairs. I certainly do not blame the noble Lord for that expression of opinion; but I ask the House to mark the result. Aali Pasha and the Council of Ministers at Constantinople, relying upon the support of Great Britain, declined, as I have already stated, to send to Crete a Mixed Commission of Inquiry, upon which the Great Powers would be represented, and refused to grant the mild measure of local autonomy, which had received the sanction of the noble Lord himself. Mr. Elliott reported from Constantinople that Fud Pasha thought that autonomy would be attended by infinite difficulties, and that it would be only the first step towards annexation to Greece. Well, Sir, I believe that the Porte would have acted wisely if she could have prevailed upon herself voluntarily to cede Candia, as Great Britain ceded the Ionian Islands, to Greece. So late as in August last, I incline to think that a solution of the Cretan difficulties might have been found by the grant of local autonomy under a Christian governor. Now, I fear, it is too late. The impossibility of the Porte exceeds belief.

In it, then, to be wondered at that the five great Continental Powers should have presented an Identical Note last summer, protesting against the blind suicidal policy of the Porte? Is it surprising that, seeing the inability of Omer Pasha to restrain the recklessness of his soldiers, they should have sent vessels of war to take away the unarmed villagers of the lowlands, and especially the unfortunate women and children, out of the reach of their brutality? I honour them for so doing, and I blush to think that Great Britain alone stood aloof from that act of charity.

I would gladly have passed over in silence the Consular Reports of the murders, violations, and outrages committed during the past eighteen months upon the Christian inhabitants of the lowland villages, who had taken no part in the insurrection. But it is impossible to do so. The blue book literally teems with them. I am willing to make large, very large, deductions on account of the national antipathies of our Consular Agents, the Messieurs Calocherino. But enough, far more than enough, remains on the higher authority of our Consul, Mr. Dickson, and of Lieutenant Commander Murray of H. M. ship, the Wisard, to make one's blood run cold. I can scarcely bring myself to believe that Omer Pasha and his chief officers were present and took part in the burning of villages—in the destruction of churches—the cutting down of vineyards and oliveyards—the murder of unarmed and aged men, and the violation of women—but I maintain, and I am ready to prove by irrefragable testimony, that they took no steps and did not endeavour to prevent those crimes. Lieutenant Commander Murray writes to Vice Admiral Lord Clarence Paget from Cana, July, 22, 1867—

"The reign of terror which has long threatened, has become a fearful reality. Parties of Bashi-Bazouks, who have given up service with Omer Pasha (not finding it sufficiently remunerative), scour the country, and put to death any man, woman, or child they find."

The Acting-Governor, Server Effendi,

"Was obliged to confess that the Government is powerless to prevent these atrocities from taking place, nor do they care to prevent them, for the Turks now openly avow their intention of killing all the Cretan Christians."—[Blue Book, p. 238.]

Again he writes, August 4—

"In the towns of Candia, Retimo, and also in this town (Canea), there are organized fanatical bands who call themselves 'Zoreda' (weasels), who leave the towns at night and murder any Christians they can lay their hands on."—[Blue Book, p. 257.]

Consul Dickson writes to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, July 26, 1867—

"The brutalities lately committed on Christian women and children defy description."

And he proceeds to speak of

"The inability and apparent reluctance of the authorities to do justice, and thus prevent similar outrages being repeated."—[Blue Book, p. 231.]

The chief perpetrators of these atrocities appear to be Cretan Mussulmans, who joined the Turkish army as irregulars, or Bashi-Bazouks, on the first breaking out of the insurrection, and whose chief occupation from that time to the present has been to wreak their vengeance on the helpless, inoffensive lowland villagers and on their unhappy wives and families. But I will spare the House the pain of listening to the details of the outrages as related in this blue book. At the same time, I will take leave to remind the House that these atrocities are not merely isolated acts—they form part of an organized system not now for the first time practised by the Turks, and which the Porte is either powerless, or does not endeavour to repress. Some hon. Members may have read the interesting work on Greece written by the late Minister of Greece in this country, M. Tricoupi. Let me ask them to recall to their recollection the affecting chapter on Scio. The atrocities committed by the Turks upon the inhabitants of that unhappy island in 1822 defy description. For weeks the whole island was one continued scene of murder, conflagration, and plunder. The same atrocities have been committed in Candia, and the authorities have done nothing to prevent them. I feel strongly on this subject, Sir, and if I make use of strong terms, I can assure the House that it is not without cause. I have heard the heartrending details of the massacre of Scio from one who was residing in the island at the time, and whose father, father-in-law, and brother-in-law—having voluntarily entered the citadel as hostages of war—upon the distinct assurance that their lives and persons should be respected, and that not a hair of their heads should be injured—were brutally murdered in cold blood by the Turkish authorities. With such traditions as these, is it surprising that Turkish promises are regarded as valueless by the Cretans? Have their promises been kept hitherto? Why, Sir, it is notorious that the Hatti-Houmayoun has been a dead letter in Candia, and that there is protection neither for life nor property in the island. The Grand Visier's Proclamation was a mere string of empty words. It was thoroughly worthless—aye, worse than worthless; it was a positive insult to the oppressed. The insurrection, as might have been expected, broke out with fresh vigour almost before the six weeks' armistice had expired, and with much greater chance of success, since the women and children had been removed, and none remained save those who were determined to obtain their independence or to perish in the attempt. It does not require the spirit of prophecy to foretell that the efforts of the Porte to stamp out the insurrection by means of military circles must be futile and ineffectual in the mountainous districts. I think, then, that I am justified in asking the noble Lord whether he is not of opinion that the time has arrived when Great Britain might take a more decided action, in concert with the other protecting Powers, with a view of putting a stop to further bloodshed by advising the Porte either to grant such concessions to Crete as would make it a happy province, or to cede the island to Greece. Is England always to stand aloof while the other Great Powers are practically showing their sympathy with suffering and oppressed nationalities? It is unnecessary for me to remind the noble Lord that he has left open a door for England to recommend the Porte to abandon the contest, when success seems hopeless. He has stated that he would not oppose the cession of Candia, if the Porte were willing to agree to it. In a despatch to Lord Cowley, dated March 27, 1867, the noble Lord writes—

"Doubtless it would be competent to us, and it would be our duty, to advise the discontinuance of bloodshed, if it were clearly proved that the re-conquest of the island was impossible; but Her Majesty's Government had no information which could justify them in pronouncing that the cause of the Porte in Crete was hopeless, and unless they were convinced that it was so they must let matters take their course."—[Blue Book, p. 56.]

I trust that I have shown sufficient cause for more active interference on the part of the protecting Powers.

Mr. Monk

Before I conclude, I will ask the permission of the House to read a short extract from a letter of the Plenipotentiaries of the three protecting Powers to Prince Leopold, afterwards King of the Belgians, at the time when the Crown of Greece was offered to him—

"In case the Turkish authority should be exercised in a manner offensive to humanity"—in Candia or in Samos—"each of the allied Powers, without however entering into a special or formal engagement to that effect, would deem it its duty to interpose its influence with the Porte, in order to assure to the inhabitants of the above-mentioned islands protection against arbitrary and oppressive Acts."—[Annual Register, 1830. p. 304.]

In conclusion, I will express a hope that the noble Lord will, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, acknowledge the responsibilities of this country towards the unhappy Cretans, whose heroism and perseverance under the greatest trials and difficulties merit something more than mere sympathy from the Government and people of Great Britain. I trust that the noble Lord will grant the Papers for which I am about to move, and that he will afford Parliament and the country every facility for forming a deliberate opinion, not only on the Cretan difficulties, but on the Eastern question—which is even now looming in the distance—by laying upon the table of the House every document and State Paper which may aid us in forming a sound judgment upon this important subject.

Mr. GREGORY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of any Despatches or Correspondence between the Russian Government and the Foreign Office on the subjects of the Insurrection in Crete and of the condition of the Christians in Turkey in the years 1866 and 1867,"—(Mr. Monk;)—instead thereof.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID: Sir, although the Papers to which attention has been called appear to me to suggest considerations very different from those which have occurred to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), yet I should not on that account alone have asked permission to address the House. My principal reason for desiring to do so is, that at this moment—when hon. Members are invited, for the sake of humanity and of religious freedom, to express opinions in favour of the separation of Crete from Turkey, and its annexation to Greece—I am anxious that those to whom this invitation is directed should not shut their eyes to the light of experience; should not forget that other experiments, similar to that now recommended, have been tried under more favourable conditions, and have produced, with reference to humanity and to religious freedom, most lamentable results. That the House will forgive me for that anxiety, I am certain; because of those lamentable results thousands of men of my own race and creed have been among the first victims, and they, entertaining the exaggerated ideas which in some distant places prevail, as to the power and influence of a Member of this Assembly, have repeatedly applied to me, and, although I have done what I could, have, I regret to say, applied to me almost in vain, to aid them in their misfortunes.

But before I proceed to the subject to which I principally desire to direct attention, I may perhaps be permitted to make a few observations as to Crete itself. Now, in the first place, I would remark, that it is not fair to judge of the Turkish Government by acts of barbarity committed by its soldiers, not exceeding, probably, those of which the other side have been guilty during the insurrection. Wars have seldom been the best schools of humanity, nor is it to be expected that civil war, or above all, an insurrectionary war, should be a favourable exception to the rule. A more correct opinion will be formed of the Turkish Government by considering what it did at a period anterior to the insurrection, and whether it has or has not displayed a conciliatory disposition at those times in the autumns of 1866 and 1867, when it too sanguinely believed that the rebellion was on the eve of being put down. If, without travelling back forty years or more as has been done by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester, we recur to Consul General Longworth's Reports of 1858, which have lately been re-printed, we shall learn from that dated 20th of August of that year, that the Turkish Governor, Vely Pasha, made great exertions for the benefit of the island by encouraging trade, improving the harbour, and promoting the building of churches, schools and hospitals. I would especially call attention to the fact, as indicating an absence of anything like bigotry, that he gave money out of his own pocket for the erection of churches. If the aspirations of my hon. Friend and other Philhellenes should be fulfilled; if Crete should be separated from Turkey, and united to Greece, we shall, I apprehend, have to wait some considerable time before we see a Greek Governor take out of his own purse money for building a Mahomedan mosque. Among the measures adopted by Vely Pasha for improving the island, was the making of roads, and at first the Cretan Christians were enthusiastic for the accomplishment of his plans—

“But when it was seen that the roads could not be made without labour or pecuniary sacrifice, they turned round and opposed them, and there was no abuse too violent or fiction too absurd which they did not lavish on everybody connected with them. Under the Hatti-Houmayoum Turks were permitted to turn Christians, and—what did not please the Cretan Christians quite so much—Christians were allowed to turn Turks. These people, who are always talking of Turkish fanaticism, now sought to trample on it with a fiercer fanaticism of their own. Not content with fair proselytism, they resorted to the most scandalous means of making converts.”

Vely Pasha had intended to apply the whole of a sum of money received from Egypt for the benefit of the island in building a Greek church—

“But indignant at these excesses he now decided that the funds should be distributed among the schools and hospitals of all Christian sects indiscriminately. The Greeks were much incensed at this.”

It is thus made clear that the Christian Cretans were scarcely more fanatical against the Turks than they were against one another. Let us now pass on to those periods in the autumns of 1866 and 1867, when the Turkish Government thought that it was on the point of putting down the insurrection. In November 1866, the Turkish Government offered an amnesty. In the autumn of 1867 they offered a project of reforms, which the Cretan Christians, it is true, rejected, but which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), in his despatch of the 25th of October, characterized, and I believe correctly, as amounting very nearly to a concession of local autonomy, and as including the most important point—equal rights for Mussulmans and Christians. The Turkish Government also, without waiting for the acceptance of its offers, set free, as is distinctly stated by Consul Dickson on the 12th of October, all political prisoners without exception. Measures such as these surely indicate on the part of the Government much less of fierce tyranny than of anxiety to conciliate its discontented subjects.

But then it may be said, that the dislike entertained by the Cretan Christians for the Turkish Government suffices to show that it is a bad one, and that their happiness would be promoted by the annexation of the island to Greece. Now in the first place it should be borne in mind, that although the Christians form the majority of the population of Crete, there is an important minority of Mahomedans. But even if the Christians only be considered, it is not quite clear from their disliking the Turkish Government that it is a bad one, or that they would be the happier for being freed from it. To be convinced of this, we have only to look at the Ionian Islands. The majority of the Ionians preferred, or at all events they persuaded the Ministry and Parliament of England that they preferred, the bad government of Greece to the good government of England. We did not desire to retain unwilling subjects; their wish, or supposed wish, was complied with; and what has been the result? Examine the Consular Reports laid before Parliament last year; and you will see that in December 1865 the Deputy of Corfu, taking a temporary farewell of the Greek Assembly, declared that his presence among them was useless, and that he could not remain the impassive spectator of the ruin (égorgement, or throat-cutting, is his emphatic term) of the Seven Islands and of Corfu at their head. You will see that in September 1866 Consul General Saunders stated that the consciousness of all that Corfu has lost, by its subservience to clamour and intrigue, was too fully impressed upon all reflecting minds to admit of any other than one absorbing feeling of self-condemnation and unavailing regret. But further it may be argued, that even if mere discontent would not suffice to prove the badness of the Turkish rule in Crete, it is proved by the island having been for two years in a state of chronic rebellion. And this would, I apprehend, be true if the insurrection were (to use a phrase which is applied to better things) self-supporting. But no one can bestow any degree of attention on the Papers before us without perceiving that the rebellion would long ago have been at an end, if it had not been kept up from without. An almost constant succession of Greek cruizers has landed in Crete rebel volunteers, and arms, and provisions, and these proceedings have been sanctioned by Greece in open violation of her duties as a neutral. Nor has her interference stopped there. The return cargoes have consisted, not merely of women and children, not merely of the wounded, not merely even of Cretans who were tired of the contest; but peaceable Cretans, who desired to remain where they were, have been carried away against their will from their homes and their native island by their Greek deliverers. This striking fact is not only expressly stated by the Grand Vizier in his circular of the 14th of October 1867, but his statement is confirmed in advance by Consul Dickson, in his letter of the 3rd of the same month. If you desire to know what good Greece has effected, either for herself or her Cretan friends, you have only to look at Mr. Erskine's despatch of the 23rd of October 1867, from which you may learn that to support in a state of semi-starvation the Cretans who had been carried to Greece would absorb one-fourth of the ordinary revenue of the country, and that delegates had been sent to Athens by the Cretan Assembly to intimate to the Hellenic Government that the insurrection must cease, unless Greece would contribute to the prosecution of the war in Crete, and to the support of the Cretan refugees in Greece, sums exceeding half the ordinary revenue of the kingdom. The Government, it appears, despatched to Crete two or three persons of influence, to endeavour to make arrangements for the continuance of the insurrection, on terms somewhat less ruinous to Greece. Why all this was permitted by Turkey is obvious enough. The Papers show clearly, I think, not only that she would have put down the rebellion if she had had to deal with Crete alone; but that if she had had to deal with Crete and Greece alone, she would have declared war against the latter, and have put an end at once to the Cretan insurrection and the kingdom of Greece. But Turkey was aware that the protecting Powers were behind, and would not allow Greece to be attacked. This is very plainly stated by Mr. Lloyd, the Consul at Syra, in a despatch of the 3rd of February, 1867. Now, it might have been expected that, if the great Powers were resolved to guard Greece against what would otherwise have been the consequences of her shameless breaches of International Law, they would at least have insisted that those acts should be discontinued. But England is the only Power which has consistently remonstrated against the conduct of Greece. France, indeed, did the same at first, but towards the close of 1866 she entirely changed her line of conduct. Russia has, from the beginning, taken the course—in which she was afterwards supported by France, and, to a certain extent, by Prussia and Italy—of addressing lectures, not to Greece, the wrongdoer, but to Turkey, the party injured—of addressing to Turkey lectures and remonstrances amounting almost to a demand that she should reward her enemy by delivering up to Greece the government of Crete—a step which, considering the large number of Mahomedans in the island, it was impossible for Turkey to take without dishonour. How the Great Continental Powers justify, even to themselves, what they have done, I am at a loss to explain, except by supposing that they have adopted some maxim like the old one which teaches that no faith should be kept with heretics and infidels—some such maxim as this—that the rules of International Law are binding on a Mahomedan State, but that for the benefit of such a State those rules have neither vigour nor validity. Instead of wondering that, under these circumstances, Turkey has failed in putting down the Cretan insurrection, the wonder appears to me to be that she has succeeded in keeping it in check. Let us make the case our own. Let us imagine that Ireland, instead of having England interposed between it and the rest of Europe, had been as easy of access from the Continent as Crete is from Greece. Let us further suppose that, even during the last thirty-five years, when we have been at least endeavouring to improve the government of Ireland, one of the Catholic Powers of the Continent had been constantly sending cruizers to land there rebel volunteers, and arms and provisions, and to take back return cargoes, not only of women and children and wounded men, but of such peaceable and home-loving Irishmen as could be found and carried away against their will. Let us likewise assume that the other Catholic Powers had been in league to prevent us from defending ourselves by attacking our enemy; and then tell me what you think would have been, under such circumstances, our success in preventing a chronic insurrection in Ireland.

I now pass to that part of the subject which was my principal reason for desiring to address the House; and I ask hon. Members, before they sanction or favour the separation of semi-barbarous tribes from the Turkish Empire, to consider well what have been the results of those experiments of the same kind which have already been made. Let us turn to Servia and Roumania. From Servia I believe that the Mahomedans have been driven out; but I have fuller information respecting the condition of the Servian Jews. Under the Turkish rule they appear to have had no great cause of complaint; but the case has been entirely altered since Servia has been practically independent. In 1861 a law was passed, prohibiting Jews from settling in the interior of Servia, and from entering into any trades which they had not already carried on. Even the children of Jews already settled in the country were not allowed to pursue their fathers' trades. Notwithstanding repeated remonstrances from the English, French, and other Governments, continued from time to time up to last year, notwithstanding the favourable disposition of the ruling Prince, and the wishes of the Servian persants, who find that they are supplied with the ordinary articles of consumption by the Jews on better terms than by other traders, the influence of the mercantile class in Belgrade, and other places, who are jealous of Jewish competition, is, as is explained by Consul General Longworth in a despatch of the 10th of August, 1865, as well as in subsequent communications, so great, that this disgraceful law remains unrepealed. In Roumania the condition of things is more serious still. The persecution there affects a Jewish population which is estimated by their enemies at 500,000, and which really exceeds 300,000 souls. By the 46th Article of the Convention of the 19th of August, 1858, under which the present Rouman State exists, it was stipulated that all Roumans, of whatever faith, should be equal before the law, and admissible to all employments, though the political rights of such as were not Christians were left to the discretion of the Legislative Assembly. In 1866 when the Constitution was framed, a clause was introduced for conferring full equality on persons of all religions; but a tumult arose at Bucharest, a riotous mob pillaged the synagogue, and the Constitution was so altered as to exclude all but Christians from political rights. These occurrences appear to have suggested the idea, that a persecution of the Jews would be popular. In May, 1867, the Minister of the Interior, M. Ion Bratiano (formerly a Red Republican), issued to the prefects a circular, by which he attempted to revive, by his own authority, old laws which had been abrogated, forbidding Jews to dwell in the rural districts; and he directed that they should be expelled from farms and towns of which they were lessees or proprietors. He also ordered the police to treat the Jews as vagabonds without the formalities required by law. It deserves notice indeed, as a peculiar characteristic of this Rouman persecution, that men are first driven lawlessly from their homes, and then illegally punished as vagabonds. The circular was acted on with a barbarity quite in keeping with the document itself. Numbers of Jews were thrown into chains; some were imprisoned, others driven from the country. Telegrams were sent to my friend the Member for London (Baron Rothschild), Sir Moses Montefiore, and myself, and to the Alliance Israélite of Paris, and in consequence of the communications which we made, and of those which the English and French Governments received from their own agents, those Governments offered representations to Prince Charles and his Ministers, which procured some mitigation of the persecution I have described. In June the Court of Appeal of Jassy set aside as illegal the sentence by which three Jews had been condemned as vagabonds. But the circular has never been revoked, and the persecution has from time to time been renewed with the greatest persistency and determination. I will not dwell on the various deeds of oppression of which the Rouman Jews have been the victims; but I will ask permission shortly to mention them, taking first the outrages and acts of injustice committed by the populace and subordinate authorities, and then the intolerant laws and proceedings passed and adopted by the National Assembly and the Government. In June, 1867, more than 200 Jews were beaten and insulted at the very moment of Prince Charles entering Jassy. This is stated by Mr. St. Clair, the British Consul in that city, in his despatch of the 28th of June. In July ten Jews, who were alleged by the Rouman authorities to be vagabonds from Turkey, but who were believed by the Consuls to be natives of Roumania, were carried from Galatz across part of the Danube, and landed in a marshy island where one of them perished in the mud. The survivors were afterwards sent back by the Turkish authorities to Galatz; and in a struggle between the Turkish boatmen, who wished to land the unhappy Jews, and the Roumans who would not receive them, they were all thrown into the water and two were drowned. These facts, which are stated in despatches of July the 16th, from Consul Ward, and July the 20th, from Consul General Green, led to an energetic, but ineffectual protest by the Consuls General of Austria, France, England, Italy, Prussia, and Russia. In October 1867, a wholesale expulsion of Jews from the villages round Galatz took place by order of the Prefect. About the same time the Mayor of Jassy, imitating the Minister Bratiano, revived by his own authority, an old law which had been repealed, prohibiting Jews from keeping Christian servants; and M. Neuschatz, a respectable banker, was fined for disobedience to the Prefect's illegal order. In December, 1867, in consequence of the death of a child at Kalarasch, the mediæval assertion that the Jews used Christian blood in their religious ceremonies was renewed. The Jews of the town were ill-treated, and the synagogue was gutted by the mob. The Government ordered a Commission of Inquiry, the Report of which threw the whole blame of the disturbance on a medical man and a schoolmaster, who had excited the populace, and whom the Government stated to have been arrested; but these mischievous slanderers seem never to have received any punishment. In January 1868, the Jews were accused of having poisoned a monk who had died at Berlad, and were seriously ill-treated. No redress was afforded, and the Government attributed the mischief, not indeed to any guilt on the part of the Jews, but to their "overbearing behaviour." This is an improvement on the old fable of the wolf and the lamb. In February 1868, the Jews were expelled by the prefect from the district of Vaslin; a list has been sent to me of the names of between twenty and thirty of the families who were thus driven out. In March 1868, M. Lecca, the prefect of the district of Bacao, of whose hostility to the Jews the Government was well aware, expelled a large number. I have a list, which I am assured is incomplete, of the names of nearly 100 of the sufferers, specifying also the names of the communes, and of the owners of the estates from which they were banished. The misery of persons thus thrust out of their homes, at a season which, I am told, was as inclement in Roumania as it was here, may be imagined; and that misery was heightened by the system, which, as I have already noticed, seems to have been adopted throughout this Rouman persecution, of punishing as vagabonds those whom the Government had first driven from their dwellings. For all these acts of oppression on the part of the prefects, the Government must be considered as clearly responsible since they have not only retained in office officials whom, like M. Lecca, they know to be hostile, but have removed those who do not share their persecuting tendencies. This is distinctly stated by Consul Ward, in his despatch of the 16th of July, 1867.

I pass on to the proceedings emanating directly from the Rouman Ministry or the Chamber. In January, 1868, an order was issued by the Government prohibiting Jews from being contractors, or bidding at Government auctions. In February, a law was passed imposing on Jews, in common with the other inhabitants of the country, the obligation of military service, but disqualifying the former for any rank in the army. On the 24th of the same month, on a petition being presented from the village of Hangou, complaining of the conduct of some Jewish innkeepers at that place, the Chamber voted at once, and without even an inquiry into the truth of the complaint, a resolution requesting the Minister of the Interior to put into execution the laws (which by the way do not exist except in the imagination of the Chamber and of the Government) for the expulsion of the Jews from all the rural districts. In March, 1868, the President and thirty other Deputies, forming about one-fifth of the Chamber and belonging to the Ministerial party, presented a project of law which carries us back to the times of our own Henry III. and Edward I., and indeed exceeds, in its mixture of absurdity and cruelty, the barbarous statutes of that remote period. I cannot venture to occupy the time of the House by reading the Preamble, but I may perhaps be permitted to give a few specimens of its allegations. It states—among much other rhodomontade—that 500,000 Jews have invaded Roumania, and created a compact colony which has acquired a monstrous monopoly, and completely destroyed the commerce and retail trade of the native population; that the concentration of capital in their hands has created a monetary crisis; that the Jews have monopolized food and drinks; that the Roumans are forced to consume the food and drinks prepared by the Jews, while the Jews refuse with disdain those prepared by the Roumans; that the Jews of Spain, England, France and Austria, are neither Spaniards, Englishmen, Frenchmen nor Austrians, but only Jews; that the nationality of any people is obscured if it allows itself to be isolated by foreign and heterogeneous groups, and that when national union is thus menaced, the public liberties become mere chimeras; that the Rouman State is tolerant towards the free exercise of all forms of worship, but that it cannot shut its eyes to the morality of a religion of which it is the principal object to ruin the highest interests of the nation; and that the legislators of other countries have been equally with themselves obliged to put an end to the evils caused by the Jews.

The enacting part of the proposed law is worthy of the Preamble. The 1st Article prohibits the Jews from establishing themselves in town communes without permission from the Communal Council, and from settling even temporarily in the rural communes under any pretext whatever. The 2nd Article declares Jews disobeying the 1st to be vagabonds. The 3rd forbids Jews to hold any real property either in town or country, and declares that on any attempt being made to purchase or sell for them any such property, two-thirds of the price shall be forfeited to the local charitable institutions and the remaining third to the informer. The 4th imposes severe penalties for the infraction of the 3rd. The 5th prohibits the Jews from taking leases of lands, inns, mills, distilleries, vineyards, or stables for cattle, and from undertaking anything connected with the State, or any public establishment. The 6th forbids the authorities to entertain any demand emanating from a Jew relative to matters of business prohibited by the 5th. The 7th makes it unlawful for Jews to carry on any trade except by the especial permission of the authorities of the commune. The 8th renders illegal the sale by Jews to Christians of any food or drink; and the 9th suppresses all Jewish communities and committees in the different villages.

The object of those who proposed this outrageous law was of course to drive all Jews out of the country. On the proposal being made, the leading men of the Jewish community immediately telegraphed to their co-religionists in Paris, London, and elsewhere. In consequence of representations made to the Governments of France, England, Austria, and Prussia, those Governments, and also I believe that of Russia, remonstrated against the preposterous proposal, and it has not at present received the sanction of the Chamber. Brought forward, however, by the friends of Bratiano, it has been made to serve his purposes, by enabling him to assume the character of a protector of the Jews, whilst in fact oppressing them. He obtained the consent of the Chamber to the adjournment of the project of law by declaring that its provisions were too violent, but that he was quite aware of the great mischief done by the Jews, and would take effectual measures to put a stop to it. What those efficacious measures were to be, is plain from what has been done by the Prefect Lecca, and from the declarations which have been made by Bratiano to the leading Jews, that such was the state of public feeling, that he must act against their co-religionists and drive them out of the rural communes, or else the population would rise against him. Only this morning I have received a letter informing me that the national guard of Bacso had used the arms, with which they were provided for the defence of their country, in firing into the houses of the Jews.

Such, then, is the condition of Roumania. Compare its Government, or even that of Servia, with the Turkish Government in Crete, so long as the island was not stirred into insurrection by Greece, and who can doubt the superiority of the latter? But to suppose that the state of Crete, if separated from the Turkish Empire, will be similar to that of Roumania, would be to form a conjecture far too favourable. If the semi-civilized Roumans are practising cruel oppression against an unoffending and industrious population with whom they have no cause of quarrel, unless perhaps that the Jews successfully compete with them in trade—what conduct could be expected from the barbarous Christians of Crete, if they became the dominant class, towards the Mahomedans, whose religion has hitherto been that of the Government, and against whom their passions have been inflamed by an obstinate war? Is it not perfectly clear that the hapless Mussulmans would only have to choose between expulsion and destruction? In considering the condition of Turkey, Parliament should never lose sight of two short but most instructive sentences in Lord Lyon's despatch of the 6th of May, 1867—

"In short, very little progress has been made towards enabling the Christians to feel that the Ottoman Government is, as regards them, a national Government. They submit to it as a less evil than anarchy and confusion, and each Christian race appears to value it chiefly as a safeguard against what appears to be to each the great object of dread, the domination of any of the other Christian races in the Empire."

The appeals to sympathy on behalf of the Christian races which it is desired to free from Turkish rule, appear to me to be in part founded upon a vague idea that it must always be a right and religious thing to take up the cause of those who call themselves Christians, against Mahomedans. I am sure, however, that no such idea will be allowed to mislead this House. The expulsion of the Mussulman from Servia, the prohibition of the Jews from farming and trading in the interior of the same principality, the outrages practised on the large Jewish population of Roumania, the extermination of the Mahomedans in Crete, and in every other part of Turkey which may be separated from the Empire—these are the results of freeing semi-barbarous races from Turkish rule, the actual results of the process so far as it has gone, its probable results if it shall go further. And these consequences I venture to say that you will agree with me in declaring to be consistent neither with Christianity nor morality, with religion nor with right. It would be vain to hope for the immediate establishment in Turkey of what we should consider a satisfactory Government; but the best thing we can do is to continue to afford to the Turkish Empire the support of England, making it a condition of that support that the Porte should gradually, but with more energy than has hitherto been displayed, pursue the course upon which it has already entered, that of improving its rule, and developing the rights of its Christian subjects until they shall have attained perfect equality with the Mahomedans.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that the hon. Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) in his remarks had wandered over a large portion of Europe, but the question before the House was the state of Crete, not the condition of the Jews in Servia and the Principalities. He was surprised at the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member, knowing his antecedents and the philanthropic views which he usually advocated in that House. On the last occasion when this subject was brought under consideration, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) thought that any discussion would be premature, because there was at that time every reason to hope that the war was about to cease, and a discussion under such circumstances was likely to prejudice rather than promote the interests of those whom they desired to serve. When the question of Crete had formerly been raised he (Mr. Baillie Cochran) thought the discussion of it premature; but a year had elapsed since then, and he regretted to have to concur in the observations of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), that, if we might credit the reports of eye witnesses, there was little prospect of the war in Crete—he would not call it the insurrection—coming to a close. In one of his able despatches, written to Earl Cowley, April 13, in last year, his noble Friend (Lord Stanley) said he had had a conversation with the French Ambassador here, who represented the views of the French Government to be that Turkey should be induced to cede Crete to Greece. His noble Friend added, in effect, that in the event of the war continuing, or of the area of the war being enlarged, it would be a question for fair consideration whether that advice should not be given to Turkey. A long period had elapsed since then, and the war still continued. It was true that the well-known blockade-runner the Arkadi had been taken, but others which had taken its place were introducing ammunition and soldiers, and the war seemed as interminable as ever. Now, he concurred heartily in the policy of non-intervention as contrasted with what had been properly called the “meddling and muddling” policy advocated by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard), which had done the greatest harm. But we must consider what our relations with Greece were. Greece was a creation of this country. Along with France and Russia, we stood towards her in loco parentis, and we engaged to promote her interest to the extent of our ability. We showed this concern for her well-being when we advanced large sums of money to her and ceded to her the Ionian Islands. We stood, therefore, in a different position towards Greece from that in which we stood towards other countries, and it was a question how far we might not have the right to interfere for the promotion of her interests. Originally it was intended that Crete should become a part of Greece, and when Greece was offered to Prince Leopold he wrote a most interesting despatch to the Duke of Wellington, dated February 9, 1830, in which he pointed out the constant danger from Turkey that would exist if Crete did not belong to

Greece. This was one of the causes which induced Prince Leopold to refuse the throne. Then, in a protocol into which we had entered in 1830, the English Government, in conjunction with the Allied Powers, had expressed itself strongly as to the mode in which Crete should be governed by Turkey, and the propriety of affording to the people of that island a sufficient protection against arbitrary and oppressive acts. At that time Crete was almost independent. Only two or three fortresses remained in the hands of the Turks, and it was by the Act of the Three Powers that it was restored to the Turkish Empire, but the initiative was taken by England. We, therefore, had a right when we found what misery prevailed there to do our best, by advice to the Porte, in favour of the people of the country. The hon. Gentleman had cast doubts upon the treatment which the Cretans had received from the Turkish Government. But no one who had studied the Papers which had been presented to Parliament could doubt that there had been an entire violation of faith on the part of the Turks towards those unhappy people. The Hatti-Humayoun had never been fairly carried out. The Consular reports of 1858, though produced at the dictation of an Ambassador who distinctly intimated what he wished them to be, were, nevertheless, very damaging to the Turkish Government. In the East, whether we chose to interfere or not, our influence was paramount. The opinion of this country and of the House of Commons had the greatest possible weight there. He had been much struck by what M. Marc Girardin said upon this subject in the Revue des Deux Mondes, October, 1862. These were his words—

“What is the complaint? In 1840 there was a Turkey and a Turkish Government; in 1862 there remains nothing but England and an English Government. The East can no longer face decrepit, mouldering Turkey, but it has to encounter vigorous and powerful England. Greece, Egypt, Syria, the Lebanon, Servia, the Danubian provinces, no longer look to Constantinople, but to London. Turkey has found the secret of being even more formidable than she was in the 15th or 16th century, by being nothing of herself, and of being everything through England.”

We were supposed to have the credit of justifying and upholding the present state of things, but that was not the case, as would be seen by anyone who read his noble Friend's despatches. His only wish now was that we should go one step further than we had already done. He thought that even without joining in a collective note his noble Friend, by his own representations, might do much good. His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Layard) had himself said—

“Wherever the Osmanli has placed his foot he has bred fear and distrust. His visit has been one of oppression and rapine. The scarlet cap and the well-known garb of the Turkish irregular are the signals for a general panic. The women hide in the innermost recesses to save themselves from insult; the men slink into their houses and offer a vain protest against the seizure of their property.”

And Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, in 1858, wrote thus—

“Abuses continue to swarm in every department. The prohibition of bribery and corruption is merely on paper; no public example has yet been made of any public functionary accused of these offences. Some charges have been submitted to an inquiry leading to no result. Though mixed tribunals have been established partially, the judicial procedure is still defective and the course of justice impure. The new codes of law which are said to be in progress have yet to come into practice. Commissions have been formed for the amendment of prisons, and a better organization of the post office and police, but no improvement of consequence has hitherto resulted practically from their labours. The fiscal department is quite as irregular and defective as ever.”

The opinion of Sir Henry Bulwer would be found in a despatch dated April 24, 1860, and was as follows:—

“Wherever the Turk is sufficiently predominant to be implicitly obeyed, laziness, corruption, extravagance and penury mark his rule; and wherever he is too feeble to exert more than a doubtful and nominal authority, the system of government which prevails is that of the Arab robber and the lawless Highland chieftain.”

Where government was conducted in this manner, it was no wonder that the charges brought against it with respect to Crete should be believed. He warned hon. Gentlemen who wished to understand the condition of the Turkish Government not to be misled by statements as to the progress Turkey was making. We had entered into a solemn engagement with the kingdom of Greece, and to a certain extent with Crete, and we were justified in insisting as strongly as possible that the Turkish Government should become a Government of justice and equality. And now as to the mode in which the war was conducted. The hon. Gentleman who had introduced the subject had read different extracts to show the horrible atrocities that had been committed, and he did not understand how in the face of the Consular Reports they could possibly be denied. Mr. Consul General Dickson, in a despatch to Lord Stanley dated October 15, 1866, said—

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

“On the road at the village of Nero-kuru the murdered bodies of a Cretan Greek, his wife, and their son (a young child), and her brother have just been discovered, lying near to a Turkish farm. The woman was stripped naked, and the child's head severed from the body. The tezkerah, or pass, with which the party had been provided by the authorities to insure their free passage through this part of the country was found torn to pieces.”

Mr. Erskine, writing in November following, said—

“One gentleman describes the massacre of 200 persons, chiefly old men, women, and children; and the barbarities committed by the troops as beyond all belief. Another states that the Turks refused all quarter to the Christians, and mercilessly chopped off the heads of the unfortunate wounded, as well as dead; a reward of 100 lira having been offered for each head thus brought to the camp.”

It was perfectly extraordinary to contrast the improvement in Greece as compared with Turkey. Since 1821 the population of the Peloponnesus had increased from 398,000 to 600,000, and since 1831 the number of schools had increased from 101 to 1,310. Although the population of Greece, moreover, was but a twentieth part of that of Turkey, its shipping was greater and was increasing, while that of Turkey was declining. Its population had doubled in 38 years, while its revenue had increased from £178,000 to £1,000,000. Its exports and imports had doubled, and its mercantile marine consisted of several thousand vessels. While Greece was thus advancing, Turkey, as had been said, was dying for want of Turks. Of the 200,000 inhabitants of Candia not 20,000 were Turks; of 30,000 in Rhodes only 2,000 were Turks; of 35,000 in Scio, only 1,000; of 50,000 in Mitylene, only 5,000; of 60,000 in Samos, only 10,000; and of 10,000 in Patmos, only 20. In Albania two-thirds of the people were Greeks, and in Thessaly there were only 30,000 Turks to 170,000 Greeks. In Smyrna there were in 1830 80,000 Turks, whereas there were now but 40,000, while the Greeks had increased from 20,000 to 71,000. [Mr. LAYARD asked the authority for these figures.] He was quoting from statistics which had been collected, and he thought the hon. Gentleman would hardly dispute so notorious a fact as that the Turks were decreasing, there being in the whole Empire only 4,000,000 Mahomedans to 11,000,000 Christians. Now, he did not wish to hasten what he believed to be inevitable—namely, the fall of the Turkish Empire; but the best way of retarding that event was to secure justice for the Christian races, and he thought England would be justified in advising Turkey to consider whether, in view of the antagonism existing between the two races, it was not the wisest policy to cede Crete to Greece. He did not blame the noble Lord for declining to join in the Collective Note, but he would appeal to him whether the contingency hinted at in his own despatch had not arrived, and whether in justice and humanity we were not now bound to interfere.

MR. LAYARD said, he was of opinion that debates of this kind caused considerable mischief, by encouraging hopes which could not be fulfilled, and leading to results not desired by any Members of the House, but the present discussion might have a good effect if it elicited from the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) a declaration that the British Government were not prepared to join in the policy pursued by some European Powers in Turkey, and would take no part in the intrigues which were carried on in that country, and which had led to the unfortunate state of things in Crete. The noble Lord deserved great credit for his refusal to share in a policy dangerous to the peace of Europe and prejudicial to the interests of the Christians themselves, and he (Mr. Layard) had reason to believe that some of the Powers had already begun to regret the course they had pursued and to admit that the noble Lord's policy had been more just and statesmanlike. It would be idle to conceal that the Cretan insurrection was part of a system which for some years had been carried on in the East. There was one very powerful State whose policy it was to weaken the Turkish Empire, to render all reforms impossible, and to embitter the relations between the different races, so that the fall of the Empire might sooner or later occur. That Power was well known to be Russia, and Aali Pasha, in the able report on the insurrection in Crete which he had recently addressed to the Sultan, after mentioning the intrigues of Greece and two other causes to which it had been attributed, concluded by saying that there was a fourth, which, more than all others, influenced such things in the East, and which His Majesty would at once recognize by the simple allusion to it. There was no doubt that he referred to the policy of Russia, which was founded on the hypocritical pretence of resistance to oppression and corruption, the vindication of political and religious liberty, the support of na-tionalties, and respect for treaties. Now, in what country did there exist more oppression and corruption than in Russia—more outrages on political and religious liberty, more contempt for the rights of nationalities, and more shameless violation of treaties? In Poland and among the German population in the Western provinces, as it is well known, and not denied by the Russian Government, there was a systematic attempt to crush the sentiment of nationality and to compel the people to renounce their language and faith. This showed the unreasonableness and injustice of the remonstrances addressed by Russia to Turkey, in which she called upon us to join. It was, in fact, Russia which was bringing about the state of things in the East which had been described. Nobody would contend for a moment that Turkey was well governed, and he had himself witnessed instances of misgovernment and misconduct on the part of Turkish officials. The account of Turkish rule in some of the distant provinces of the Empire which he had written many years ago, and which had been quoted that evening, was perfectly true; but it must be remembered that great changes had since been made, and things which happened then could not happen now. Turkish Ministers would themselves admit that misgovernment still existed, and that it was difficult in so large an Empire to maintain a proper control over all their subordinates, who frequently violated or exceeded their orders. It was only fair that credit should be given to Turkey for what she had really accomplished. The agents for carrying out the policy of Russia in Turkey were Servia, Roumania, and Greece; Belgrade and Bucharest being the centres of the propagandism amongst the Bulgarian population, and Athens amongst the Greeks. The Bulgarians, however, were fairly well governed by Turkey; they enjoyed religious liberty, and they hoped to obtain more from Turkey by remaining obedient to her rule than by rising against her. They were, therefore, on the whole, not ill-affected to the Porte. As for Servia, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), and others who advocated her cause, declared some time ago that if Turkey satisfied Servia by giving up Belgrade and other fortresses, there would be an end to all differences between them. He (Mr. Layard) remarked, however, at the time that no such result could be expected, and, in fact, no sooner had Turkey yielded this point that the Servians renewed their intrigues, and demanded more than they had ever asked before. Armed bands from Servia crossed the Turkish frontier and pillaged not only Mahomedan but Christian villages; and so bad was the conduct of the Servian Government, that France and Austria, who had before supported that Government, were compelled to address very strong notes to it, and he believed he was correct in stating that the noble Lord, although he had declined to join with them in a collective remonstrance, had represented in the strongest terms to the Prince the want of good faith of which he had been guilty in countenancing those bands, and in pursuing a policy hostile to Turkey. Whenever the Turkish Government endeavoured to introduce reforms they were thwarted, for the promoters of the policy to which he referred did not wish to see Turkey well governed, and its population contented. He called in question the statistics of his hon. Friend opposite, and asked where they were obtained, but his hon. Friend did not appear able to state. He spoke, inadvertently no doubt, of the population of Turkey as being 15,000,000 or 16,000,000. It must be inferred that he meant Turkey in Europe only, because the population of the whole of Turkey was much larger. His hon. Friend seemed to forget that he must eliminate 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of Christians, including 4,000,000 of Roumanians, from the populations under the direct rule of the Sultan, which would leave about 10,000,000 for the number of the inhabitants of what might properly be called Turkey in Europe. There were, however, no accurate statistics on the subject. There were various high authorities who reckoned the Turks or Mahomedans of Europe at considerably above 5,000,000, and the Turks considered themselves as more numerous. It was a great and mischievous error to assume that all the Christians in Turkey were Greeks. His hon. Friend spoke of the population of Albania as consisting of one-third Turks and two-thirds Greeks; but a very large portion of the population of Albania was Greek neither in race nor religion; the Christians were for the most part Catholics, and of a different race altogether from the Greeks. [MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I said they were the Christian population.] The Christian population was divided into more than one sect, whilst the Mahomedans were homogeneous. As regarded the revolution in Crete, we knew full well that was brought about almost entirely by the agents of the Greek Government. No doubt the Cretans may have had causes of complaint. He was not in a position to state whether the Turks could have carried out the Hatti-Humnyoum; but still a great deal had been done, and certainly the island had not been ruined under Turkish rule. Among various mis-statements made by the Greeks was one that he saw the other day quoted by some one writing in The Times. It was to the effect that the island of Crete had been depopulated by the Turks; that before the Turkish conquest the population amounted to 800,000, and that it was owing to its occupation by the Turks that it had been reduced to its present number. What was the truth of the matter? According to Francesco Barozzi, quoted by Daru in the History of Venice (vol. 7. p. 130), the population of Crete in 1577, under the Venetian rule, amounted to 193,798. According to Pashly (Travels in Crete, vol. 2, p. 326), about the time of the Mahomedan conquest it had fallen to 80,000. In 1821 it had risen to 270,000; in 1834, owing to the Greek revolution, it had fallen to 129,000; before the last rebellion it had risen to 320,000. There was no doubt that Pashly was correct, for he gave the numbers for every village and district. This was a complete answer to the statement that the population of Crete had been destroyed by the Mahomedans during their occupation of the island. Exaggerations of this kind had been put forward to induce the British Government to support the policy of Russia and some other Powers in Crete. It was no wonder that these exaggerations should have made some impression upon Europe, seeing that, as was stated in Ali Pacha's report, there were no less than 117 journals in Greece propagating them throughout Europe, and that they were backed up by the Russian and the Greek Governments. His hon. Friend assumed that the stories of which they had heard, and which had been repeated that evening, of the atrocities committed by the Turks were true. For his part he believed them to be enormous exaggerations. They made, however, a strong impression upon the French Government, which was induced in consequence to allow its vessels to assist in removing a large number of refugees from the island. The French Admiral conveyed some of them from Crete to Greece, and his evidence on the subject cannot be called in question. According to a despatch from Mr. Ellis to Lord Stanley, of the 3rd of August, 1867 (p. 220)—

"During the voyage from Crete the (French) Admiral questioned through his interpreters the Cretans whom he had on board, and who were mostly women, as to whether they had ever witnessed any cruelty committed by the Turks. They all answered that they had not seen any act of cruelty committed; but that people had very often told them that such things had taken place, and that they believed in the truth of such statements. The reports from Russian sources are of so incredible a nature that I have never thought myself justified in reporting them to your Lordship."

In fact these stories of the atrocities committed by the Turks in Crete were like the stories of the mutilation of English women during the Indian mutiny. Although it was confidently asserted that many cases of mutilation had occurred, to this day not a single case had been verified. The conduct of some of our agents abroad in sending home these exaggerated statements could not be too much deprecated; but, if we employed Greeks as our Consular agents, we must expect that their natural sympathies would lead them to repeat and to exaggerate what they heard. He regretted to see that amongst our Consular agents in Crete there were two Greeks, whose sympathies were openly in favour of the insurgents. The Reports of one of these gentlemen were so enormously exaggerated that even Her Majesty's Consul, Mr. Dickson—who was no friend to the Turks—was compelled in one of his despatches to offer as an apology for him that he was ill in bed, and wrote under the influence of an excited imagination. Yet these Reports were laid before Parliament, and printed, and went out to Turkey and the world. If agents of foreign Powers in Ireland were to send to their Governments for publication such calumnious reports, we should complain, and probably demand that they should be called upon to prove their statements, and, in default, dismissed. He should be inclined to treat with great severity any British agent who sent home Reports of this nature, which he had not taken the trouble to investigate. He might refer to some evidence in favour of the Turks. Hon. Gentlemen might, perhaps, have seen the statements published in Florence by some Italian volunteers who went with the son of Garibaldi to join the Cretan insurrection. Young Garibaldi heard enough in Greece to deter him from proceeding further, but his companions went on. After some time they returned, and in the published account of their proceedings they said that one of their reasons for leaving the Cretans was the terrible cruelties committed by the Cretans on Mahomedan prisoners. Amongst other instances, the Turkish commander sent a Greek with a flag of truce to propose certain terms to the insurgents. They cut off his nose and ears and half his tongue, and sent him back in this horrible condition. He did not mention these matters with a view to excite any feeling against the Cretans; he simply referred to them to show what might be expected in times of civil war from semi-barbarous populations. The persons who were really responsible for them were those by whom the insurrection was instigated and encouraged. It was said that there was a great destruction of property, but that was one of the misfortunes which invariably attended war. It was, however, stated by Aali Pasha in his report that for the large sums owing to the Mahomedans by the Christians there was in Crete no security but the standing crops. The private debts in Crete, he states, amounted to 150,000,000 piastres, and two-thirds of those debts were owed by Christians to Mahomedans. Was it likely, he justly asks, that the creditors would destroy the only security they had for the re-payment of their money, or was it more probable, as was alleged, that the destruction of property was the work of the Christians themselves, who desired by this means to take revenge upon their antagonists? Some of the European Powers had been deceived by these exaggerated accounts; and what had been the result of the policy they had in consequence pursued? They had introduced into International Law precedents of a most dangerous description. No doctrine, perhaps, was more dangerous than that of sauvage—a word of new coinage, which means an alleged right of neutrals to approach the shores of a country in arms against the lawful Government, and to remove, on the ground of humanity, the wives and children of those engaged in the insurrection. Such a course might be most dangerous in its effects by prolonging a war. He would wish to know whether this was a doctrine of International Law universally recognized, or only applicable to Turkey? Would Russia have tolerated such a doctrine if we had on similar pretences removed the Cressian women and children, and so have left the men free and unfettered to continue their insurrection? Another most serious innovation on International Law was the new mode of blockade-running which had been practised by the Greeks, with the sanction of some of the European Powers. There were vessels used as blockade-runners, armed with six or eight guns, resisting all attempts to stop them, and firing into Turkish cruisers and slaughtering their crews; and the voyages of these vessels were not only justified by the Greek Government, as being made without any violation of International Law, but they were on several occasions actually escorted by Greek men-of-war. Would such a doctrine have been tolerated by Americans during their civil war? If that doctrine were admitted there was no meaning in the word neutrality. Were these things to be accepted as precedents, or were we to adopt one set of doctrines as applicable to Turkey and another to other European countries? He could not help saying that the conduct of the Greek Government was deserving of our strongest condemnation. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) appeared to contend that we were bound to support the Greeks, because we were to a great extent answerable for their existence as a kingdom, but if we were bound to protect them against other countries we were also bound to see that they fulfilled their obligations as a nation; and towards Turkey they had broken all these obligations, and done what no good neighbour ought to do to any State. On the other hand, Turkey had behaved towards Greece with the greatest moderation; for she might with justice have either declared war against Greece, or have taken a still more serious step, and have suspended her diplomatic relations with Greece, have sent out of Turkey the Greek Minister, expelled from her territories every Greek merchant and resident, and put an end to the whole of the coasting trade, from which Greece derived so much advantage. He would like to know on what grounds Greece had been supported in her flagitious attempt to annex Crete by some of the European powers. The Cretans themselves did not ask for annexation to Greece, and did not wish for it. They knew quite well that if they were so annexed they would merely become the spoil of a few persons in Athens. What they wished for was, perhaps, autonomy, or, failing that, to remain subject to the Turkish rule with proper security for good and equal government. The Turks, moreover, were not prepared to give up Crete, and it might fairly be asked if they were not, after all, the best judges of their own interests, and whether there was not something in the plea that they could not abandon an island containing so large a proportion of Mahomedans? It might or it might not be true that the Mahomedans would be expelled from Crete if Turkey gave up the island. Such a course would not be without precedent, for, in gaining her independence, Servia expelled the whole of the Mahomedan portion of the population. It was true that Servia engaged to compensate them for their loss of property; but, from that time to the present, not a single step had been taken to fulfil that engagement. The Turks might, with some show of reason, argue that the same result would follow in the case of Crete were the Christians to get the upper hand; and, considering the antagonism of race, he was by no means sure that there was not good ground for such a fear. The Constitution which was contained in the blue book laid before the House, and which the Turkish Government were prepared to concede to Crete, appeared to be almost everything that the Christian part of the Cretan population could desire. No country in the world, probably, was composed of a greater number of different races, professing a different creed, than the Turkish Empire, and the Turkish Government had to reconcile the antagonism of Mahomedans, Catholics, Greeks, Armenians, and Jews, and to administer equal justice to and to restrain men who cordially hated each other, and who were equally willing on the first opportunity to persecute the professors of other creeds. He had never supported the misdeeds of the Turkish Government, nor was he there to plead their cause; on the contrary, he had condemned them as strongly as any man. He only asked for justice for the Mahomedan population, comprising many millions of souls. We were bound to see that the Mahomedans were not sacrificed to the Christians, as well as that the Christians were not sacrificed to the Mahomedans—that all were treated with equal justice, and the rights of all equally respected. At the present moment this end could not, he believed, be effected by any Government so well as by the Turkish. In most parts of the Turkish Empire the people were not only divided into Mahomedans and Christians, but the Christians were again split up into various sects ; so that it would be most impolitic to put any one section politically above another. The safest way would be to leave matters as they stood at present, and to allow the various populations to work out their own destinies without foreign interference or intervention. Viewing the case in this way he thought the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had shown wisdom in the policy he had adopted.

LORD STANLEY : A great many topics have been touched upon in the course of this discussion, and I am afraid I shall not be able to do justice to them all ; but the House will expect a few words from me before the discussion closes. Now, first, with regard to the Motion which the hon. Member has made. He asks me to lay upon the table various Papers. I do not quite know what are those Papers of the Russian Government to which he refers ; but if I rightly interpret his Notice, I apprehend that he refers to certain despatches which were addressed by the Russian Government to their own officials, and confidentially communicated to the Foreign Office. Clearly these were not and could not be included in the published Papers, for this reason — they were not ours to give or withhold. If the Russian Government gave us permission to produce them we should be free to do so ; but, unless they gave us that permission, it would be a breach of courtesy, and to a certain extent a breach of faith, if we were to make public that which has been placed before us in confidence ; and I need not say that if we did that we should not receive many more communications of the kind. With regard to the other Papers which bear upon the general condition of the Christian races in Turkey, as affected by the events of the past few years, I thought it best to exclude them from the Cretan blue book, partly because they refer to a subject which, though no doubt connected to a considerable extent with this war, is yet separate and distinct ; and I thought that in the case of a publication which is already sufficiently voluminous, I should be rather confusing those who read it than throwing additional light upon the matter, if I were, following merely the order of date, to insert a very considerable number of Papers bearing only indirectly upon that particular subject. And I was partly influenced in excluding those Papers by the feeling that if they had been mutilated and published in the shape of extracts only, they might have given, in some case, an unfair impression as to the facts ; while, if they were published absolutely as they stood, they would include various comments upon the conduct of agents of other European Powers ; which it would not be a desirable thing to do. I do not say these objections are of an insuperable character. Many things may be published, when a crisis is over, which are not convenient to publish at the moment, and perhaps the hon. Member will be contented with my assurance that, in addition to the series of Cretan Papers which are printed, and which will appear in a few days, I will look through those which relate to the general condition of the Christian population, with a view to see whether there are any which can, without public inconvenience, be laid upon the table ; and, if so, I shall have no objection to produce them. Now, with reference to the general question of policy which has been raised. I have no need to state at length what the views of Her Majesty's Government are, because those views have been expressed and repeated in different forms in the course of the public Correspondence, and because I see no reason to depart from that course which we originally adopted. We have declined throughout to recommend to the Porte the separation of Crete from the Empire, and we have done that because we felt assured that advice of that kind would not be accepted by the Turkish Government, except under pressure which would almost amount to compulsion, and such pressure it would be totally inconsistent with our position and with our duty to employ. We were also influenced by the fact that we could not conceal from ourselves that there was a good deal of force in the argument continually made use of by Turkish statesmen, that where you have a revolution in one province, and that revolution is encouraged and supported to a great extent by foreign assistance and sympathy, if you are to interfere on behalf of that insurrection, and by your interference to give it the upper hand, and give the insurgents that which they desire, that is not a course which could lead to a permanent, or even to a temporary pacification of the Empire as a whole ; but the same means which produced insurrection in one part will be applied to another, and, either immediately or in the course of a very few months, you will have the insurrection which you pacified in one place breaking out somewhere else. I do not desire to erect that into a general principle ; but I do say that, in this particular instance, it will apply ; and I have no doubt whatever that, if, by pressure amounting to compulsion, we had, at the beginning of last year, induced the Turkish Government to consent to the separation of Crete from the Empire, we should at this moment have had to deal with a similar claim to independence in Epirus and Thessaly. If the Porte had proposed to cede Crete, no objection would have been made on our part ; but we thought that it was a matter for the Turkish Government, and not for us to decide. But I should also say that we have never ceased to do what was in our power to secure a good and impartial administration for the Christian population of Crete. With regard to the scheme of a mixed Commission of Inquiry to be carried on by foreign agents, I confess I never was very sanguine of it being likely practically to succeed. I did, on the part of the British Government, give a conditional assent to it, not much expecting that it would be put in practice, but rather as a preferable alternative to some other steps that were proposed. But I always stated to those who put forward that proposition that it was not easy to see how an International Commission, charged to inquire into the state of an island, was to carry on its inquiry while the war was going on. If, on the other hand, a cessation of hostilities were made a preliminary condition, the Commission would be a very effective intervention in the strife, because a large Turkish force would be maintained in the island, at great expense, doing nothing. Then, again, it seemed vain to hope that an inquiry of that kind could be carried on in a judicial spirit. You would be quite sure to have great differences of opinion, and probably the end of it would have been that separate Reports would have been made by each member of the Commission. Then there would have been the inconvenience of raising wild hopes and extravagant expectations in the minds of the population, and the sense of injury which would have been produced in the event of these hopes being disappointed. I never, therefore, thought that that Commission was likely to come into operation, unless it had been adopted by the Porte as a means of saving their honour, they having previously made up their minds to the cession of the island, and wishing for a pretext for doing so, without seeming to yield to the insurgents. But, although we did not support that proposal, we have never ceased to urge the adoption of the plan of a better local administration. I do not think that our exertions, and those of other Governments in that respects, have been altogether unsuccessful. A very elaborate scheme has been framed by the Grand Vizier ; and, though it is too early at present to say how that scheme, if fairly put into operation, will work, it seems to me, so far as I can judge from its construction, to be drawn up in a spirit of conciliation and of fairness ; and, if it is well administered—for I need not say that in the East much less depends upon a paper Constitution or law than upon the man who administers it—I think it will give satisfaction to all, except those whose object is the total separation of Crete from the Empire. The hon. Member who raised this question (Mr. Monk) referred to a statement I made last year, and asked me, whether I now consider, as I said then, that the Cretan struggle is hopeless ? Under certain conditions, I do consider it hopeless. I do consider it a hopeless struggle, unless a diversion were to be effected by a civil war upon a large scale in some other province of the Turkish Empire, or unless the insurgents were to receive the direct support of any foreign Power, which is not now an event that can be contemplated as probable. I have no doubt whatever that the insurrection has been protracted in the hope of one or other of these events occurring. We all know that this war has not been maintained by the resources of the island itself. It has been fed by supplies and stores of all kinds poured in from Greece ; and I am bound to say that it has received very great encouragement from the practice which in the origin was undoubtedly adopted out of a feeling of humanity, but which, nevertheless, has been unfortunate in its results and in the effect it has produced on the minds of those concerned—I mean the practice of conveying refugees from the island. This, which was begun from motives of humanity, kept alive a constant belief, which, of course, was propagated by the local leaders, that Europe was about to interfere, and that if they could only hold out a few weeks longer, their work would be done. It is very hard to say what amount of suffering has been inflicted on those unfortunate people by that mistaken belief. As to the appeal which was made to me, or rather to the British Government, to interfere with a view to stop the effusion

of blood, my answer is, that at present there is little effusion of blood going on. For a long time past we have not heard of anything but the most insignificant skirmishes going on. I cannot say exactly how the island is divided between the Imperial forces and the insurgents; but I take it that the Imperial forces occupy the low lying districts, and that the districts occupied by the insurgents are mostly those in which regular troops cannot act, or, at least, can only act with very great difficulty. In answer to the question as to the outrages which have been committed, I cannot deny that many such acts have been perpetrated. But I am afraid that outrages of this description will always take place during a civil war, and still more during a war which is both religious and civil, in a country which is only partially civilized. I utterly deny, however, that which was stated by one hon. Member, that a system of violence and outrage had been organized by the Turkish Government. So far as I am able to learn, it appears that many of the acts of violence which are said to have been committed by the regular troops have been inquired into by the authorities, with a view to the punishment of the perpetrators. But it must be borne in mind, in the first place, that most of the reports which reach this country from Crete, proceed from Greek sources, and are rather imaginative in their character; and next, that outrages have not been committed on one side only, and further that many of the worst acts have not been the work of soldiers, certainly not of regular soldiers, but of Cretan Mussulmans, inhabitants of the locality, who have been driven from their homes by the war, who are ruined and starving, and in whose case, therefore, religious fanaticism is combined with the strongest feeling of personal resentment. Given these elements in any part of the world, I am afraid that results must necessarily be looked for, which every man must regret to contemplate. My hon. Friend the Member for Houniton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) takes up the case of the insurgents upon a new ground. He says that the British Government stands to the Greek nation in loco parentis; that the Greeks want to possess Crete, and that therefore we ought to give it to them. Now, I cannot admit the force of this argument. I quite understand the feeling of those who lay stress upon the wishes, or what they believe to be the wishes, of the Cretan population itself, but I do not admit that the Greek nation have any locus standi in the matter. They, no doubt, would be glad to obtain extension of territory, and they are not the only Government or people in that position. But if it is said that they require it for the purpose of defence, or as a protection against Turkey, my answer is, that they have a far more effectual protection in a European guarantee. And that guarantee is not a name only, but a very decided reality, for if any person will look at the transactions of the last two years, he will see that—I will not say the Greek Government, but the Greek people, have been perfectly conscious of its existence and of its value. They cannot be attacked by Turkey, and there is no other Power likely to come into collision with them. With regard to the Greeks, as a race, I wish to speak of them with all possible respect. I believe they have fine and noble qualities, and that they have before them a brilliant future. But it must be said that, during the last forty years of peace which they have enjoyed, they have not been very successful in administration, or in making the most of the territory which they actually possess. I cannot help thinking that if they would only trust to themselves and to time; if they would only devote themselves to the improvement of their internal administration, they would be doing a great deal more—I will not merely say for their own happiness; but in the long run for the greatness of their country, than it is possible for them to do by these attempts to obtain further possessions by giving encouragement and support to insurrections. My hon. Friend the Member for Houniton has spoken in very high terms of the extent to which English influence prevails in the East. For my part I do not believe that that influence quite reaches the height stated by the French writer whom my hon. Friend has quoted, nor, for my part, am I desirous that it should do so. We have no desire for the possession of any exclusive influence in that region. But no doubt our influence is considerable, and for this reason—that when an English Minister gives advice at Constantinople, the Government and people there—so far as the people take an interest in political matters—know that it is given in a disinterested and impartial spirit—that we really believe what we say, and that we have no private object to promote. And if we desire to retain the influence which I believe we at present possess, we must continue to use it in the same spirit—that is to say, we must consider not only what will gratify our own feelings, or what will meet the popular wishes either here or throughout the rest of Europe; but we must fairly consider what we would do ourselves if we were in the position of the rulers of the Turkish Empire, and what would be most likely to contribute to its safety and independence. Our policy hitherto has been based not upon any preference for Christians over Turks or for Turks over Christians, but simply upon a respect for the obligations of International Law and upon a frank recognition of the duty of neutrality which we owe to a friendly State. With respect to the future, I must decline on the part of the Government to give any pledge, simply because it is impossible in the actual state of the world to foresee what future complications may arise, or what may be the advice that under the new circumstances with which we may have to deal it would be useful and safe for us to give. But certainly I do not think it my duty at present to press upon the Porte the cession of Crete; and I am convinced that if that advice were given it would be unavailing. I think it is a matter absolutely for them to decide, and I believe that more than one European Government which last year committed themselves hastily and prematurely to an opposite conclusion have since that time come round more or less to the view which we have taken of the case, practically dropping the policy which they had before avowed.

There is only one other subject to which I will advert, and that is the one which the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Francis Goldsmid) introduced—namely, the persecution—for it is nothing less—of the Jewish race which is carried on at present in the Principalities. I can assure the hon. Baronet that he cannot feel upon that subject more strongly than I do. I really think it is a question which concerns Christians even more than Jews, because if the suffering falls upon the Jew the disgrace falls upon the Christian. I know of no instance in our time of a series of oppressive acts which were committed so completely—I will not say merely without any provocation, but, so far as I can see, without any reasonable and intelligible motive whatever. In so far as those acts were connived at or encouraged either by the local officials, or, as I fear must have been the case in some instances, by the Roumanian Government itself, I can only explain that connivance or encouragement by the tendency of a weak and not very scrupulous Government to trade upon the worst popular passions. It is, however, but just to say that Prince Charles, the ruler of the country, has expressed himself very strongly upon the subject, and I believe that so far as his personal power and knowledge extend, he has done and will do what he can to prevent a repetition of these occurrences. But these things will not be lost sight of by the British Government, and perhaps I may mention that only this afternoon I have sent off another despatch in consequence of facts supplied to me by the hon. Baronet, containing a strong remonstrance. The French, the Austrian, and other European Governments are holding the same language, and I believe that the manifestations of public opinion which will thus be brought to bear from the whole of Europe will not be without effect.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would not admit that there had been any error in the concession of the fortress of Belgrade to the Government of Roumania, for it was quite useless to the Turkish Government, and was a source of great expense to them. He congratulated the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) upon his new-found moderation in treating the subject that evening. The hon. Member having on previous occasions been a strong partizan of the Palmerstonian doctrine of maintaining the integrity of the Porte—in the full acceptance of the phrase. No doubt hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal Benches believed they saw responsibilities looming before them, and wished to separate themselves from opinions that might no longer be convenient or advantageous.

CASE OF SIR T. J. METCALFE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MAJOR ANSON said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the case of Sir Theophilus John Metcalfe, C.B., as set forth in his Petition of the 24th day of February, and printed in the Appendix to the Fifth Report on Public Petitions on the 7th day of March, 1868. The petitioner was joint magistrate at Delhi when the mutiny broke out. He had inherited a large property from his father, who had been in the service of the East India Company for forty years. Acting up to the spirit of the policy of the East India Company, who wished their civil servants as far as possible to make India their home, Sir John's father had, in the course of his long service, accumulated at Delhi a very large amount of property, with a residence, and a valuable library. On the breaking out of the mutiny, the property fell into the hands of the Natives, and was either plundered or destroyed. That was a calamity which had overtaken many European proprietors at the same period; and in such cases the ordinary course in India was to proceed against the district or village in which the property was situate; and this mode of procedure after the mutiny was over had been approved by the Government of the North West Provinces and the Punjab, and in several cases civilians, officers of the Government, independent planters, missionaries, and others had obtained full compensation for their losses during the mutiny by proceeding in ordinary course of law against the district in which their property had been plundered. But when Delhi was handed over to the Punjab Government, it was made an exception to the general rule, and it was said that the losses there would be dealt with under a special arrangement to be proposed by the Government at Calcutta. Sir John Metcalfe, therefore, waived his legal claims and took no steps to obtain redress by the ordinary course of law, trusting that the Government would provide him with sufficient means to obtain compensation for the loss of his valuable property. Owing to the press of business in 1858-9, no answer was returned from Calcutta to his application, and no means were afforded for obtaining redress. Sir John Metcalfe had to leave India on sick leave; but, on his return, in 1862, he renewed his application, and received a letter from the Punjab Government in which the sum of £500 was awarded to him. In 1864, he applied again to the Punjab Government, and the answer he received stated that the award had been made with full knowledge of all the facts of the case. He next applied to the Supreme Government of India at Calcutta, and the financial letter he received in reply, dated Simla, July 15, 1864, mentioned his conspicuous bravery at the final assault, and other special grounds, entitling him to liberal consideration, and recommended that 50,000 rupees, or £5,000, should be granted to Sir John in full of all claims. Such was the recommendation of the Governor-General of India in Council to the Supreme Council at home. But it entirely overlooked the circumstance that by the action of the Government he had been absolutely deprived of the means of obtaining redress by prosecuting the Delhi district. No action having been taken by the Council of India, and no compensation having been awarded, he was fully justified in his appeal to that House, the only tribunal to which he could address himself. The question of compensation for losses during the Indian Mutiny had never come before the House. Certain compensation rules were laid down in 1859 and 1860, but it so happened they had never been submitted to the House, although Sir Charles Wood, then Secretary of State for India, in answer to a question, stated that the subject of compensation for losses should be considered, but that no action would be taken until the whole question had been placed before the House and discussed. Under these circumstances, the question ought to have come before the House, and he thought it was perfectly legitimate to bring it forward on the present occasion. It might be said it would be dangerous to grant this appeal for a Committee to inquire into the subject, because it would encourage other claims. Now, that was not a very fair argument. He believed there were very few claims now outstanding. But, even if full compensation were granted, the case would form no precedent, because the Supreme Council at home had already established a precedent for full compensation to be given. That was in the case of the Mirza Ilahee Buksh of Delhi, by whom a claim for compensation had been made to the amount of 114,000 rupees. A sum of 5,000 rupees had been at first awarded upon that demand; but that amount had afterwards been raised to 35,000 rupees; and the Secretary of State for India decided upon appeal that even that latter award was not sufficient to meet the justice of the case, and directed that he should receive the full amount of any losses he could prove before the Commissioners. The daughter of the Mirza married the son of the King of Delhi, and when the mutiny broke out the Mirza joined the party of the King against the English; but soon finding out that that was a losing cause, he sent word during the siege of Delhi that he would give the English information of what was going on. He (Major Anson) was not aware whether the information furnished was of any value, but here was a case of a rebel who was allowed full compensation for the losses which he had sustained in consequence of a rebellion in which he himself took part. Therefore, it appeared only just that a civil officer of the Indian Government, who had nobly done his duty, and who, in the execution of that duty had lost the whole of the property accumulated by his family in three generations, should be fairly compensated. All that was asked was that a Committee of that House should inquire whether Sir John Metcalfe was entitled to that compensation.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL, in seconding the Motion, said, he wished to state the peculiar circumstances under which the loss sustained by the petitioner was incurred, and also to quote some instances of the high testimony which distinguished officials in India had borne to the character and service of Sir John Metcalfe. The first he would mention was the testimony of the Secretary of the Government in India, who, after recognizing the eminent services of Sir John Metcalfe, stated that he believed Sir John had been the greatest sufferer of any in India in respect to the loss of property by the mutiny. The Governor General himself had recommended compensation, but for some cause or other it had not hitherto been granted. It might be urged that it was a large claim to make on the part of a civil servant of the Crown, but the case was a peculiar one. For three generations the family had occupied that property. It was the policy of the Indian Government to disassociate their servants as much as possible from connection with the mother country, as it was considered that they would be better servants if they confined themselves entirely to Indian interests. The father of the present baronet, Sir Thomas Metcalfe, made his home in Delhi, and collected around him all that a refined taste and great intelligence would lead a gentleman in his position to gather together. He built an elegant mansion, and furnished it luxuriously with valuable pictures and statues. The house was sacked by the rebels, and subsequently our troops made use of the very property on which the house was situated, in order to enable them effectually to combat the rebels, cutting down the valuable woods, and availing themselves of all the advantages which the place possessed to conduct their operations; so that while, on the one hand, the house was despoiled by the enemy, on the other the grounds were destroyed by our own troops, and all the property which had been accumulated by Sir John Metcalfe's family for forty years had been entirely destroyed. Our army in India had the very highest appreciation of the personal services of Sir John Metcalfe, and there were many letters from high officials strongly commenting on the distinguished services rendered by the petitioner. Major-General Showers stated in a letter written at Fort William on the 24th of April, 1864, that Sir John Metcalfe was always at hand when there was anything to be done during the mutiny, and that he volunteered to lead the troops through his estate by such a route as enabled them to fall unawares on the cavalry, and the consequence was that the mutinous cavalry were obliged to retire with such precipitation that the artillery was left behind and fell into our hands, and we were enabled at once to march on Delhi; and he concluded by saying that, for his personal services, no one was more entitled to honour and credit at the hands of the British Government than the petitioner. Sir George Clark had also written home much to the same effect, and the reply he received was that his letter, bearing testimony to the valuable services of Sir John Metcalfe at the siege of Delhi, had been laid before the Secretary in Council, and then followed a few words of cold commendation to the effect that the writer was instructed by Sir Charles Wood to say that he had received with much gratification the record of the valuable services performed. Again, Colonel North in a letter dated from Calcutta in April, 1864, stated that, under the guidance of Sir John Metcalfe, the troops were enabled to advance by a circuitous route upon the Indian cavalry, and the consequence was that they sustained so thorough and complete a discomfiture that it was impossible for them to carry off the guns. He regretted to find that an officer who had rendered such valuable services was obliged to importune the Government for justice, and he earnestly trusted that the case would meet with a generous consideration at the hands of the Government, and that no difficulty would be thrown in the way of granting this Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of Sir Theophilus John Metcalfe, C.B., as set forth in his Petition of the 24th day of February, and printed in the Appendix to the Fifth Report on Public Petitions on the 7th day of March 1868,"—(Major Anson),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, that having been in India during the mutiny, it would be unfair in him not to testify to the general accuracy of the statements made with respect to the losses sustained by Sir John Metcalfe, and to his gallant conduct during the mutiny. He (Lord William Hay) visited Delhi as a traveller in 1848, and went over the house and estate of the petitioner's father, because it was regarded as one of the "lions" of the place, valuables of all kinds being collected there. He again visited the place in 1858, three months after the war, and it was the literal fact that not one stone of the mansion was standing on another. He could bear testimony to the personal bravery of, and the invaluable services rendered by the petitioner during the mutiny, when he proved himself a worthy successor of his distinguished uncle Lord Metcalfe, who led a storming party at the siege of Bhurtpore. His services were publicly recognized by General Campbell, and, in a private conversation, that gallant officer had told him of the intrepid coolness with which Sir John Metcalfe at the siege of Delhi pioneered the troops through the intricate streets from the Cashmere Gate to the principal mosque, a distance of about two miles, marching in advance of the troops with a double-barrelled gun in his hand as coolly and composedly as if he had been walking in his own grounds. So sensible were the army of the value of Sir John's services that they unanimously voted to him a share of the prize money derived from the capture of Delhi; but as he was a civilian, the generous wish of the army could not be carried into execution. Sir John Lawrence—to his honour be it said—was an austere man in respect to rewards and to questions of compensation; yet he had recommended that a payment of £5,000 should be made to Sir John Metcalfe, on the ground that his case was an exceptional one. That being the case, the House might depend upon it the claim was well worthy of consideration. It might be said that the appointment of a Committee in this case would establish a bad precedent; but he hoped there was not much danger of any similar case arising in the future. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India had said on the previous night that he was sure the Council who had the control of the finances of India would always yield to the authority of the Secretary of State. It was impossible to imagine, then, that the Council would refuse to accede to an opinion deliberately arrived at by the House of Commons. At all events every one would be glad to learn that before a decision was pronounced against this claim it would be completely inquired into.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it was painful to say anything apparently in opposition to the claim of a gentleman of high character who had rendered distinguished services, and who certainly had been a very great sufferer. It was, therefore, with very great reluctance that he found himself compelled to object to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member. He found himself in a somewhat embarrassing position. This claim arose out of events which had occurred ten years ago. The compensation which had been awarded to Sir John Metcalfe had been awarded in consequence of a despatch written by Sir Charles Wood in 1859, which allowed a certain scale of compensation to sufferers by the mutiny. The case of Sir John Metcalfe had afterwards been brought forward as a peculiar one; it had been considered by the Government of India, and recommended to the notice of the Secretary of State for India in 1864. From that time to the present it had not been officially brought before any Indian authority, and this Motion had come upon him (Sir Stafford Northcote) quite unexpectedly. The hon. and gallant Member had certainly given notice of his Motion some time ago; but never having heard of Sir John Metcalfe, and not knowing that it was in any way connected with his Department, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had not given his attention to the matter till the day before yesterday, when Sir John Metcalfe called upon him, and expressed a hope that he would not object to the Motion. He then asked what the circumstances were, and for the first time he heard the history of the case. The House were aware that if he were ever so well inclined to make a grant it would not be in his power to do so without the assent of the majority of his Council. He had not had an opportunity of consulting them yet; and as it was only on that morning he looked into the Papers, he was speaking under circumstances of difficulty. He must, however, observe, that no Resolution which might be passed by a Committee, or even by the House itself, would be legally binding on the Council of India; because Parliament had decided on general grounds, and he thought wisely, to remove from itself the duty of administering the finances of India, and had referred that duty to another body. As long as that arrangement remained he did not think Parliament would desire to render it an absurd one by interfering in individual cases with the decision of the Council. He did not, of course, object to the Council receiving any information from a Committee in a case where information so furnished might be deemed desirable. Neither did he object to the comments of hon. Members who desired to point out what they might conceive to be errors in decisions of the Council. On the contrary, he thought that in such ways that House might exercise a very salutary influence. But he thought that in this case the facts were not in dispute. They were correctly stated by the hon. and gallant Member—more correctly than by Sir John Metcalfe in his petition. Sir John was obviously under an erroneous impression as to the source from which the funds for awarding those compensations were derived. He seemed to think that they had been voted by that House, and that a very large sum had been granted for the purpose, and had not yet been exhausted. Had that been so, that House would of course have been the right judge whether its intentions had been carried into effect. But it was not so, and the hon. and gallant Member had not put forward the case on that ground. He should be most happy to lay the whole of the Correspondence on the table in order that the House might see exactly how the case stood. Having looked over the Papers—without, however, having had an opportunity of consulting his Council—he would now state how in his opinion the case presented itself. In the first place it should be borne in mind that the compensation awarded to Sir John Metcalfe was granted, not upon any special award confined to his case, but in application of the general rule laid down by Sir Charles Wood, the Secretary of State in Council in 1859. He was not prepared to go into an argument as to the legal rights which the sufferers by the mutiny might have had to recover the full amount of their losses from the inhabitants of the districts in which those losses were incurred. That, however, was a point on which he would institute inquiries, as it might possibly have some bearing on the case. But he might remark that if every sufferer from the mutiny had a legal right to recover all his losses from the inhabitants of the district, the cases of every loser by the mutiny, as well as that of Sir John Metcalfe, called for inquiry, with the exception of the comparatively few cases in which the losses were made good by the action of the Punjab Government, or other local authorities, on the spur of the moment. But when Delhi fell the Government had, instead of allowing prosecutions against districts and villages, made an arrangement under which compensation should be granted out of some general fund. With respect to Delhi, it was at first proposed that the compensation should be provided by contributions to be levied on the houses in that city. That plan, however, was abandoned, and the following plan was adopted by the Government of India. The claims, it appeared, amounted to about £2,000,000, and the Government laid down the following scale of compensation:—A distinction was drawn between real and personal property, it being provided that the losses in real property should up to a fixed amount be made good to the amount of one half the loss sustained, but that beyond a certain point the compensation should be at the rate of one-third of the actual loss, while with respect to personalty the rule was laid down that one-third of the proved loss should be made good, but that no claimant should receive more than 5,000 rupees, or £500. It was obvious that under this peculiar arrangement, which however was deliberately adopted and applied in every case, a person who had lost property worth £1,500 would receive as much as a person whose losses amounted to £15,000. Now, the peculiarity of Sir John Metcalfe's case was simply that he was a large loser, and that, therefore, this scale of compensation, which was perhaps sufficient for those who lost but little, was in his case a very inadequate one. Still, he was compensated according to the scale laid down and applied in every instance. The money was to be derived from contributions out of the general funds of the Government of India, and whereas the losses were represented to amount to about £2,000,000, the total sum which the Government determined to grant by way of compensation was not to exceed £1,000,000. He believed Sir John Metcalfe made no complaint as to the amount awarded to him as compensation for his real property. In regard to his personal property, he was awarded the maximum that could be given under the rules—namely, 5,000 rupees. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) had alleged that Sir John ought to have received compensation on two distinct grounds, in respect of property in which he was interested under two distinct titles, and he confessed there seemed to be some force in that argument, although it was not admitted by the Government of India. But, subject to this exception (if it were one), Sir John Metcalfe was compensated at the same rate as everybody else under the rules. The hon. Gentlemen who brought forward and seconded the Motion now alleged that the compensation was insufficient, and said they asked not for favour but for justice. But in what respect had Sir John Metcalfe been treated unjustly? He had, it was true, suffered considerable loss, and had received compensation to a very inadequate extent. Was that what was meant? ["Hear!"] From the way in which his last remark had been received he inferred that the claim was rested on the ground of justice; and that, in fact, the justice of the system of rules under which the award was made was disputed, not only as they applied to Sir John Metcalfe, but to everybody else; because if rules were laid down and everybody were treated exactly in accordance with them, it was impossible to say that if the rules were just for one person they were unjust for another. To revise these rules and to set aside the basis of compensation which had been laid down when the facts were fresh would be a very serious undertaking. He was not responsible for them, nor did he stand up to defend them; but he was merely endeavouring to get at the real facts of a case which certainly awakened sympathy. It would, however, be extremely unwise to carry sympathy for an individual so far as to break down rules, without carefully considering what the consequences might be. The other ground on which Sir John Metcalfe's claim was based was that it had been recommended for special consideration by the Government of India. He held in his hand the despatch from the Government of India, in which that recommendation was made. They argued, in the first place, the question of the distinction between the two separate properties, and on this he confessed their argument was not at first sight very convincing. They then went on to say that under the rules for the distribution of compensation for losses of personal property a limitation was made to one-third of the loss, and that in no case could a larger amount than 5,000 rupees be allowed. They also stated that, in the present instance, the latter sum was disproportionate to the total loss, and that more liberal compensation was sought on special grounds. They went on to say that Sir John Metcalfe laid great stress on the fact that he had abstained from pressing his claim against certain districts, but they held that this plea was untenable after the formation of the Million Fund. [Major ANSON: What is the Million Fund?] The next paragraph of the despatch would answer the question of the hon. and gallant Member. For the reasons which they stated, they said that Sir John Metcalfe had no claim to more than 5,000 rupees under the rules, but that there were special grounds which entitled him to consideration from the Government, such as his own services at Delhi, and the fact that he belonged to a family which had rendered great services to India. Now, although there was no name more deservedly honoured in Indian history than that of Metcalfe, he was sure the House would feel that the circumstance was not a sufficient reason for laying out the money of the taxpayers of India for the purpose of compensating an individual on account of his family, however distinguished. As to the services which Sir John Metcalfe had rendered at Delhi, he was not prepared to say that they were not such as to entitle his case to special consideration. That was a question which would have to be measured by a comparison of those services with the services of some other officers; and the only statement he could make with respect to it at the present moment was that he must reserve his judgment upon it until he had an opportunity of considering it more fully upon its merits. He found that the case had already been decided some years ago; and although he by no means wished to contend that it should not be re-opened, yet he thought some caution should be exercised in doing so, particularly as no new facts had been adduced. He should, however, hold himself entirely at liberty to deal with the matter, should it be brought before him, on its merits after consultation with his Council, and after such reference as might be deemed necessary to the Government of India. It would, he might add, be in his opinion extremely difficult for a select Committee to decide satisfactorily on the matter; indeed, he did not see in what way such a tribunal could well proceed in its investigation. They might, indeed, put questions to the members of the Council as to the grounds on which they had come to the conclusion at which they had arrived; but he was not at all sure that they would ascertain the justice of the case at all more satisfactorily than could be done by the House itself in open debate with all the necessary information before it. He was perfectly ready to lay on the table the original Correspondence which had led to the establishment of the rules to which he had referred, as well as all the subsequent Correspondence which bore upon the case. He should also be prepared, if the case were properly brought under his notice by Sir John Metcalfe, to take it into consideration in Council, so that he might see how the thing really stood; but he must not be understood as in any way pledging his individual opinion or that of his Council as to what, on full investigation, might appear to them to be just. The noble Lord a Member for Taunton (Lord William Russell) had, in the course of his remarks, referred to some observations which he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had made the previous evening as to the right of the House of Commons to control the Council, but he seemed to have misunderstood his meaning. What he had said was that in the event of difference of opinion arising between the Secretary of State and his Council upon a question of expenditure recommended by the Government of India, the Secretary of State had a remedy against the Council by being able to put a moral pressure upon them by bringing the matter before Parliament. It would, however, he thought, be a dangerous principle to establish, that the House of Commons, whenever a case of this kind came before it, should, with comparatively little knowledge of the matter, interfere and try to overrule the decision of the Council of India. As to the present case, he did not mean to say that it was not a case which was in some respects a strong one; but he, at the same time, was of opinion that it would be injurious that it should be drawn into a precedent for making appeals from a better informed body to one which must necessarily from the absence of information be less qualified to pronounce an opinion upon it. He hoped, under the circumstances, the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not press his Motion for a Select Committee, while he (Sir Stafford Northcote) would undertake to take care that if the case were brought before him by a memorial from Sir John Metcalfe, it should not be set aside with the ordinary answer that the question could not be re-opened.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER had heard with great satisfaction the decision at which the right hon. Baronet had arrived to take the case into his favourable consideration. He contended that, as the Council of India were a purely official body and not elected by the taxpayers of India to represent them, it was perfectly open to the House of Commons to review their action on financial questions, and maintained that, although the rules to which reference had been made might, generally speaking, operate fairly, yet that was no good reason why a particular instance in which they might operate harshly should not be dealt with on its own merits. The case was one entitled to consideration upon its own merits, and on grounds of abstract justice; and as it was, moreover, the claim of a man who had rendered important public services, and whose family also deserved the gratitude of the country, it was to be hoped that it would be dealt with in a favourable, an equitable, and even in a generous spirit.

MAJOR ANSON said, that, after the speech of the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for India, he would not press his Motion to a division; but as the Indian Council had already expressed an opinion on the subject, if their decision upon it should be again adverse, he must hold himself at liberty to bring the case before the House at a future period.

PERMANENT EXPENSES OF COMMISSIONS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he did not regret that he had not secured an earlier opportunity of bringing on his Motion, because the proceedings of Thursday night showed how necessary it was to consider in what way the increasing expenditure of the country could be grappled with. Hon. Members knew very well how exceedingly difficult it was in Committee of Supply to effect any reduction of expenditure. Attempts to do so usually ended in a promise that the matter should be looked into before the preparation of the Estimates for the following year. Soon after he entered the House a Motion was made by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) to the effect that the expenditure of the country was increasing, and ought to be diminished; and the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) said it was useless to make general Motions for reductions of expenditure, and that the only mode of effecting any permanent reduction was to object to items in detail, and to point out those that could safely be got rid of. Hon. Members would be startled to hear the increase in the Civil Service Estimates during the last twenty-five years. In 1839 they stood at £2,500,000, which covered all Civil Service expenses at that period; and they had grown, not by any sudden jump, but gradually, by £100,000, £200,000, or £300,000 a year, until last year they amounted to £8,002,953, which was this year augmented by £400,000. In discussions upon them a great number of Votes had been attacked, and arguments had been used which in ordinary cases would have been conclusive; but the Treasury experienced difficulty in dealing with the heads of Departments, and inducing them to give up some portion of their expenditure. The sum we were now called upon to pay for the Civil Service alone would in 1838 have paid the whole of the Army and Ordnance, as well as the Civil Service expenses. In speaking of the increase of the Civil Service Estimates he did not forget that they embraced certain new charges, such as the Education Grant, but that Grant, large as it was, did not account for more than one-sixth of it—if that. Acting upon the recommendation, therefore, of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, he would take three heads of expenditure which might be fairly considered with a view to passing a Resolution declaring that they ought not to be a public charge, and that the offices ought to be self-supporting. Those three heads were the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, the Charity Commission, and the Land Registry Office. The Tithe Commission, in its origin was, no doubt, very properly appointed; and when it was first established it no doubt performed duties which were of general advantage. It was fair that the nation should bear the expense of carrying out a great principle of change solemnly adopted for the public benefit like that of commutating the whole tithes of the kingdom into rent-charges; but after that was accomplished certain duties were assumed by the Commissioners for the purpose of continuing the Commission. Indeed, it was found that when once a Commission was appointed for any definite purpose, it was almost impossible to get rid of the Commission itself. Acts were passed, and renewed, and consolidated, and in various ways work was found for the Commission, so as to keep it alive; and in many instances, no doubt, that work was very beneficial, but the benefit was for private individuals and not for the public generally. The Tithes Commission, having done its chief work—that of turning the tithes into a commuted fixed rent-charge upon the land—was now occupied in making variations solely for the benefit of the parties interested. It was manifestly unfair that a poor shopkeeper, say in York, should be contributing to the cost of managing a gentleman's estate in Buckinghamshire. Last year the Tithes Office dealt with 395 cases, including the confirmation of 283 altered apportionments, thirty-six applications for glebe exchanges, and 117 applications for redemption of rent-charge. Not only did the country bear the cost of all these transactions, which were for the benefit of individuals, but the Acts constituting and renewing the Commission exempted the transactions from the cost of postage and stamps, so that the Revenue lost a large sum it would otherwise receive in addition. Last year twenty-two inclosures were confirmed and carried out, and 228 exchanges of landed estates effected. In all, 264 cases were dealt with, and the value of the property passing and changing ownership through the assistance of the Commission was nearly £350,000, which was also exempt from stamps that would have amounted to between £4,000 and £5,000. The Copyhold Office dealt with 1,203 cases, including 825 enfranchisements, and the value of the property dealt with was nearly £250,000, again exempt from stamps and postages. In these offices a small payment on each transaction would meet all the necessary expenses, and relieve the Consolidated Fund from a charge of £30,000 or £40,000 per annum, and which charge would after a very short time have to be further increased by superannuations—and justice could be done to the country without doing injustice to anyone. The question of the Charity Commission was brought forward in 1863 by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, in an able financial speech, in which he showed that that Commission had entailed on the country an expenditure very little short of £250,000. The Commission was appointed to inquire into the charities, ascertain of what they consisted, and how they were dispensed, and the result appeared in thirty-eight volumes, which were in the Library, and which showed that the charitable income of the country was at that time very nearly £2,000,000 sterling. In 1857 the property of the charities had so much increased in value that the revenue amounted to £2,400,000 per annum, and now it amounted to £3,000,000. The value of their personal property alone was £10,000,000, and their real property was scattered in all parts of the kingdom, and was increasing rapidly in value, because much of it was situated in the vicinity of large towns and of the metropolis. Persons were continually saving money for charitable purposes, and by an Act recently passed trustees might relieve themselves from all trouble and responsibility by handing over charitable funds to the Charity Commissioners. At the same time the expenses of the Commissioners were increasing from £18,000 to £20,000, and if the country bore these expenses, they would go on increasing. These charities in many instances—the Londoned charity, for example—demoralized neighbourhood; and instead of supplementing them, as we were now doing tactically, by an annual grant, we should take this property, in the usual way, bear its own burdens. The only mode of grappling with the national expenditure was by attacking some particular department, or item, and saying, "That ought at once to be ended." General declamation was of no use, and it seemed to him that these Commissions were fair subjects for reduction. If maintained at all they should bear their own expenses, and the State should not be called upon to contribute a sum amounting practically to £70,000 or £80,000 per annum for their support. Another of these Commissions was that for the Registration of Titles, the object of which was to save the large expenses incident to the transfer of land, and effect that transfer without the ordinary investigation of title. This Commission had not met with general acceptance or favour, and the consequence was a charge upon the public of £7,000 or £8,000 a year, perhaps more. Now, the benefit it conferred was strictly confined to either individuals or particular classes of individuals; it did not benefit the public generally the interest of the general tax payer; as if a man thought he could get a large price for his property by obtaining an indefeasible title through the intervention of the office, he ought to pay for it. Or the office might be attached to one which realised surplus over expenditure like the Middlesex Registry Office. Some time back I effected an exchange of property with one of his neighbours through the medium of one of these Commissions, and to his surprise it only cost him £9 or £10, and his neighbour the same; but it cost the country £200. Looking at the large extent of acreage, and the great value of the property dealt with, and the great advantages derived by parties from the facilities in which the business was done, he thought such a state of things ought not to be tolerated—that the public should continue to bear the expense. In the case of the Charity Commission, he was endeavouring to open a door for a much larger question—namely, that of the charities themselves bearing their fair share of the public burdens like any other property. As things were at present, there was a mass of property, amounting to £3,000,000 a year, one-half of which tended to do more harm than good. If the trustees could not manage the property themselves, it did not manage it in a proper way, and required the surveillance of a Commissioner; they should defray the cost, and should bear all the burdens to which ordinary property was subject.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he begged to second the Motion. He thanked the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) for having again brought the question before the House. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend that the only way in which they could arrive at a satisfactory solution of these questions, in the absence of any action by the Government, was by an hon. Member who had a perfect knowledge of the subject, stating to the House where the weak points lay. In this matter he was bound to say he had some fault to find with Her Majesty's Government. When, two years ago, the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) brought the subject forward, he (Mr. Childers) being then Secretary to the Treasury, and entirely agreeing with the hon. Gentleman in principle, undertook that the matter should be looked into. Last year his hon. Friend again brought the question forward, and he (Mr. Childers) asked what ther the Government had complied with the promise he had given and inquired into the expenditure incurred on account of the Copyhold and Charity Commissions, because he felt that his hon. Friend's object ought to be carried out. He was bound now to make the same inquiry ; for there could be no difficulty whatever in having the Treasury re-couped for the large expenditure which these Commissions entailed. For the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission there was an expenditure of £20,294, besides rent of a house, and certain other exemptions from charge which did not appear. The whole amount received in fees during 1867 was only £4,080, leaving a difference of £16,000, which the Treasury ought to be re-couped. The charge for the Charity Commission was £18,400, and there could hardly be a question that this expenditure ought also to be re-couped to the public. He did not know whether there were any fees in this case, but if there were they were very small. Then, as to the third case of expenditure, in connection with the registration of titles, the Land Registry Office itself did not cost very much, and it was the beginning of a new system of registry, but as another Department had been alluded to he must say that the state of things with respect to the Middlesex Registry Office was monstrous. The Middlesex Registry Office was not apparently a Department responsible to that House. In the other cases the Departments were paid by the State, and the fees, small as they were, went into the Exchequer. In this case also the Department received fees, but the balance went into the hands of sinecurists—one of whom drew three cheques a year, and the other did nothing, and for that these gentlemen received between £2,000 and £3,000 a year. There was this remarkable difference between the two classes of cases—namely, that where the balance went into the hands of gentlemen who had nothing to do there was a very large surplus ; but where it went into the Exchequer there was very little surplus indeed. However, the Government had promised that this office and the Land Registry Office should be worked by a Commission ; and this being so, it might be left out of the question. So amended, he trusted the Government would not object to the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word " That " to the end of the Question, in order to add the words " in the opinion of this House, the expenses of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, and Charity Commission, ought not to be borne by the public,"—(Mr. Goldney,)

—instead thereof.

MR. MARSH said, he would confine his observations to the question of charities. All that was asked was that the Treasury should re-coup itself for the expenses of managing them. They were sometimes founded by persons who were in advance of the civilization of the age in which they lived, but many of them had now become entirely useless. It was a mistake to allow persons to tie up property in perpetuity for charitable, or indeed for any purposes. There were three descriptions of charities—namely, hospitals, almshouses, and grammar schools. The first was an unmixed good. They required little looking after, and were managed by local boards ; but almshouses were monkish institutions unsuited to the present age. They were really useless and tended very much to produce pauperism by encouraging unthrifty habits. They generally contained half-a-dozen old men and as many old women, who would be much happier if they could live with their friends. Even the Greenwich sailors preferred to receive a small sum of money a day and to be allowed to live with their friends rather than dwell in a palace on the banks of the Thames. With regard to grammar schools, they might in a few cases be useful, by enabling boys of a humbler class to obtain an education which raised them to a higher position ; but he thought that where the qualities which qualified a boy for a more important sphere existed, they would assert themselves without this adventitious assistance. In other cases these schools had had a mischievous effect, giving boys an education of a kind which they did not want, and increasing that class who were constantly writing to Members of Parliament for situations as clerks, and who, in the colonies, were the most useless and helpless portion of the population. There were about 3,000 of these schools, and the recent Report of the Royal Commissioners had shown the maladministration which existed. He had seen an account of a recent discussion in a town council as to why there were no boys at the town grammar school, some one remarked that they had only to send for a photograph of the master to know the reason. In King dward's School, at Birmingham, the Commissioners found a boy who spelt "wrong" round," who could not name a river in England, and who could not tell the names of any of the capital cities in Europe. At the same Grammar School, with an income of £792, there were only three boys. At Bosworth School there were two masters and one boy. In another case there had been no scholar for more than thirty years, and in a fourth case, there were six boys whom the master, living in the school-house and doing nothing, sent to a private school. As cases fell in, and as the revenues increased, the existing evils would be exaggerated. In Scotland, parents were far more willing to pay for the education of their children than in England where people had been mollified by the system of endowments. He did not, however, advocate the spoliation of charities; nor were we now proposing, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) boldly said some years ago, that charities should be liable to the income tax; but he thought it was only right that their revenues should not be supplemented out of the general taxation of the country.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, he thought that some of the arguments brought forward were entirely out of place. "Why," had been said, "is a person in Yorkshire to pay for the benefit of a person in Buckinghamshire?" It might just as well be said, "Why is a person in Wales or in Cornwall to pay towards the expenses incurred by this House in connection with the Paris Exhibition?" He could bear testimony to the usefulness of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Title Commission. Exchanges of land had thereby been effected at a small expense, and this had indirectly benefited the whole community; for where land passed from an owner in whose possession it had been unproductive to one in whose hands it became productive the public good was promoted. The offence of the Inclosure and Inclosure Commissioners was, he respected, their having shown how that which had been attended with great expense might be effected with economy. He hoped, therefore, the operations of that Commission would not be discouraged, and with regard to charities the greater the abuses the more necessary it was that they should be subject to supervision.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOOTH said, he thought the House would hardly be inclined, upon so short a notice, to subvert arrangements laid down by several Acts of Parliament. These various bodies had been established from time to time with full knowledge of their objects and of their cost; and they were in reality Courts of Law. While concurring in many of the remarks and suggestions of his hon. Friend (Mr. Goldney), who had so ably introduced the subject, he thought more deliberate and mature discussion was required before so decided a step as that proposed were taken, unless, indeed, the Government, after their attention had been thus drawn to the matter, should take upon themselves to propose the alterations now suggested. With regard to the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Title Commission, it had never been looked upon as permanent, having been several times renewed, and would expire in 1872. It had cognizance of such a variety of matters that it would be difficult to lay down the rule that every person resorting to it should pay such fees as to render it self-supporting. There was the apportionment of tithes—a question of such importance that the money required for this portion of the Commissioners' operations could not be deemed to have been improperly applied. With regard to copyholders, it was considered to be a matter of great public importance that copyhold tenures should cease to exist in this country. By means of this Commission large quantities of copyhold lands had been enfranchised at small cost, and a great amount of taxable and rateable property had been created, and had thus become a source of wealth to the country. The Commission thus conferred a benefit upon the public, for which the public ought to pay. Then, again, by means of the Inclosure Commission, enormous quantities of waste land had been brought into cultivation, which would scarcely have been the case if the poorer class of landowners, who chiefly derived benefit from the distribution of the waste and common lands, had been compelled to pay the expenses of the Commission. The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) had stated the cost of the Commission to be £30,000 per annum; but he was labouring under a mistake, as the expenditure entailed by it only amounted to £20,000 per annum plus the imprest expenses. He hoped, however, that a Bill would shortly be introduced into Parliament to enable the Inclosure Commissioners to take security for the preliminary expenses and to secure the re-payment to the Commissioners of such preliminary expenses in the case of the investigation proving fruitless. The Bill should also empower the Commissioners to make certain alterations in the business of their Court; but it would be most unwise and rash to pass hastily such a Resolution upon the subject as that now before the House. The subject required much more deliberate attention than it could receive on the hasty passing of a Resolution on going into Committee of Supply. He was unacquainted with the negotiations which had taken place upon this subject in former years; but he should be happy to endeavour to make arrangements to secure certain alterations being made in the Copyhold and Inclosure Courts. At the same time, he must remind the House that Parliament had deliberately resolved that the expenses of these Courts should be defrayed by the Votes of that House, in accordance with the recommendations of a Committee of Inquiry which was appointed in 1854, to inquire into this subject, and which consisted of Sir Charles Trevelyan and Sir Stafford Northcote. No objection had been raised by the Commission against an alteration being made in the scale of fees which they charged, and doubtless after the attention of the House and of the public had been drawn to the subject, it would be easy to carry into effect the necessary alterations in this respect. With regard to the Charity Commission, he concurred in the opinion that the expenses it involved ought not to be borne entirely by the country; but it would be a very difficult task to settle the matter satisfactorily. From 1844 to 1852, Bills were introduced by the Government almost every year with the view of setting up this Commission, and in every one of those Bills there was a clause making the cost fall upon the public. In 1852 the Bill passed. As originally introduced it contained a clause proposing to levy a tax of 2*d.* in the pound on all charities brought into the Court; but it was proved in debate that there would be great difficulty in imposing such a tax, and Earl Russell objected to the clause, on the ground that it would be very unjust to tax well-conducted charities for the purpose of controlling those not so well-conducted, and he proposed that the expenses of the Commission should be defrayed by the public. The Commission had been productive of a vast amount of public good, and it was, in fact, a branch of the Court of Chancery. It was a public court in which the procedure was cheap and simple, so as to enable small charities to come to it for assistance and advice. The Court had, at the present moment, £3,000,000 of the funds belonging to various charities in its hands, and it kept 4,500 accounts. Many of the larger charities, however, were out of the purview of the Court. The Commission had no objection whatever to its expenses being defrayed by a tax upon property belonging to charities; but they did object to any system of taxation which would prevent the smaller charities from coming into that Court. A general tax of 2*d.* in the pound upon property belonging to charities would amply defray the costs of the Commission. For his part, he should not object to the imposition of such a tax; but the House would recollect the failure of the attempt of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) to subject charities to taxation; and in the face of the great influence brought to bear against the imposition even of poor rates upon charities, with what heart could they proceed to the consideration of a direct tax. A judicial decision having virtually repealed the law exempting charities from the payment of rates, great efforts had been made, and deputations had been headed by individuals high in station, for a remission in favour of charities. Therefore he thought it would be futile to press the Resolution now recommended. With regard to the Land Registry Office the case was much more simple. That office had been a failure; that was to say, it had not received sufficient custom from the public to be self-supporting. That such had been the case was no fault of the Government; it resulted entirely from the action of the public, who, if they had resorted to it — as it might reasonably have been expected they would have done — would have enabled the intentions of its noble author — Lord Westbury — to be fully carried out. The chief secretary of that Court, however, believed that with some slight alteration it would become self-supporting. He regretted that the Middlesex Registry Office — an office which was at present somewhat under a cloud, and which, by general consent, required investigation — should have been mixed up with this question, for with this subject that office had really nothing to do. The Lord Chancellor stated in November that the matter was under his consideration, and the Secretary of State had it under contemplation to unite the functions of the Middlesex Registry with the Land Registry Office. It appeared that upon the whole question there was very little difference of opinion between the Government and the hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject. He was sorry to have detained the House so long; but he could not recognize the wisdom of passing Resolution such as the one proposed, the effect of which would be to embarrass their proceedings.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Aldney)—to whom he tendered his acknowledgments for the Motion he had made—would consent to omit the words relating to the Land Registry Office; because their only tendency, in his opinion, would be to perplex the case with respect to the other part of the Motion. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government, after that omission had been made, oppose the Resolution, because he believed that the arguments employed by the hon. Gentleman who had introduced down (Mr. Selater-Booth) were of such as to induce the House to vote against the Motion. There had not been so suddenness in the Motion of which the hon. Gentleman complained. The subject of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and the Commission had been under consideration before, and two years ago a promise was given by the then Government, which for some reason or other was redeemed, that the matter should be dealt with in the precise sense asked by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Aldney). Similar promises had been made with regard to the Charity Commission, so that suddenness could not be alleged against a Motion which would, even if sudden, have been equally entitled to weight. He hoped the House would pass the Resolution, because by so doing they would strengthen the hands of the Government in a matter in which they had great need to be strengthened. This was an admirable opportunity for them to deal with charities. He attempted to deal with charities three or four years ago, but the Secretary now in Office, was then in Opposition, and the almost unanimous resistance of that party was offered to his proposal. That party being now in Office, circumstances were favourable; and he trusted that hon. Members would feel that this was an opportunity to procure what, if the Liberal party had been in Office it would have been much more difficult to obtain. Knowing well what the Treasury really required in cases of this kind, he entreated the House to pass the Resolution. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Selater-Booth) had said there had been deputations headed by powerful individuals urging further remissions on behalf of charities. That was another reason why they should pass the Resolution. He (Mr. Gladstone) looked with considerable horror upon these deputations headed by powerful individuals. They were intended to saddle the public with burdens; and aimed at securing by personal and individual influence a result which could not fairly be arrived at on the merits of the case. If that House was mindful of its duty as steward of the public purse, the very fact of the extraordinary superhuman activity which, as he knew to his cost, was always displayed by these deputations, would be a powerful reason for showing when the subject came up that they were in earnest. The hon. Gentleman said that if they passed the Resolution it would subvert arrangements made by statute. It would have no such effect. It would not even secure the total disappearance, perhaps, of certain Votes from the Estimates of the present year, but it would make it the duty of the Government to go seriously to work for the attainment of a definite object, and instead of being left to be lost in the mazes of argument with these powerful deputations, they would be backed by the authority of the House, which would have distinctly marked out the aim to which their efforts should be directed. The plan of the Government would, no doubt, be introduced in due time, and as regarded the voting of moneys for carrying on the operations of these Commissions during the period while that plan was being brought into action, to the voting of such moneys the most fastidious Member of Parliament, or the most rigid economist, could not reasonably object. There was one portion of the speech of the hon. Gentleman which he heard with more jealousy as to its principle, because he understood him to argue with reference to the charges under the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, and the Inclosure and Drainage Acts, that because the operation of those Acts was beneficial to the country at large, therefore the charge should be borne by the country. He demurred to that principle; because if it were good there were innumerable cases in which the charges should be borne by the country. There were here two classes. There was a comparatively narrow class or portion of the community, which had a large and special interest; and there was likewise the community at large, which had a general interest in the passing of good laws. He quite admitted that when Bills of this kind were introduced, it was often prudent and politic to throw the charge upon the public, because it was the only mode in which to pass the measure; but of that policy there was no question in this case, because the system was established, and the benefit accrued to a particular class; and it was unfair that, simply on account of the general advantage which in all cases resulted to the public, that particular class should be exempted. With respect to the question of charities, it was always difficult to argue it; on this ground, that the case was so bad, and that it invariably appeared that the proposition which was made was totally insufficient, and that in order to meet the merits of the case they ought to go a great deal further. That was an argument of which he had felt the force when it was used against himself; but at the same time they should not, because they ought to go a vast deal further, refuse to make any step at all. Let them take the clear and definite step which had been proposed by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the speech of the hon. Gentleman, there was only one sentence to which he would be disposed to take exception, and his exception was more verbal than substantial. The hon. Gentleman said, "Let us not deal in general words; for there is no real way to procure economy except by particular propositions." He (Mr. Gladstone) granted that they were most fortunate in having a Gentleman thoroughly qualified, and one politically attached to the Government of the day, who was disposed to make a definite proposal of economy. They would always find him ready to lend his support to any proposition of that kind. He could not subscribe to the general doctrine that the House should not use words of a larger kind. It was impossible for the House to secure economy by fighting in detail; and circumstances sometimes arose in which, if the House intended to have economy, it must have it by general declarations for the guidance of the Government. Such Resolutions had been passed in former times, and such Resolutions were not unlikely to become again necessary, perhaps, at no distant date. In principle they were perfectly defensible, and in practice they formed the only mode in which the House could act upon any large scale. If, as he understood the hon. Member, the words relating to the Land Registry Office were to be left out, he should certainly give the Motion his support.

MR. BARROW said, this question was not now mooted for the first time, as he had a few years ago pressed it on the attention of the then Government; but because he was a humble Member of that House he had not been successful. He saw no reason why the parties who had inclosed lands under the Inclosure Commissioners Acts should not be called upon to pay the expense. These exchanges of land were not generally for the public benefit. It did not matter to the public whether two fields were close together or not; but it was a great benefit to individuals, and those individuals ought to pay for what was done. The greater portion of the land had been inclosed, and he did not think the public should have to pay for the benefit of individuals.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in the spirit of his hon. Friend's (Mr. Goldney's) Resolution he willingly concurred; but the terms were too broad and comprehensive, and he felt some difficulty in assenting to the Motion exactly as it stood upon the Paper. In this Resolution they found drawn into one category "the expenses of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, Charity Commission, and Land Registry Office." These could hardly be considered as all coming under the same principle. The right hon. Gentleman had recommended that the Land Registry Office should be omitted from the Resolution. If the Land Registry Office were to be continued exactly in the same condition as at present—that was, that no other business should be introduced into the office than had been the case of late years—then he doubted whether it would be proper to exclude those words from the Resolution; but he understood it was in contemplation either to annex some other duties to the head of that office, or to amalgamate it with the Middlesex Registry Office. Under these circumstances it might be expedient to exclude the Land Registry Office from the Resolution. With respect to the Charity Commission, for his own part, he perfectly concurred in the view that the expense of the administration of charities should be borne by the income of charities, and he did not himself dissent from the view put forward by the right

n. Gentleman the Member for South Devonshire as to the propriety of making landowners pay income tax. At the same time, public opinion had been exceedingly strong against the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore it was a question whether it was expedient to press a more limited proposal now under discussion for imposing upon landowners the cost of their own administration. The principle that the expenses should not be borne by the public was sound, and the only question was how the charge of the administration should be borne. With regard to the other heads of the Revenue, there could be no doubt that a great part of the duties assigned to these Commissioners were for the benefit of individuals.

At the same time, he believed that but for the Copyhold Commission, the copyhold tenure, which was better suited to a past age than to the present, would not have been broken up, and it was thus a question whether the entire expense should be borne by individuals or the public. The Motion by his hon. Friend was couched in very general terms, and while assenting to the principle of it he took exception to those parts. The whole matter required careful discussion and consideration; but he was perfectly ready, on the part of the Government, to assent to the Motion if the words "entirely" were added before the word "borne." If the hon. Member would agree to this, the House need not be put to the trouble of a division.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he hoped the suggestion for the insertion of the word "entirely" would not be agreed to, as that insertion would invite the inference that the charge should be borne partly by the public, and thus the value of the Motion would be destroyed.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, he was entirely in the hands of the House. He was ready to take out the words as to the Land Registry Office, but if the House thought that a principle of the Motion should be affirmed he should press it to a division.

Question put, "That those words be added."

The House divided:—Ayes 106; Noes 5; Majority 1.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the expenses of the Copyhold Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, and Charity Commission, ought not to be borne by the public.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GENERAL POST OFFICE—CASE OF A. J. DUFFY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he rose to call attention to the circumstances connected with the removal of Anthony J. Duffy from his appointment of permanent clerk in the Circulation Department of the General Post Office; and to move for a Committee of Inquiry. The hon. Baronet said that the father of the gentleman whose name appeared on the Notice was induced to give his son such an education as would fit him for the Civil Service. In the year 1865 Mr. Duffy having received, through the intervention of a noble Lord, a nomination to a clerkship in the Post Office, was appointed to the Savings Bank branch of that Department. Having served some three months in the Savings Bank branch, he received a nomination to compete with eleven other gentlemen, and in that competition he obtained the second place. After the competitive examination he entered upon his duties in the Foreign Office branch of the General Post Office. Both in the Savings Bank and Foreign Office branches Mr. Duffy's conduct was such as to merit the encomiums of all his superiors in the branches—so much so that they felt it but right that he should be appointed a probationary clerk in the Register branch of the General Post Office. He was then appointed a permanent clerk in that branch. The gentleman who had the control of this Department (Mr. Boucher) seemed to have entertained an unreasonable prejudice against Mr. Duffy, and when it became necessary to revise the Department Mr. Duffy's name was omitted from those who were to be employed in it. On inquiry as to the reason of this, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) received the reply that Mr. Duffy was not suited to this particular office. He then wrote to Mr. Soudamere in probably rather strong terms; but Mr. Duffy knew nothing of the letter, and there was no reason why this young man should be punished for any mistake he had made in the exercise of his duty as a Member of Parliament. Contemporaneously with the receipt of the letter of Mr. Scudamore this young man was removed from the Post Office. After having served for three years and passed an examination for which he had received a special education, he was turned adrift on the wide world at the bidding of a subordinate. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) addressed the noble Duke (the Postmaster General) and received an answer to the effect that Mr. Duffy was relieved from his appointment both for the interest of the department and for his own. The young man had been dismissed by the noble Duke without any opportunity having been afforded to him of bringing forward evidence in his own behalf, or of hearing the case against him. He regretted that the Postmaster General had not a seat in that House, for the hon. Gentleman who would reply to the question was not an officer representing the Department, but simply the organ of those officers whose fairness was impugned. Mr. Duffy, who was a clever, well-educated young man, with no stain upon his character, had not been allowed to defend himself in the matter. The whole proceeding had been most unfair, and would deter parents from bringing up their sons for the Civil Service.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances connected with the removal of Anthony J. Duffy from his appointment of permanent clerk in the Circulation department of the General Post Office,"—(Sir Patrick O'Brien,)—instead thereof.

MR. P. WYKEHAM MARTIN had known Mr. Boucher in his capacity of public servant and also in private life, and he felt sure that on consideration the hon. Baronet would not make such an attack on his character. [SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN: I did not attack his character.] The hon. Baronet stated that, from prejudice and other causes, Mr. Scudamore swayed the mind of the Duke of Montrose to dismiss this young man. Mr. Boucher might make a mistake, but he would not act from such a motive.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Duke of Montrose had made inquiries into the case, and had satisfied himself that it was his duty to dismiss Mr. Duffy from his situation. The offences charged against Mr. Duffy arose from irregularity and a want of punctuality. He did not think the character of Mr. Boucher was before this House, and therefore he would not enter on that subject. Mr. Duffy was nine times cautioned for those offences in 1866, and eleven times between February and July in 1867. There was nothing against the moral character or the ability of Mr. Duffy; but repeated errors and mistakes arising from irregular habits and unpunctuality were very serious matters in an establishment like the Post Office. Mr. Duffy had sent letters by the wrong mails, and had made mistakes with respect to Post Office orders and registered letters. It was found at last impossible to submit to these things, and Mr. Duffy had to be dismissed.

COLONEL FRENCH thought his hon. Friend the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had made out a good case for the appointment of the proposed Committee of Inquiry. He (Colonel French) thought the Post Office Department ought to have given his hon. Friend the explanation which the Secretary to the Treasury had just given to the House.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that after the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury the hon. Member for King's County would withdraw his Motion. There was no occasion on which the Government more required to be supported than in dealing with such cases as the present. It was easy enough to get rid of officers who had been guilty of some actual offence; but very difficult to clear the Civil Service of persons who are, like this gentleman, complained of twenty times in two years, and really not worth their salaries.

INDIA—MADRAS IRRIGATION COMPANY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STANSFELD said, he rose to call attention to the circumstances under which the sum of £600,000 was agreed to be advanced on loan, in May, 1866, to the Madras Irrigation Company, by the then Secretary of State for India (Earl De Grey), and to make an explanatory statement. He would have been in his place on the evening when the hon. Mem-

er for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) brought forward this subject had not the terms of the Notice which the hon. Member had put on the Paper been such as to convey to his mind the impression that the hon. Gentleman excepted from that Motion the period during which Earl De Grey filled the office of Secretary of State for India. He found that there existed in the minds of some persons an idea that, under the original agreement made with the Company by Lord Stanley in 1858, the Company were, in the first instance, to take a profit of 25 per cent, and that not until that profit had been earned were the Government to share in the returns. That was an entire misconception. The profits were to be divided equally between the company and the Government, after the payment of the guaranteed interest of 5 per cent. Next, as to what had been said about Lord Halifax having allowed interest to be paid from the moment the capital was paid into the Indian Treasury, he must observe that, under the agreement made by Lord Stanley with the Company, the payment of interest was to commence from that moment. Coming to the charge that when the £600,000 was agreed to be advanced in 1866 the Company had collapsed, and the Secretary of State bolstered them up with that loan, he had to say that undoubtedly no profits had been made by the company up to that time, and for this reason—that their works were not completed. But the only way in which the Company had collapsed was, that the rough estimate for the works had been exceeded; that the £1,000,000—the amount at which they had been estimated—had been spent; and that money was required to finish the undertaking. He denied that Earl De Grey had yielded to the demands of the company. On the contrary, he made a counter-proposition, based on a true conception of the interests of the Government and the people of India. It was well known that Lord Halifax had always been opposed to the undertaking of works of irrigation by private companies, and the same view of the subject was taken by Earl De Grey. The Company came to Lord Halifax in 1863, and requested assistance or facilities for raising further capital. By the terms of the contract made in 1863, the Company were to be at liberty to raise more capital, though without guarantee; but, under such circumstances, they failed in their attempt to raise additional capital, whereupon they applied again to Lord Halifax in October, 1865, and asked that the obligation they were under to re-pay out of the profits the advances of guaranteed interest to the Indian Government should be postponed to the right of the guaranteed and unguaranteed shareholders to earn 12 instead of 5 per cent. This proposal was left by Lord Halifax to be considered by Lord De Grey, who declined to accede to it. But it was obviously the policy of the Secretary of State to secure the completion of the works by this Company for a limited sum and within a reasonable period, or else to acquire the right of paying off the Company, and taking the works into the hands of the Government of India. That policy was carried out in the proposal which was made to the Company and accepted by them, and by which the Government acquired the rights and advantages they at present possessed. By the contract under the seal of the Secretary of State, he undertook to advance to the Company sums of not less than £5,000 on demand on their debenture notes payable five years after date—on the whole, to an extent not exceeding £600,000; these amounts to be applied to the completion of the irrigation canal between two specified points—on the understanding that, in case of the non-completion of that section of the works in five years, and for the sum to be advanced, the Secretary of State for India should have the right to enter upon these works and oust the Company, paying them in Indian stock at market price for the capital invested in the works in question; but, if the Company succeed in completing the works in the time specified, the whole profits accruing to it, from whatever source, would be liable, in the first instance, to payment of the interest due to the Secretary of State on the debenture debt; and, secondly, falling back on the contract of 1863, the irrigation profits would be liable for the guaranteed interest of 5 per cent, and next to pay the Secretary of State the long standing and very considerable arrears of guaranteed interest which he had been compelled to advance; and then, and not till then, would the Company be entitled to earn more than 5 per cent. He believed he had demonstrated that the proposal which had been made by Earl De Grey was a wise and prudent arrangement for the Government and the people of India. The word “swindle” had been applied to the Madras Irrigation Company, and it had been said that the India Office was surrounded with jobbers. He protested against the application of such reckless and unfounded expressions to honourable men engaged in a work of great public utility. The directors were bound to look to the interests of the shareholders; but they had met the Secretary of State frankly, and should not be grudged the assistance necessary to enable them to complete the work. In conclusion, the hon. Gentleman deprecated the harsh remarks applied on Monday evening to the directors of the Madras Irrigation Company.

MR. SMOLLETT said, that the Resolution which he had moved on Monday last was not precisely the same in terms as the one which he had placed upon the Notice Paper some time previously, inasmuch as it implied the adoption of a certain course of policy by Lord Halifax instead of by Earl De Grey, and that was perhaps the reason why the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had not on that occasion come down to the House to answer him. The House had, however, now heard the explanation of the hon. Member, and so far as it went it was satisfactory. He (Mr. Smollett) would take a future opportunity of moving that the proposals first made to the Irrigation Company by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs) should be laid upon the table of the House. His (Mr. Smollett's) statement was that in 1859 a deputation of adventurers proposed to the Secretary of State for India to relieve the Government of India from making large irrigation works out of the Government Treasury, and solicited permission to make the works by means of a company which should simply reap the profits of the undertaking. Nine years elapsed, and it appeared that not a shilling had been advanced bond fide by the Company, but that these irrigation works had been paid for out of the public treasury, and not a sixpence of interest on the Government advances had been received.

MR. STANSFELD said, that the money had been advanced by the Company.

MR. SMOLLETT: Yes; advanced by the Company on a guarantee that the Government would pay 5 per cent interest. This was, in reality, a Government loan. He contended that at the end of 1871 the Government will have made themselves answerable for £2,000,000 sterling and upwards, while these private adventurers would not have made themselves answerable for a single shilling. No profits had up to this time been derived from these works, and no one who knew anything of India would be deluded by the statement that if we would wait a while, profits would come. Irrigation works yielded profit immediately on their completion, if they were well-constructed and well-conducted. But these works never would yield any profit, because they were ill-devised, ill-engineered, and conducted by men who could not realize profits.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he had never heard a speech—to use the mildest term—so full of inaccuracies as that made the other night by the hon. Member who had just spoken. They could not be sustained before a Select Committee.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. Member was out of order in referring to a speech in a previous debate.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would add nothing to what had been stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), except with regard to what the Company asked for from Earl De Grey and Lord Halifax. All that they had asked of the Government was a slight relaxation of the contract, in order that they might raise unguaranteed capital to enable them to complete works that had proved to be of enormous difficulty. The Government had guaranteed £100,000,000 for the construction of railways in India, and could it grudge to guarantee £600,000 for the construction of works which would save the lives of millions of our fellow-subjects? The works were now progressing rapidly, and the result would be most beneficial to India.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

NOTICE.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I go to give notice that to-morrow, I shall put a Question to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell), with regard to the Resolutions on the subject of the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, of which notice has been given in the other House of Parliament. I need scarcely say that, in asking that Question, I do not intend myself to enter in any degree, or to invite any of your Lordships to enter, into any discussion of the merits of those Resolutions. My Question will only be as to the course of proceeding which is intended to be taken by those who are the chief promoters of the Resolutions. At the same time, I shall ask the noble Earl for some explanation of a passage in a speech which he delivered a short time ago at a public meeting with regard to a transaction which occurred many years ago, with respect to which, I think, he is under a misapprehension, and that on a point which is of considerable and constitutional importance. I do not propose to ask your Lordships to express an opinion upon either of these subjects. I merely wish to put to the noble Earl these Questions, of which I have already given him private notice.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the Motion of the CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES ordered—

That no Private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a Second Time after Friday the 12th Day of June next:

That no Bill confirming any Provisional Order of the Board of Health, or authorizing any Inclosure of Lands under Special Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, or confirming any Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, shall be read a Second Time after Tuesday the 16th Day of June next:

That no Bill confirming any Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under the General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861, shall be read a Second Time after Tuesday the 16th Day of June next:

That when a Bill shall have passed this House with Amendments, these Orders shall not apply to any new Bill sent up from the House of Commons which the Chairman of Committees shall report to the House is substantially the same as the Bill so amended.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, before we proceed to the public business of the evening, I think it my duty to call your Lordships' attention to a subject which must have been painfully present to all your minds during the last two or three days—I mean the atrocious attempt on the life of his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. I am sure your Lordships heard of that attempt with indignation and sorrow, and I think you will be anxious, in a public form, to show Her Majesty how you sympathize with her anxiety, and the horror which that attempt has universally aroused. My Lords, the crime, which a merciful Providence has prevented from attaining the consummation which was intended, is one of no common description, because its inherent atrocity is aggravated by the fact that, had it been consummated, it would have been perfectly fruitless to the assassin in its results. No political consequences could have ensued from it. It could have changed no dynasty. It could have removed no obnoxious Minister. It could have altered even no unpopular law; and the innocent victim who was condemned to death by this criminal had, so far as we know, given no cause of offence to the man who sought his life. It is, therefore, my intention to move that we address Her Majesty, expressing our sympathy with Her Majesty on this painful occasion, and the horror we feel at the crime which has been committed. Your Lordships, I am sure, will bear with gratification, though without surprise, that Her Majesty received the shock of the intelligence with the courage and calmness characteristic of herself and of her race. My Lords, I move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the Expression of the Sorrow and Indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious Attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh while on a Visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt Congratulations to Her Majesty on his Preservation from mortal injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the Sympathy of this House in her Majesty's present Anxiety, and of their earnest Hope for the speedy Recovery of His Royal Highness."

EARL RUSSELL: If the noble Earl will permit me, I should wish to second the Motion he has just made—to congratulate Her Majesty on the failure of this most dreadful attempt. The noble Earl has very justly said that no purpose could have been answered by it; but this wretched conspiracy of Fenians, having no power to effect anything against the authority of the Crown or Government, appears to have taken a general licence to commit the crime of murder in any part of the world. I, therefore, entirely agree with the Address to Her Majesty which the noble Earl has moved.

Resolved and Ordered, Nemine Dissentiente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the Expression of the Sorrow and Indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious Attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh while on a Visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt Congratulations to Her Majesty on his Preservation from mortal Injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the Sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present Anxiety, and of their earnest Hope for the speedy Recovery of His Royal Highness.

EDUCATION BILL—(No. 53.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time said, that, in laying it on the table, he had stated his views so fully he did not now think it necessary to trouble their Lordships with any additional observations.

—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in moving that the Bill be read the second time that day three months, said, he could assure the noble Duke that he had been most unwilling to take any step which might appear wanting in courtesy to him by the short Notice he had given of his present Motion. He gave his Notice immediately on his return to town—he could not give it before Easter because he did not know what effect the division on the Irish Church Resolutions would have on the Government. He had examined the Bill with great care, and he found in it only two provisions which could not be effected by Minutes of the Privy Council. First, it proposed the appointment of a Minister of Education who was to be a Secretary of State; and, secondly, it made provision for taking what was called an "educational Census." Now, such a Census would no doubt be a very good thing; but he did not think the machinery provided for taking it was the best that could be devised. Those points, however, did not go to the principle of the Bill, and could be, perhaps, better discussed in Committee than on the present occasion. He was very glad the Government had put a Conscience Clause in the Bill, although he wished they had gone a little further in that direction. He hoped before the Session was over there would be an extended Conscience Clause applied imperatively to every school receiving public money, and that to this end they would have the valuable assistance of the right rev. Bench. He said this because his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had stated that he had been informed by a very rev. Prelate that the great majority of the clergy of the Church of England were in favour of a Conscience Clause, and that it was only a small but active minority who were opposed to it. A very eminent Member of the Government (Sir John Pakington) was in favour of a Conscience Clause much more extensive than that contained in this Bill. The right hon. Baronet had prepared a draft Report in which it was proposed that no building grant should be made to any school in regard to which there was not a Conscience Clause; and further that if, on investigation, it should be found that the children of Dissenters attending a National School had been compelled either to submit to religious teaching to which the parents object, or to attend the Church or the Church School, the Minister should be empowered in his discretion to suspend the annual grant to such school. As to the Bill itself it might truly be said that, with some minor alterations and additions, it was intended merely to embody in an Act of Parliament what was known as the Revised Code. This appeared to him to be not only unnecessary but mischievous; and it was the more remarkable inasmuch as it had been stated by the author of that Code that it never would have passed if it had been necessary that its provisions should be embodied in an Act of Parliament. By one provision of the Bill, schools with uncertificated teachers might receive a grant. Now that could be done a present by a Minute of the Privy Council, and more expediently done that way than by Act of Parliament, because, if the arrangement did not answer, could then be easily altered. He also thought it better to leave the increase or diminution of the building grant in like manner to the discretion of the Education Committee of the Privy Council. He had no objection to the appointment of a Minister of Education, if work enough were given to that functionary to perform, and if they clothed him with active powers. If he had, for instance, the initiative in matters of elementary education, the control of endowed schools and of educational charities, then he might possibly have work enough for a Cabinet Minister; but if he were to be tied down within the narrow corners of the present Bill, the work might just as well be done by a permanent Under Secretary with an efficient staff of clerks. He was of opinion that it was an objection to the Bill that it was intended, as stated by the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) in introducing the measure, to make the existing system a national system. While it must be admitted that the present system had effected much good, yet it must be at the same time allowed that it had several grave defects. It was very extravagant system—it had a needless multiplication of schools and schoolmasters and Inspectors; and he understood that the other night the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the increase in the Civil Service Estimates was partially due to the Vote for Education. There was also inequality in the way in which it pressed on those who maintained the schools, and there was a total absence of that local organization, which the best judges of the matter had always said was absolutely necessary for the efficient working of a national system. Again, the present system did not meet the requirements of those districts which most required assistance; nor it was in the great towns, and not in the rural districts that the machinery for extending the advantages of education was most wanted. Neither did the Bill check expenditure, but tended greatly to increase it. He did not wish to see the present system interfered with where it was working well, for it had done a considerable amount of good; but when they were going to occupy new ground they ought to adopt a system founded on a sounder basis, and which would prove more efficient. He thought there was an overwhelming preponderance of opinion among persons well informed on the subject

against the expediency and possibility of extending the present system so as to make it national. Last year it was stated in the second Report of the Scotch Education Commission that—

“Upon the whole we think it must be admitted that the Privy Council system neither is, nor can it by any alteration be enlarged into, a national system.”

Two years ago a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the subject of Education at the instance of Sir John Pakington, and before that Committee a great number of witnesses were examined—among others Mr. Lingen, who gave it as his opinion that it would be impossible to extend the present system throughout the whole country; that we must fall back upon local organization of some kind, and that he considered the organization of the parish schools in Scotland a type well worth studying for this country. He went on to say that he should prefer the local organization, which would have the best chance of being adopted in this country. Whether it were based on the county, the union, or the parish he should look upon as a matter of comparative indifference. Again, the Rev. William Kennedy, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors for Lancashire, with an experience of twenty years, declared that he saw no other mode, after long consideration, by which assistance could be extended to neglected districts; that he was of opinion that a feeling was springing up in favour of rate-supported schools, and that he thought it absolutely necessary to constitute local bodies for the management of the schools; adding that he did not see that the religious difficulty need interfere with the plan, provided the Conscience Clause was universally imposed, and that he was strongly in favour of that being done. Such were the opinions not only of an Inspector of great experience, but of a clergyman of the Church of England; and it was not only his individual opinion, but he believed that the majority of the clergy of the Church of England were not opposed to the Conscience Clause, stating it to be the result of his experience, as an Inspector in Lancashire, that he knew only of one clergyman there who would not act upon it in his schools. The noble Earl below him, he might add, then Lord John Russell, submitted to the House of Commons, in 1856, a series of Resolutions, the 7th, 8th, and 9th of which were as follows:—

"7. That it is expedient that in any school district where the means of education arising from endowment, subscription, grants, and school pence shall be found deficient, and shall be declared to be so by the Committee of Privy Council for Education, the ratepayers should have the power of taxing themselves for the erection and maintenance of a school or schools.

"8. That, after the 1st of January, 1858, when any school district shall have been declared to be deficient in adequate means for the education of the poor the Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county, city, or borough should have power to impose a school rate.

"9. That where a school rate is imposed a school committee elected by the ratepayers, should appoint the schoolmasters and mistresses, and make regulations for the management of the schools."—[3 Hansard, cxi. 1971.]

Now, such were the Resolutions proposed by the noble Earl twelve years ago, and he had not, he believed, since changed his opinions on the subject. Sir John Pakington was also in favour of rate-supported schools; while a meeting which was recently held at Manchester, at which the compulsory rating principle was advocated, was largely attended by clergymen, by whom no disapproval of it was expressed. For his own part, knowing how well it had worked in Scotland, he must confess that he was strongly attached to the rating principle, and as a landowner, and looking only at the results of the system in a pecuniary point of view, he felt that he gained more by having a well-educated tenantry and labourers on his estate than he should have had to pay in consequence of any charge which was imposed on him to secure that object. If they wished to extend education throughout the country, and they were driven to choose between the Bill of the Government and that of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce) in the other House, he should greatly prefer the latter. The two were totally different in principle—one must kill the other. Entertaining those views, and believing that the Bill of the Government was a complete abnegation of the principle that the State ought to educate the people, he should move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months.")—(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that not having been present when this Bill was introduced, and not having had an opportunity before of expressing an opinion upon it, he was desirous of tendering his best thanks to the noble Duke and to Her Majesty's Government for bringing forward a Bill characterized by so many good proposals, and so well calculated to promote the cause of education. He was himself in favour of the Bill, and that for some of the reasons which had been urged against it by the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie). He looked upon it, in the first place, as a step in the right direction, inasmuch as it placed matters of great importance in connection with education on a somewhat settled footing, so that the promoters of schools might with some certainty know how they were situated, instead of being liable, as hitherto, to the disadvantages arising from repeated changes at the caprice of the Privy Council. As to the Conscience Clause as framed in the Bill, he could only say that it met his own individual views, and he believed the views of a very large portion of the clergy; but he believed there was a large portion of the clergy who would not be satisfied with the Conscience Clause proposed in the other Bill. If by means of such a measure a long vexed question could be set at rest, as he trusted it might, a great benefit would, he thought, be conferred on the Church and on the nation. He was glad, he might add, that rating clauses were not included among its provisions, inasmuch as he was of opinion that their introduction would be premature, until after the proposed general Census was taken, and the educational wants of the country thus accurately ascertained; for there were facts before them which would show, if he were not mistaken, that in the different dioceses of England there was a much larger number of the children of the poor now brought under the influence of education than was supposed. He did not think it necessary to go into the details on which the noble Earl (the Earl of Airlie) had touched; if there were any defects they might be remedied in Committee; but he thought there were some very essential provisions in this Bill, well calculated to help forward the cause of education, and he was prepared to give the measure his hearty support.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that to a certain extent he concurred in the opinions expressed by his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie) in regard to the Bill. Some of the details of the measure seemed to be extremely useful, and reflected credit on the Government; but it was much to be lamented that they had thought it necessary to embody the whole system of ducation, with all its mass of details, in Bill. He should have thought that the whole history of elementary education in his country, and the present position of the question of education showed that, at all events, the time had not yet arrived when they could advantageously stereotype all the principles and the details connected with their system in an Act of Parliament. There had been so many differences of opinion and minor difficulties to overcome in the history of elementary education in his country, that it had been mainly owing to the tentative nature of the system that education had been developed to its present extent; and on the whole it had been attended with great success. He regretted, therefore, that the Government now proposed to Parliament such a departure from that mode of proceeding. His noble Friend behind him had spoken with great force as to the inconvenience that would be felt if, when some slight variation was needed in the elaborate management clauses contained in that Bill, or when some other minor change of that kind was wanted, they must come before Parliament with a Bill for the purpose of making it. The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) seemed to think that great advantage would be derived from the Bill by the knowledge it would afford to the clergy and the ministers of other denominations as to the nature of the rules that were to be followed. He was surprised at that statement, because the existing Revised Code had been fully discussed in Parliament, possessed very much the character of an Act of Parliament, and was as well known to the clergy as any Act of Parliament could be; and he should have thought the information to be found in the one would be as easily found in the other. The most rev. Prelate had spoken with feelings of satisfaction of the Conscience Clause as it stood in the Bill; but, for himself, he thought it was far from embodying the only just principle which should regulate the application of grants of public money for educational purposes. That principle, he held, ought to be this—that in every case where grants of public money were made for the purposes of education, full liberty ought to be given to the children of all denominations to attend the schools without any interference with the conscientious convictions of the parents. He could not understand on what possible ground they could defend a regulation that would apply only to cases in which building grants were made, and should not be applicable to instances in which public money was given in aid of schools in other shapes. Surely, conscientious feelings were as much entitled to respect in the one case as in the other? With regard to the proposed extension of the grants to districts and schools which did not now participate in them, he thought the Government had taken a wise step, and he did not quarrel with them because they did it in a tentative manner. It was wise to endeavour to remedy those educational deficiencies which existed in poor country districts, where a difficulty was now experienced in providing schools. Another part of the Bill which he wished to notice related to the educational Census. On reading the Bill, when he arrived at Part II., and read attentively the most elaborate provisions which it made for an educational Census, he could not help coming to the conclusion that there must have originally been a third part to the measure, which had since been abandoned; for, after providing a most elaborate machinery for obtaining statistical information as to the state of education in the various parts of the country, there the matter was abruptly left by the Bill. He believed they would never provide a remedy for those defects which were so much felt in those districts where voluntary zeal did not supply the necessary means of education, without having recourse to some form or other of rating. It was said the introduction of rating in any shape would destroy voluntary zeal; but surely this meant no more than a rating system would prove so much superior to the voluntary system that the latter would be abandoned. But he thought they were apt to attach rather too much importance to voluntary efforts for the support of schools, valuable though they were. He never could see how it should be regarded as so extremely satisfactory that in all parts of the country just those persons who were most generous, and who, like the clergy, were called upon from their position to make efforts of that kind, should have the whole burden thrown on them, and that the great mass of the community who were well able to pay should escape from contributing to a charge which was for the universal public benefit. He thought it would probably be wise in the first instance by a permissive Act to enable certain districts to rate themselves for the purpose of education, and the opportunity would then be afforded of judging whether the system might not be carried further. He admitted that it would be unfair to those who, under the voluntary system, had laid out their money in providing schools, to turn round suddenly and abandon the whole of the present system; but he thought that where that system had failed to provide a sufficiency of schools it might be supplemented by rating. He could not help thinking that this measure was due to the great stir which had been made in the country on the subject of education, and a consequent resolution of the Government to produce what should appear to be a great scheme. With respect to the appointment of a Minister of Education, he was at a loss to know what was to become of the Lord President of the Council under that proposal. The Lord President of the Council had no overwhelming work to do now; and when his duties as an Educational Minister were taken away, his office would be reduced very nearly to a sinecure. Perhaps it might be intended, after the adoption of this proposal, that the office of the Lord Privy Seal and that of the President of the Council should be combined. He approved of some of the details of the Bill; but, on the whole, he felt it his duty to support the Amendment.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he objected altogether to the rating system of education, and thought that at the present conjuncture, when they were about to abolish rating for the support of the Church, it was most unwise and impolitic. If they introduced the system of rating in regard to education, they would be making the minority submit to the will of the majority in a matter which moved men's consciences quite as deeply as church rates did. Moreover, the existing burden of taxation, which was every year being augmented, already pressed very severely on the country districts, and he trusted the Legislature would not, by adopting the proposal of his noble Friend, add another element to the inequality that already existed. He questioned whether a rating system would work satisfactorily; and by reducing the management to a matter of routine we should do away with the social influence which attended the voluntary system. And until they were satisfied that the voluntary system, aided by the Parliamentary grants, had failed they would do well not to have recourse to a system of rating. The deficiencies which existed were not, he thought, so great as was sometimes represented; for the number of parishes having no school was comparatively small, and mostly contained but a small population. He saw no necessity of superseding the functions of the Committee of Council; and while thinking it desirable to embody some of the regulations, such as those affecting the religious susceptibilities of the people in an Act of Parliament, he thought others should be of a more elastic character, in order that changes might be made in them from time to time. The education of the Irish Roman Catholic population in our towns was a question which ought to be seriously grappled with; for it must be remembered that comparatively few of their fellow-countrymen of the upper and middle classes were settled among us, and that their necessities, therefore, could not be so well met by their co-religionists as was the case with Dissenters. Although he did not approve of the Bill as a whole he hoped it would be allowed to go into Committee, where he thought many of its provisions would be materially amended.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it was generally understood that the second reading of a Bill implied assent to its principles and to its main provisions; but there were many measures as to which it was difficult to say what were their principles or main provisions, consisting, as they did, of details, though those details might involve principles of a most important kind. The Amendment raised the question, to what category did this Bill belong? The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) who introduced it, admitted very fairly that it was not a measure of very great importance, but stated that, though in itself of small scope and extent, it was a step in the right direction; and the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) appeared to take the same view of it. Now, he (the Duke of Argyll) should not object to this or any other Bill on the ground that it was a specimen of what was called bit-by-bit legislation, for nothing was ever accomplished in this country in any other manner. Instead of following out some abstract principle to its legitimate conclusions, we waited until evils had accumulated so as to be unbearable, and then adopted some small measure, which was followed up by others, on the ground that such and such principles had already been sanctioned. But he asked their Lordships to consider the position in which England was placed in regard to education. It could not be said that any national system of education existed in England: and he believed it would, at a future time, be a matter of astonishment that, alone among the enlightened nations of Europe, this country should have advanced to its present stage of civilization without any legislative provision for the education of its people. In Scotland there was a system which, though now inadequate to the requirements of the population, was in theory and practice strictly and truly a national system, enforced by the Legislature for the benefit of the people, and founded upon public rates. No such system had ever been adopted in England; nor was this absence of legislative provision justified by the existence of any other sufficient machinery. We allowed things to go on until we at last awoke to the fact that hundreds of thousands of the people were growing up to manhood without any education whatever, and it was the alarm occasioned by the consciousness of that fact some twenty years ago or more that induced the Government of that time, failing a national system of education, to adopt the principle of rates in aid to be given out of the Consolidated Fund to the various religious bodies. The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough), in his speech the other evening, quoted some very interesting, though not wholly accurate, statistics to show that through the stimulating zeal of the various religious bodies very great and successful efforts had been made to provide for the elementary education of the people. Now, he (the Duke of Argyll) for one, had never shared in the objections which had been taken to the principle of the Minutes in Council by some members of the Liberal party—namely, that the whole principle was false, as being based upon the principle of what was called sectarian education. It was, in his opinion, perfectly just and natural that the various religious bodies of the country should concern themselves with the elementary education of their own people, and he considered it rather an advantage than otherwise that secular education should be conducted in connection with definite systems of religious belief. That being the case, and this principle having been so long in operation, and vested interests of great magnitude being now established in connection with religious bodies, he was not an advocate for any system of national education which should attempt to upset that system altogether, but would desire

rather, if possible, to supplement it. For, after all, what was the real objection to the operation of the present system? It was not an objection to its principle, it was simply this—that it was inadequate; it would not cover the ground which they desired to see covered; it was insufficient for the education of the whole people. He was afraid that this insufficiency of the denominational system was a state of things which was incident to the condition of our society, and to the relation in which the people stood to the various religious bodies. If it were true that the whole population of this country belonged to one or other of the religious sects, then it might be possible for those bodies to take charge of the religious education of the whole population. But they all knew—indeed, it was a notorious fact—that there were millions of the people of this country who did not belong to any particular religious body, and he was afraid, therefore, that it was in vain to hope that a system rigorously confined to the circle of religious feeling and of ecclesiastical action could be able to undertake the education of the whole population of the country. He thought his noble Friend on the cross Benches (the Earl of Harrowby) was rather sanguine in thinking that this system, without modification or change, could possibly educate the whole population. His noble Friend had referred to America to show that a system founded on rates involved great evils; but here he (the Duke of Argyll) would observe that a system of rates need not be such as to supersede the efforts of religious bodies. It was quite possible to have a system of rates which should be ancillary to the system of the Churches. But if his noble Friend wished to exhibit to the House the operation of rates, why did he think it necessary to cross the Atlantic and not the Tweed? There they had a system of rates without any of the ill effects to which his noble Friend had referred, though in Scotland the people were divided into many religious bodies, and sectarian animosity had often prevailed among them. With regard to education in the great towns—for, after all, this was the case for which they had especially to provide—and if there was any necessity for education at all it was for the population of our great cities—he desired to say a few words. In Glasgow, one of the largest cities in the kingdom—and though the zeal of the religious bodies was as keen in Scotland as in any part of the kingdom—the Royal Commission reported that little more than a third of the children of school age attended schools of any kind, and with regard to school accommodation there was less than sufficient for one-half the children of school age. In Glasgow, there were in one district 80,000 children, with only four or five schools. So in England what they had to deal with was the inadequacy of the existing system; it was that that called for legislation, and any Bill whatever that might be passed would be useless unless it was sufficient to meet that necessity of the case. Now, what was there in this Bill to meet that necessity? Nothing whatever. It did not even give the power of assessment; and he would say that the very minimum of what Parliament ought to do should be to give the municipal bodies of our great towns the power to assess themselves for the maintenance of schools. If he had said this a few years ago, or even last year, the answer would have been that the principle of assessment was wholly inconsistent with the principle that secular education must be conducted in connection with the various religious bodies. But he was glad that this year one step at least had been taken by Her Majesty's Government which removed that objection altogether; for he understood the noble Duke the President of the Council the other day to say that the Government had made up their minds to allow purely secular schools—schools not in connection with any religious body, and schools in which no religion should be taught. That was a most important step, involving principles which would be quoted in future, with reference to other measures which would be pressed upon the attention of Parliament. If they had made up their minds to give public money in aid of schools giving purely secular education, what excuse would they have for not going a step further, and giving to the great municipal bodies the power of assessing themselves for the support of such schools? Well, the noble Duke the President of the Council—the greater part of whose speech the other evening, he must say, was occupied with reasons why nothing should be done—had stated with regard to this particular measure that he could not advise Parliament to give the power of assessment to the great cities, because, in many cases, the rates in those places already amounted to as much as 5s. or 6s. in the pound. What was the consequence to be deduced from that argument? Either that the great cities of England were so poor that they could not or would not educate their destitute children, or that the education of the many destitute children was not an object sufficiently important to justify even a still larger assessment. But did the noble Duke think the great cities of England would object to the necessary assessment, and would be content to leave themselves in their present condition? In his opinion, the noble Duke might leave it to the municipal bodies to judge for themselves with respect to the assessment. In this respect, therefore, the Bill was entirely valueless. But he would go further, and say that the embodiment in an Act of Parliament of the details of the New Code would be not only of no benefit, but would entail positive mischief as regarded education. He had had the honour of being a Member of the Committee of Privy Council which drew up the New Code, and he had no doubt, and never had a doubt, of the essential soundness of the principles on which that Code was founded. The Royal Commission in Scotland had reported to the effect that there were no insuperable difficulties in the way of the practical application of those principles to the education of the people. He held it to be a sound principle that the public money should be given only in support of schools which could prove that they were doing the work that Parliament intended that they should do. But, notwithstanding, he did not wish to see the New Code embodied in an Act of Parliament. He agreed with two of his noble Friends, that, failing a national system, the present was the best they could get; but he was thoroughly convinced, also, of the truth of what his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Airlie) had said, that if it had been necessary to pass those Minutes of Council through Parliament, even that makeshift of a system which now existed they would never have obtained. This resulted from the obvious fact that even a very small party in Parliament possessed a great power of obstruction. Their Lordships were aware that the Minutes of Council, involving as they did the principle of equal and indiscriminate support to all religious bodies for educational purposes, were at first viewed with the greatest jealousy by the great body of the Church of England. But to stereotype all the principles of the New Code in an Act of Parliament was taking a step backward, instead of forward. Turning to that part of the Bill which related to the Conscience Clause, he asked whether that was not also a retrograde step. He could assure the most rev. Prelate opposite who had spoken in support of this Bill, that he entirely sympathized with him and with those religious bodies who claimed to have intrusted to themselves the conduct of the religious education of their own children. An arbitrary interference with the teaching of the children belonging to the various religious bodies would be most unjustifiable; but, on the other hand, he thought that the State had a right to say that the public money should not be given to any school which did not promise that all children who attended it should have the benefit of its secular education without having its peculiar religious tenets forced upon them. The exaction of such a promise as the condition upon which the assistance of the State would be given to any particular school would be not adverse, but in the highest degree favourable to the various Christian Churches in this country. When persons were convinced that secular education was fairly and honestly offered to their children without any religious instruction being forced upon them, they would be all the more disposed to send their children to the school without conditions, where they would fall under the influence of that Christian teaching from which they would otherwise be entirely withdrawn. Acting under this belief, he entreated all those who represented the various branches of the Church of Christ in this country to accept the principle of the Conscience Clause, not grudgingly, nor jealously, nor half-heartedly, but freely and willingly. He would remind their Lordships that upwards of a century ago the General Assembly of the Established Church in Scotland decided that Roman Catholic children should be admitted into the parish schools in the Highlands, on the terms that no religious teaching was to be forced upon them, and he trusted that this wise and generous example would be followed by all religious bodies in this country. But, instead of adopting this large and high view, the Conscience Clause in the Bill before the House contained a string of narrow-minded and jealous restrictions, and breathed a spirit, he would say, which was most inimical to the interests of the Church of England. Instead of the Secretary of State being directed to distribute the public money solely among those schools which promised to give secular without enforcing religious education, it was left to him to exercise his discretion in five or six different contingencies, all of them turning on questions which were rather questions of opinion than of fact. Thus, by the 12th clause of the Bill, the Secretary of State was only empowered to insist on the Conscience Clause in case he found that the school was the only school available for the people. He must then make up his mind whether there were other schools within "convenient" distances, the distance not being specified in the Bill. Next, he must consider whether, within the "convenient distances," there was any "considerable" number of Dissenters, or if there was another school "suitable" for those Dissenters. In all other cases, he might at discretion do away with the Conscience Clause altogether. But while contending that the principle of a Conscience Clause should be adopted in all schools, he (the Duke of Argyll) felt that the carrying of it into effect must be left to the honour and discretion of the religious bodies, and he trusted that it would have the support of the clergy of the Church of England. This Bill was a very small measure; but what was worse, it was a step in the wrong direction. Its faults were the more important when it was remembered that it was the first attempt to legislate upon education, all former proceedings having been based upon the Minutes of Council. The structure of the Bill should therefore be looked upon with the utmost jealousy. It involved a retrograde principle, and, therefore their Lordships should not give it a second reading. Should his noble Friend press his Motion to a division, he should feel bound to vote against the second reading of the Bill; but, in any case, he could not refrain from expressing his earnest hope that this measure would never pass into a law nor receive the sanction of their Lordships or of the other House of Parliament.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN expressed his regret that one clause of the Bill recognized the principle of giving aid to schools taught by an uncertificated teacher. That was called free trade in education; but the noble Duke who had just spoken (the Duke of Argyll) had said in a book he had written that the rules of political economy must occasionally give way to a higher law. The principle of requiring certificates from teachers was adopted in all the most civilized countries of the world; and Mr. Fraser had shown that considerable injury was done to the cause of education in the United States of America, because there the rule was not rigidly enforced. It was said, however, that there were in this country uncertificated teachers, who were performing their duties as efficiently as the teachers who had obtained certificates, and it was unjust to withhold, in such cases, the public money. Now, he must simply deny the fact. He did not believe there was any considerable number of instances. No doubt there were a number of schools not under inspection; but he believed those who had paid attention to the matter would not be prepared to say that schools not under inspection were likely to be very efficient schools. The diocesan Inspectors visited schools of all kinds, and, in his own diocese, the opinion was that although, perhaps, in each district one or two uncertificated teachers taught very fairly, yet there was no comparison between the efficiency of those who held certificates and those who did not. But if certificates were necessary as tests of capacity in teaching, they were still more important as guarantees of character. The holding of a certificate was a great guarantee of character. No one could have so clean a bill of moral health as the schoolmaster or mistress who held a certificate. He ventured to think they could not afford to part with that security for the moral fitness of a teacher for his work which a certificate supplied. They might depend upon it that, if they introduced the principle of paying for results without requiring a certificate, the number of certificated teachers would very rapidly diminish. The effect in country parishes would be that managers, seeing they could get a grant with an uncertificated teacher at a cheaper rate, would relieve themselves of the burden which now fell on them; the inducement for pupil-teachers to go into training would be diminished, and the price of certificated masters would proportionately be raised, while the standard of education in the schools would gradually, but surely, be lowered. And this they could not afford. He hoped the Government would not press this clause of the Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was not often in the habit of trespassing long on their Lordships' indulgence, and he had at present personal reasons for not desiring to remain long on his legs. He had stated on a previous occasion what occurred to him with regard to the different provisions of this Bill, and on further consideration he did not know that he should withdraw anything he then advanced. No doubt there was some difficulty in knowing what to do with the Bill at this stage. Several powerful speeches had been made against the second reading: on the other hand, the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had supported it, but then he approved it with reference to the Conscience clause only; while the noble Earl on the cross Bench (the Earl of Harrowby) disapproved of what the Bill would do, and highly approved of its not doing anything else. He regretted to perceive that whenever any plausible demand was made, if it could be met by a little increase in the grants of public money, without dissatisfying any particular class, it was too much the tendency of the Government to yield to it. This was a very pleasant process to the recipient, no doubt; and, although the taxpayer might grumble, no one seemed disposed to take on himself the invidious task of checking the needless expenditure which was thus incurred. He was not, however, by any means prepared to express a general condemnation of the Bill. He approved the extension of the grants to secular schools, which had hitherto been denied that aid. He believed that was just and right, and he was very much obliged to the Government for having so met the sort of prejudice which existed on this subject. He also approved the system of grants to evening schools: he believed that was quite right. The step proposed with reference to building grants was a right step; but it was more doubtful. He believed, however, that it would be a great advantage to have good school buildings all over the country. Then came the most important question of certificated teachers. He felt unmitigated pleasure in hearing what the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lincoln) said on this subject, and no one was better entitled to speak on the subject of education. He said that infinite mischief would result from what he called the thin edge of the wedge, by admitting uncertificated masters. This he thought a matter of great importance; and though, by allowing the employment of uncertificated teachers, some schools might be helped, they would be very few; for there was scarcely a schoolmaster or schoolmistress at all fit to teach who might not obtain the lowest class of certificate. There had been complaints made against the late Government for instituting the principle of payment by results ; but the fact was that the practice which they had adopted might more correctly be described as that of non-payment for non-results. The object of the existing system was to take care that the money given by the State should be expended for the purpose of securing the greatest possible efficiency. If the necessity for a certificate were dispensed with, a man without any character at all might start a school ; and if he were only able to produce children who could read, write, and count, he would get the public grant. Another point of importance had reference to the appointment of a Minister of Education, and the desirability of such an appointment had been very much urged by some of those who took an interest in the cause of education. He, however, had great doubts as to the expediency of an appointment of that kind. He was aware it was said that no one knew who were the Lords of Council, or what was the amount of their responsibility ; but he had not the slightest doubt whatever that if any great maladministration were at present to be detected in the Education Committee of the Privy Council, the person who would be subject to the severest Parliamentary censure on that account would be no other than the noble Duke the President of the Council. Technically and practically, the President was responsible for anything that went wrong ; and the admirable civil servants belonging to the Department, so long as they acted under their political chief, had absolutely no responsibility whatever. He might be asked how it was—if he entertained that opinion—that Mr. Lowe had resigned while he had retained his office when a Parliamentary censure was passed upon the conduct of the Council? But he believed he could offer a satisfactory explanation upon that point. He tendered his resignation upon that occasion, as Mr. Lowe did, to Lord Palmerston, who requested him to withdraw it. He (Earl Granville) stated that he could not do so unless Lord Palmerston could induce the House of Commons to withdraw the stigma they had attached to the Council. Lord Palmerston effected that object, and he (Earl Granville) accordingly withdrew his resignation ; whilst Mr. Lowe, who thought that he had been the subject of a personal censure, refused to adopt the same course. He was conscious that during his tenure of office he had been guilty of many sins both of commission and omission, but on the most careful reflection he did not believe that he should have avoided any one of them if he had been a Secretary of State instead of President of the Council. In reference to the appointment of a Minister of Education, he might further state that he thought it objectionable to multiply offices giving seats in the Cabinet, which he was disposed to think was already too large ; and it was also not without objection to increase the number of the Secretaries of State. That question had some bearing on a point to which two noble Lords had already referred—namely, with respect to stereotyping in an Act of Parliament the largest portion of the Revised Code. The Council were obliged to add supplementary rules after the Revised Code had been issued, and he defied any person who held the office of President of the Committee of the Council, who had a real view to the public interest, not to find himself constantly engaged in making slight improvements and filling up small gaps in the system to prevent it from falling into confusion. He was, on the other hand, aware that the noble Duke at the head of the Department might have felt that the concessions which he was asked to make would lead to concessions much more serious of public money, as well as to a diminution of the check upon public expenditure, and that he might have deemed it advisable to embody the whole of these matters in an Act of Parliament, because such a step might have the double effect of preventing the whole system from going backwards, and at the same time of preventing encroachment. But, be that as it might, he now came to the most important part of the Bill—the Conscience Clause. So important was it, that the considerations connected with it were of themselves sufficient to prevent him from voting against the second reading of the measure. His noble Friend who moved its rejection (the Earl of Airlie) had, indeed, shown that the Conscience Clause, as at present framed, was entirely unsatisfactory, and for his own part he (Earl Granville) thought that the wording of it must be amended, and that its scope must be extended. The whole of the Members sitting on the Liberal side in the House of Commons were, he believed, in favour of a Conscience Clause, and the most eminent Members of the Government had at different times signified their adhesion to that view. The best arguments advanced in favour of such a clause had, he might add, emanated from the pens of clergymen; while the Commission to which he had already referred had strongly recommended its adoption in the case of endowed schools. But it was of still greater importance that, a Conscience Clause having been proposed by the Government as a Government, the second reading of the Bill in which it was embodied should be carried; for the passing of such a measure, even in its present imperfect shape, would, he felt, stop for ever that non possumus argument which was advanced to show that it was impossible the clergy could conscientiously accept such a clause. Of one thing he felt perfectly sure, and that was, that nothing was of greater importance for the Church of England, and nothing more certain to arrest the secularization of the children of this country, than the sanction by Parliament of a clause which largely satisfied the conscientious scruples and objections of the Nonconformist portion of the population. He was also desirous of voting for the second reading of the Bill because it was, he thought, impossible not to perceive the truth of the observation of the noble Earl on the cross Benches (the Earl of Kimberley) that it was only a portion of a scheme—in fact, the tragedy of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out; and if it were sent down to the other House modified and improved in a great many particulars, an excellent measure might be produced, quite consistent with its provisions; or, what was still better, the Bill might be brought back to their Lordships' House with the part of Hamlet re-inserted, and that with the sanction of the Government. His noble Friend (Earl Russell) concurred, he believed, in the view which he had expressed; and he ventured to appeal to his noble Friend behind not to press, under the circumstances, his Motion for the rejection of the Bill to a division.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, the noble Earl who had moved the Amendment (the Earl of Airlie) had adopted the somewhat unusual course of comparing the provisions of the measure under discussion with those of another which had not yet been brought under their Lordships' notice, but was in the other House of Parliament. He should not, however, follow the noble Earl into that comparison, but should confine his remarks to the other points more immediately bearing upon the Bill before the House. The first point to which he would advert was the objection taken to the proposition to create a Minister of Education. It seemed to be assumed that the proposal had reference simply to those duties which were now connected with Parliamentary Grants and with the administration of education as it was now conducted by the Committee of Council. He (the Duke of Marlborough) must confess that he should not deem it expedient to appoint such an official if his functions were to be confined simply to the performance of those duties. But their Lordships could scarcely fail to perceive that there was beyond the performance of those duties a very wide and important field to be taken into account. He need hardly remind the House of the various Commissions that had been appointed to inquire into the state of education throughout the country, and that within the scope of their inquiries came the primary schools, the Irish endowed schools, the middle class schools, the public schools, and the large grants in connection with them which it was the duty of the Privy Council to administer, and which now amounted to more than £900,000 a year. When they considered how various and important all these subjects were, he thought that Parliament could hardly deal with them except through the agency of some responsible Minister; and he thought the appointment of a responsible Minister of Education, capable of dealing with the subject in a comprehensive spirit, and of framing measures with the view of consolidating and uniting the different branches of primary and secondary education into one great whole, would be likely to be productive of the greatest possible advantage. The noble Earl who had just spoken had asked him, whether he was of opinion that the duties of the Committee of Council on Education could be better administered by a Secretary of State than, as was at present the case, by a President, assisted by a Vice President, and he (the Duke of Marlborough) must say he concurred with the noble Earl in thinking that they would not be so far as those duties went. But then, there were beyond those the important functions to which he had adverted, to which it was impossible for the President and Vice President of the Committee of Council, with the work which they had already on hand, adequately to devote their attention. A notion seemed to prevail that the President of the Council had little or nothing to do but to administer the Educational Grant and to preside over the Committee of Council on Education. But that was not so. Some time ago he prepared a Minute of what were the duties of the President of the Council which would show their Lordships what were the duties of that Department. Besides the Education Grants, the President of the Council had to attend to the subject of quarantine, the affairs of the Channel Islands, municipal charters and charters to companies and corporations, questions relating to diseases of cattle, University statutes, public health, the Diseases Prevention and Nuisances Removal Acts, the Medical Act of 1858, ecclesiastical schemes and representations, and a great variety of other matters. It might be safely said that if the Department of the Privy Council now intrusted with the administration of public health were enlarged, as it might be, by a consolidation of the statutes relating to that branch of business, an ample amount of occupation would be provided for the President of the Council, irrespective of those great subjects of education to which he had alluded. The next objection to which he would refer was that taken to the embodiment of the provisions of the Revised Code in an Act of Parliament; but their Lordships must understand that that part of the Bill was a necessary consequence of there being a Minister of Education. The Minister of Education took the place of the Committee of Council, and therefore the latter was no longer a body existing for the purpose of making Minutes. Those Minutes, therefore, must be reduced to Regulations and Orders of the Secretary of State; but what was to become of the Minutes which already existed? If the subject of education was henceforth to be committed to a Secretary of State, what legislative sanction could be given to the Revised Code, if it was to continue in force, unless it was included in an Act of Parliament?—for it now had no operation except as being a Minute of the Committee of Council. But it was said the Revised Code, by being placed in an Act of Parliament, would be thrown into the form of a hard and fast measure, incapable of improvement, and not as intelligible as it had hitherto been. Now, he thought their Lordships would admit that if ever there was a concatenation of regulations of an abstruse and complicated character it was the Revised Code in its present shape. It was, he might say without exaggeration, a mass of the greatest confusion, and any person reading it for the first time would find extreme difficulty in making head or tail of it. What the Government, however, proposed was to bring those parts of the Revised Code which had been proved by the test of experience to be those principles on which Parliament might safely act in the distribution of the Parliamentary Grant into a statute, but at the same time to give as much latitude and power of expansion as might be necessary to the Minister who presided over the Department. The portions of the Revised Code which it was thought could be comprised in the Bill were, first, the conditions on which building grants were made; and it was very requisite that they should be placed in an Act of Parliament. The next portion of the Revised Code to be inserted in the Bill referred to the teachers and the conditions of the Grant to non-certificated teachers. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) as to the immense importance of maintaining certificated teachers, and he trusted that nothing would ever obtain the sanction of Parliament which would at all imperil the present regulations on that point, to which he attached the very greatest weight. Still, he felt quite sure, that if they pertinaciously adhered to an obstructive principle, and refused to make any concession in regard to the employment of non-certificated teachers, they would run an infinitely greater risk of having the whole of that system swept away, than if they allowed concessions to be made in the moderate and guarded manner proposed by that Bill. The rule requiring a certificated teacher to be employed in all cases where the maximum grant was given was a sufficient security against the loss of the principle of having certificated teachers. The next branch of the Revised Code included in the Bill related to the annual grants. Exception had been taken in the course of the discussion to those provisions of the measure, on the ground of the uncertainty they would produce. Now, he believed they would have the very opposite effect, and that, instead of leading to increased expenditure, extravagance and uncertainty, they would lay down definitely, by an Act of Parliament the conditions on which Parliament, was willing to vote money, and also the actual sums which it was willing to vote. It should be remembered that the Vote for Education had attained as large an amount as £900,000, and that in a ratio that was increasing from year to year; and moreover that that increase had been produced by changes made in the Office to a great extent, and made, he ventured to say, almost without the authority of Parliament; because they had it on the testimony of Mr. Lowe that the Revised Code, though laid from time to time before Parliament, was rarely considered by any one. Those changes were made by a kind of spurious mode of legislation which he thought was extremely objectionable. When, therefore, that was converted into a system based on the authority of an Act of Parliament, they would thereby offer the public the best guarantee that the expenditure for elementary education would not be excessive, and that if it increased at all, it was only through the ordinary and natural increase of the schools applying for assistance, and not through various alterations, made by the whim or caprice of a Minister of the Crown. The next part of the Revised Code was the conditions under which pupil-teachers were employed. Nothing could be more important than the employment of pupil-teachers, and the conditions relating to that subject ought not to be changed, but were worthy of being made a permanent portion of our national system. Again, the conditions on which grants were made to normal schools were sufficiently known and settled to obviate any inconvenience in their being incorporated, as they ought to be, in an Act of Parliament, along with the other great sections of the Revised Code. He was almost unwilling to trouble their Lordships at that late hour by any reference to the subject of rating; but he would remind their Lordships that in introducing the Bill he had distinctly stated that the Government did not regard it as a complete measure. The question of rating was one that had excited a vast amount of controversy in the country; and although several of their Lordships had that night expressed strong opinions in favour of that principle, he was by no means satisfied that the proposals for rating had obtained general concurrence from the public. He believed that a very large section of the community was opposed to rating for education, upon conscientious grounds as well as upon fiscal grounds. It was impossible to see the burdens that were gradually increasing in the large towns and other districts without perceiving that it was very dangerous, without grave consideration, and without being perfectly certain that municipal bodies themselves were willing to undertake them, to impose additional burdens upon them. When it was urged, as it had been by a noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that a power might be given to municipal bodies to rate themselves, he might remind their Lordships, by way of illustration, that a few years ago an Act, called the Free Libraries Act, was passed, by which municipal corporations were empowered to rate themselves for scientific and literary purposes; but that power had hitherto proved almost entirely nugatory, the Act having been put in operation to a very small extent indeed, if at all. If rating powers were given to municipal bodies, they would in all probability remain a dead letter, and he did not believe a rating system would successfully provide for elementary education unless the Minister of Education had the power of compulsion. As to the Conscience Clause he was glad to learn that the course pursued by the Government was so strongly approved by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), who thought it of such merit as to justify the second reading of the Bill, notwithstanding his objections to other portions of it. For his own part he thought the principle of a Conscience Clause was a sound one to this extent—that where a child could not obtain secular instruction, except in a school where the religious teaching would do violence to its conscience, or to the consciences of the parents, parental authority ought to be recognized, and there ought to be relief from the disabilities which would otherwise be incurred. The Government had, however, endeavoured to meet the objections of many persons to such a clause by providing that it should be applied only in cases where but one school existed. To apply it to the annual grants would be unwise and impolitic, since large numbers of schools had been built on the faith of a Conscience Clause not being required, and were, in fact, purely denominational schools. Ex post facto legislation of that kind would be very unfair. With regard to an educational Census, the object was to obtain accurate information, and, whether Parliament hereafter agreed to a rating system or continued to rely on voluntary effort, such information would be of the utmost importance. He thought it probable, indeed, that the taking of such a census in any district, and the apprehension that, failing all other means, Parliament would feel itself justified in enforcing a system of rating, would induce a great amount of educational activity, and would extend to the utmost the capacity of the voluntary system. The Government did not pretend that this was a complete measure; but they believed that by the embodiment of the Revised Code in the Act, by the appointment of a Minister of Education, and by the concession with regard to secular and evening schools the utmost expansion would be given to that voluntary action which had already produced such great results. He hoped to see the Bill passed into law during the present Session, and then, when the wants of the country become known, and the results of the various Commissions were reduced into the shape of Acts of Parliament, this might prove one of a series of measures which might hereafter be effective in bringing about such a combination as might result in a great system of national education.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in withdrawing the Amendment, vindicated his right of comparing the Bill with the measure discussed at the recent Manchester Congress, and expressed a hope that time would be given before the Bill went into Committee to frame Amendments.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 7th of May next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

THAMES EMBANKMENT—STEAMBOAT PIERS.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. H. Lewis), he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Bath, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works intend to give any compensation to those persons who have, with the consent of the Thames Conservancy, erected and maintained piers for the accommodation of steamboat passengers, but which piers will be removed on the completion of the Embankment?

MR. TITE said, in reply, that there could be no doubt that when the Metropolitan Board of Works took away or obstructed the enjoyment of any existing stairs, pier, or landing-place, they were bound to take care that some other pier or landing-place should be erected and provided for the public. This had been done, or was doing, at very great expense, and he believed with very great advantage to the public. They were advised that, that being done under the clause of the Act of Parliament under which these works were constructed, they were not liable to any personal compensation in respect to any rights referred to by the hon. Member. The Act the Board were carrying out was an Act brought in and passed by Her Majesty's Government, and handed over to the Metropolitan Board to carry into effect, who were bound by it, and not at liberty to go beyond it. If anyone thought himself wronged by their proceedings, under the 21st section of the Act, application might be made to the Court of Queen's Bench, when the rights of parties would, of course, be respected and attended to.

CONSECRATION AND ORDINATION FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any steps have been taken to settle a Table of Fees on Consecrations and Ordinations, with the consent of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, under the provisions of the Act of last Session?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the consent of the Treasury had not yet been asked to any such Table as the hon. Member referred to; but one was being prepared by the two Archbishops and the Lord Chancellor, and the result would shortly be presented to the House.

ARMY—OFFICERS HOLDING CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Why the List of Officers receiving Half-pay with Civil Appointments is not presented to Parliament, as it should be, in pursuance of the Statute 29 & 30 Vict. c. 91?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that the Return referred to by the hon. Member was made up to the 31st of March, and would have been laid on the table about the middle of April, but that the Easter Recess had occurred at an unusual period. It would be laid on the table, however, in the course of a few days.

CARRIAGE OF PARCELS BY RAILWAY. QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose to the House during the Session any, and if any what, alteration in the Law affecting the carriage of parcels by Railways?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, in reply, that a clause in a Bill now under the charge of the President of the Board of Trade dealt with this subject, and he was glad to have this opportunity of removing a misconception which nothing in the clause, as originally drawn, warranted, though he admitted it required alteration in other respects. An idea had become prevalent that it was the Government's intention to change the law with respect to "packed" parcels, and to interfere with the practice of sending various articles to different consignees, packed within one inclosure. The Government never had any intention of the kind, but proposed to deal with another practice, that of a carrier collecting a variety of parcels of different descriptions and different values, and bringing all to the railway, in bulk as it were, unpacked and unassorted; large parcels of small value being mixed with small parcels of large value. For these, the carriers paid, in the aggregate, a low charge, as if these loose packages were one parcel, while they themselves received from the individual consignors or consignees a separate payment for each, the difference between the two rates being their profit. This custom was productive of great convenience to the public in many places; but the railway companies complained that they were exposed to much trouble and risk in collecting and carrying articles of value of which they were frequently ignorant, and it was under consideration whether the case might not be fairly met either by some system of classification, or a small charge for the trouble and risk. But it never was the intention of the Government to interfere with packed parcels properly so called, nor to place the carriers in a position different from that of any other consignor, though he admitted that apprehension on this latter ground was justifiable in consequence of the draughtsman not having fully understood his instructions.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to know, whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to take some steps for the purpose of informing the public of their present views in respect to the matter referred to?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the question would come before the Board of Trade to-morrow. He thought that the answer which he had just given would be intelligible enough to the public.

DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in rising to make a Motion before the Orders of the day, I doubt not the House has anticipated its purpose. It is to move an Address to Her Majesty, expressing on the part of this House its sympathy with Her Majesty on that distressing intelligence which arrived on Saturday last, and which occasioned Her Majesty so much grief, and still occasions her so much anxiety. I am sure that mine will be the common voice, when I express the sorrow and indignation with which the House and the country heard of the attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. If anything could aggravate the atrocity of that act it would be, I think, the circumstance under which it was perpetrated. His Royal Highness was visiting the most distant possessions of the Sovereign; he was—not in the letter, but to a certain degree, in the spirit—representing the Majesty of England; he had ited a sentiment of earnest enthusiasm, which, I am sure, must have touched the heart of this country, and he had commanded throughout the whole of his travels a reception which was due to his intelligence and to his cordial manners. At the very moment this act was perpetrated, he was fulfilling one of those offices which are the most graceful appanages of his illustrious rank; he was establishing a new charity—and that charity, in favour of the noble profession to which he is devoted—which, I may say, he has distinguished himself, and of which, I trust, he will live to be an ornament. It is impossible, in discussing this subject, to avoid referring to the cause of such an act. We live in an age of progress, or we sometimes flatter ourselves that this is our happy fate. But there appear to be cycles of our progress in which the worst passions and habits of distant ages are revived. Some centuries ago the world was tortured with the conviction that there was some mysterious power in existence which could command in every camp, and court, and capital of the world, a poniard at its disposal and devotion. It seems at this time, that some dark confederacy of the kind is spreading over the world. All I can say is, I regret that, for a moment, such acts should have been associated with the name of Ireland. I am convinced myself, as I have stated before in this House, that the imputation is unjust. I believe that these acts—and the characters who perpetrate them—are the distempered consequences of civil wars, and disorganized societies; that when their dark invasion first touched the soil of Ireland—the nation, as a whole, entirely repudiated them. And the manner in which, in that regard, another son of the Queen has recently been received, has proved that the loyalty of the Irish nation is unchanged and undiminished; and that those amiable and generous feelings, which have always been the characteristic of the people, flourish with the same vigour that we have before recognized. I trust that, under these circumstances, I may move—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, while on a visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt congratulations to Her Majesty on His preservation from mortal injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present anxiety, and of their earnest hope for the speedy recovery of His Royal Highness."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise for the purpose of seconding the Address which has just been moved by the right hon. Gentleman. I heartily concur—every man must concur, in the sentiment of sorrow and in the sentiment of indignation which are expressed in the terms of that Address. And we must all, I think, feel a sincere thankfulness to the Almighty who has been pleased on this critical occasion—if not entirely to paralyze the arm of the assassin, yet to prevent, at all events, as we trust, the fatal consequences at which the assassin aimed. Now, Sir, I do not know whether, judging as I judge, merely from expressions contained in the telegraphic intelligence, it would be wise or safe for me to assume as positively demonstrated that this foul and loathsome deed is connected with Fenianism. If it be so, I am sorry to say it only adds another dark shadow to the disgrace which previous acts of horror have brought on the name of that conspiracy. But whether that be so, or whether it be not, it cannot in the main affect the sentiment with which I am sure this Address will be voted by the House. Every man who has the smallest share of human feeling must be profoundly moved, on the one hand, at this new cause of anxiety to Her Majesty, and, on the other, at the fact that Her Majesty has been spared another deep and severe affliction in the midst of that crushing affliction which has darkened her days. And as regards the Prince himself, undoubtedly if anything could have disarmed the hand of the criminal one would have thought it would have been his youth, his great intelligence, and the kindly and genial manners which have endeared him to all with whom he has been brought in contact. This is a subject in which few words, I think, are best, the object being simply to convey to the foot of the Throne the dutiful and loyal assurance of sentiment which we entertain in common. I will only say, therefore, that I most cordially second the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WATKIN: It is stated that a more recent telegram has been received respecting the health of his Royal Highness, and announcing that the person who fired at him has been tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged. I wish to know if that be true?

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, while on a visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt congratulations to Her Majesty on His preservation from mortal injury; and to assure Her Majesty of the sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present anxiety, and of their earnest hope for the speedy recovery of His Royal Highness.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD: Perhaps I may be allowed to ask a Question of some importance of the Secretary of State for India. I do not ask whether the official Report which has appeared in the papers with regard to the attack upon Magdala and the release of the captives is true — there can be no doubt of that — but whether there is any other information which he can communicate to the House. I trust the House will permit me to offer my congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman on the triumphant success of the expedition, and to express the admiration which I am certain this House feels for the skill, the forethought, and the prudence displayed by Sir Robert Napier, and for the gallantry and devotion of the troops under his command?

MR. DISRAELI: I rise, Sir, at the desire of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India to offer a few observations to the House upon this subject. This certainly is a topic which we can approach with unmixed satisfaction. Her Majesty's Government took the most extensive means that they could yesterday to ensure that the news of the success of Her Majesty's arms should be known as widely as possible; but it is the unanimous wish of my Colleagues, and it will, I am sure, be more respectful to the House — though I have no further news to communicate — that I should in a formal manner confirm the authenticity of the statement which has been made. It will be my duty shortly to propose a Motion by command of Her Majesty, in connection with this subject, which will give to hon. Gentlemen every opportunity of expressing their opinions; and on the present occasion, as there is no Motion before the House, I shall make very few additional observations. But in communicating to the House the authenticity of this information I feel that I should not be doing my duty if I did not congratulate the House upon the events that have occurred. I am sure the House will agree with me that, as a feat of arms, it would be difficult, probably impossible, to find its parallel for completeness and for precision. Her Majesty's troops — the soldiers who have been engaged, and the great leader who directed the operations — are, I think, equally entitled to the gratitude which the House, I doubt not, will accord to them. And perhaps, as far as the soldiers are concerned, the House will allow me to read a passage from a letter of Sir Robert Napier received at the same time as the recent intelligence, but written before the last advance. He says — this is written on the 23rd —

"All the troops are well, and evince a most admirable spirit, emulating each other in cheerful devotion to the interests of the expedition. Officers and men alike deserve every praise."

So much for the character of the troops as given by the general. What shall we say of the general himself? On another occasion we may touch upon a career which, upon many occasions, has been so eminent. But with regard to the present expedition, let me say, for myself, that when you consider its particular character, the march of 400 miles into an unknown country, the providence, the sagacity, the patience, and, above all, the firmness of the commander, it resembles more than any other event in history that I can compare it with the advance of Cortez into Mexico. But there is this fortunate difference between the Abyssinian Expedition and the great invasion of Cortez — that we did not enter Abyssinia to despoil the innocent, but in a spirit of justice, humanity, religion, and civilization, and that we are about now to vacate the country in a manner which will prove to the world the purity of our purpose.

COLONEL SYKES: Is it true that King Theodore was found dead; and, if so, in what manner did he meet with his death?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: He was found dead, but we have no information as to the manner of his death.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Acts considered in Committee.

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. WATKIN—who had placed the following Amendment on the Paper:—

"After the word 'That,' insert 'while this Committee considers that the future position of the Established Church in Ireland should be fully decided upon by the Reformed Parliament, to be convened at the earliest period after the Electoral Revision of the present year, it now resolves that' "—

And, an independent Member who proposes an Amendment to a Resolution which partakes more or less a party character, generally places himself in a dilemma, for he obtains the disapprobation of his friends, and the more dangerous approbation of his opponents. He was fortunate in having, in giving Notice of the Amendment or rather, preface to the Resolutions, heard the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman extended the scope of his Resolutions. The Resolutions seemed to indicate that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a settlement of the Irish Church question. He did not concur in that view, and he thought the House would be misleading the country if it expressed such an opinion. But the right hon. Gentleman in his speech said he meant to put an end to all endowment out of the funds of the State for the support of any sect or religion in Ireland. That was a distinct issue explicitly put, and the country would have to settle it. He had voted with the right hon. Gentleman the other night because there was nothing to quarrel with in his Resolutions, except that they might have been more explicit; and if the right hon. Gentleman's speech could have been put from the Chair, a larger number of Members might vote for it than for the Resolutions. He had always looked upon the Irish Church as the greatest of all dangers to the English Church; for the one a logical reason could be offered, for the other there was no argument but the power of a minority to preserve it. The substitution of the voluntary system for the Establishment in Ireland would be a powerful means of starting afresh the Protestant religion in that country. A great Churchman and a great man—Dr. Arnold, of Rugby—used these words—

"Whether Ireland remain in its present barbarism, or grow in wealth and civilization, in either case the downfall of the present Establishment is certain; a savage people will not endure the insult of a hostile religion; a civilized one will reasonably insist on having their own."

And in his works, speaking of the Irish people, he said—

"They see a Church richly supported by the spoils of their own Church Establishment, in whose tenets not one-tenth part of the people believe. Is it possible to believe this can endure?"

He (Mr. Watkin) believed with Dr. Arnold that it could not endure. But then comes the question—how far the right hon. Gentleman can proceed under present circumstances? Household suffrage will make a far wider and wiser settlement of the whole Irish question than this Parliament can accomplish. This Parliament ought not to be kept alive to serve any party purpose. And the country would not be satisfied unless an assurance be given by either the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister or by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—who may be Prime Minister in a few weeks—that the Reformed Parliament shall be called together at the earliest possible period next year, in order to deal with the whole question of Ireland. His proposed addition enforced this condition. He did not believe any Minister will commit the mistake of dissolving this Parliament on the question. The House will no doubt pass the Resolutions, and he desired to throw no impediment in the way; and as the hon. Baronet (Sir Frederick Heygate) has given notice of an Amendment which will raise the whole question of Establishments, he (Mr. Watkin) would not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. GORST said, he did not think this could be treated as an Irish question. It was one which deeply affected the people of this country. He did not wonder at the Irish Roman Catholic Members looking on this, as they did on all other questions, from a peculiarly Irish point of view. They said, that the Irish Establishment was an heretical one; that it did no social good to the people of that country, and that the whole mass of the Irish people were against it. If Ireland were a separate country, they would not attempt to disestablish the Irish Church, but would simply change its religion and make it Roman Catholic. The line of argument adopted by those Members was straightforward; but he would point out to hon. Gentlemen that a civil war must take place before the Roman Catholic Church could be made the Established religion of Ireland. He objected in toto to the assumption that this ought to be treated as a purely Irish question. By doing so, indeed, the House would not be going against the Act of Union, which they had power to repeal if they chose; but the House would be acting in opposition to the spirit of the age. He yielded to no man in his admiration of the Irish character, which was high-spirited and generous; but it was impossible to resist the revolution which railroads were making in Ireland as well as in England. In a country which could be travelled over from one extremity to the other in twenty four hours, it could hardly be doubted that men and institutions would become alike; and he would ask hon. Gentlemen, who were acquainted with Ireland, whether it was not rapidly losing its distinctive character, and becoming English. If, then, there were a tendency to uniformity of character throughout the United Kingdom, was it not a reactionary step to create an anomaly by having an Established Church in England, and in Ireland a Government with no religion whatever? Was it likely that such an anomaly could be maintained permanently? The great mass of the Liberal party knew full well that it could not and did not intend that it should; but they supported the present Resolutions, not for the purpose of destroying the Establishment in Ireland, but for the purpose of laying hands on the Establishment in England. If he had held such views he should have raised the real question at issue in a manly, straightforward way, instead of following the example of some Liberals who had had the falseness to deny that they were aiming at disestablishment of the Church of England. Some Liberals talked as though they were advocating reforms in the future; not because these reforms were in themselves right and good, but for the purpose of punishing the Conservative party for its obstinacy. It was the hon. Member for Birmingham who began that way of talking. They all understood that it was his fun, but there were plenty to follow him seriously in these opinions. Now, he maintained that those who brought forward this question ought honestly to avow their intentions; but the reason the Liberal party had not done so was because the people of this country, and especially the poorer classes, were firmly attached to the Established Church. He had no doubt that many mistook the voice of a few persons out-of-doors and of a few newspapers—a voice put forth merely for the purpose of ascertaining public opinion—for that of the people of this country. Would the hon.

Member for Birmingham allow him to give one reason which seemed to him to be above all others that which led the people of this country to uphold the Established Church? It was because, of all our institutions, it was the most democratic. Although a great Reform Bill had been carried, there still existed in the State, distinctions between the rich man and the poor man, and between males and females. [Laughter.] That laughter convinced him that the latter distinction was likely to be long maintained. [Laughter.] Of course, he was merely speaking of distinctions in the State. In the Established Church, however, no distinction was made between classes, but all alike could enter the churches and partake of the ceremonies. And not only so, but the ceremonies were the same for all. A marriage might be surrounded with every pomp and luxury, but within the Church the ceremony was the same for the wealthy as for the poor. A general might be buried in a cathedral, but the ceremony was the same as for the poorest man. For his own part, he had never held that it would make a great difference to the Church, whether it existed as an Establishment or as a voluntary association, although he did not share in the desire entertained by some advanced Churchmen of separation of Church and State. He thought, however, that the State would be the great sufferer from disestablishment. It could not be expected that England could be governed like America, or the Colonies, where no monarchy was established; and it should be borne in mind that the national religion was bound up with all the traditions of the country. There had been periods in our history when the national Church was the great safeguard of the liberties of the people; and her services were not yet forgotten. They could not, in his opinion, disestablish the Church in any part of the United Kingdom, without striking a great blow at true religion. It might be that philosophers could conduct themselves and their affairs without religion, and that for them enlightened self-interest was a sufficient guide; but common and unphilosophical men, who were now supreme in this country, would hardly be able to govern themselves justly without the principle of religion embodied in public affairs—in other words, without the principle of an Established Church. After all, it was of no use attempting to decide a question of this kind by reason; for it did not depend upon argument at all, but upon feeling and sentiment, and as long as the people of this country were strongly attached to the Established Church, so long should we have Church and State united. The battle would be fought, not in the House of Commons, but in the streets of our great towns. On the one side were arrayed clergy, ministers, and virtue; and, on the other side, the vice and wickedness out of the gaols and work-houses; and when the latter prevailed, and people ceased to be attached to the Church, it would go, and the House could not save it, although it might break the fall. The Liberal party—taking advantage of this state of things—was trying to educate the people into willingness to destroy the Church, and it did not scruple to ally itself for this object with people of bad character, and opposed to religion. It would be far better plainly to avow the intention, and let the world know what was aimed at, for the destruction of the Irish Church was a step towards the destruction of the English Church. But the conduct of the Liberal party was reasonable, judged by their own principles. What, however, should be said of the union between the Irish party, which sought the separation of England and Ireland, and the anti-Church party, in a common onslaught on the Irish Church? ["No, no!"] Of course the leaders of the Opposition treated his opinions with disdain. But perhaps they would like to know how the matter struck an outsider, who did not expect to hold Office. Before Parliament met it was said Ireland would be the question of the Session; but in the speeches of the Leaders of the Liberal party he could find no suggestions, and no proposals were made save the impracticable ones of the hon. Members for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) and Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill). It was said that something must be done; but no one knew what. Then there was a great debate in the House, and nothing turned up for Ireland, but something for the Liberal party. It appeared to be possible that if certain Gentlemen would change their opinions, and adopt a new line of conduct, the great Liberal party might just for once be re-united. There was courage in the attempt; but they had been obliged to make very serious admissions, such as that the Irish Church was not a real grievance, and did not injure any one in purse or person; that its abolition would not remove discontent; that the question must be remitted to the reformed Parliament; that it prevented the completion of the Reform scheme of last Session; and that the Liberal party was stultifying itself, as it had proposed nothing during the twenty years it directed the Government of the country. In the face of all these admissions, they had to say why they opened the question now. Their supporters out-of-doors bluntly said it was because they were out of Office; of course, it would not be decent to say so in the House; but the reason given was, that there was discontent in Ireland, and it was desirable to remedy a sentimental grievance. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire said this was felt as a grievance in Ireland, and that it was desirable to remedy it. He (Mr. Gorst) would admit that it might be desirable to remedy a real grievance in the midst of an insurrection, but not a sentimental grievance. He held that, however discontented a nation might be, justice ought to be done at whatever cost. But he also held that if a sentimental grievance, which did not injure any one either in his money or person, were redressed in the middle of discontent and insurrection, the conduct of the redressors would be put down to fear, and would do no good whatever. It was quite clear that if the Irish Church grievance was to be redressed, it ought not to be redressed when Ireland was in a state of insurrection, or, at all events, of discontent. Now, while it was very good policy to cure a real grievance in the midst of discontent and insurrection, it was bad policy to remove a sentimental one; because your conduct might be attributed to fear, and for that reason might not do the slightest good. Why was not the question brought forward during the fifteen years of contentment that preceded 1865? Unless a good reason could be given, people outside would impugn the conduct of the Leaders of the Liberal party. A distinct issue was raised by the Resolution, which in terms spoke of the Irish Church; but in reality was aimed at the existence and welfare of the English Church. The attack united the Irish Catholic party and the anti-Church party, and those two great parties were marshalled for the attack by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, whom he might call deserters from that (the Government) side of the House, and who hesitated not to stultify themselves in their efforts to get into office. The Conservative party could meet the Resolution only by a direct negative, and, whatever the House might do with it, he was quite sure that course would be approved in the country.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he did not insist upon the Union of England and Ireland being an insuperable obstacle to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. As long as there was a Parliament in existence it must have power to consider all questions. The Act of Union was one of the most solemn Acts of Parliament, and he did not believe the Union it established would be maintained if there were different religious arrangements in the two countries. You could not have a voluntary system in one country and continue an Established Church in the other. The fund for the support of the Irish Church was described as being out of all proportion to its real wants. So long, however, as you treated the country as one united Empire, you were bound to look to the case of the Church in every part of the kingdom. Now, the Church statistics of Ulster had never been given in this House, and he should like to call attention to them. The total Church revenue in Ulster arising from rent, glebe-lands, tithe rent-charge, sums paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and value of the Bishops' sees, was £211,234; the number of clergy in Ulster was 684, and of the Church population was 401,392. Dividing the emoluments of the Church by the number of the clergy the income of each clergyman appeared to be £308, certainly not an excessive income considering the large size of the parishes. Dividing the number of the Church population by the number of clergymen, the average flock of each clergyman was 586 persons. He believed that if such a comparison were made in England, excluding certain large towns, the remuneration might be something like the same, but the average number of the flock would not be. In many communities in Dublin and in other counties the case was quite as strong as in Ulster. Then, again, the interest of the 500,000 Presbyterians must be considered, for their Regium Donum would be stopped. He was convinced that if you swamped Ulster in the whole of Ireland you must go a great deal farther. You could not separate one country from another in religious matters and maintain a union in all others. The prevalent religion of a country was its very spirit, forming its character, and controlling all its conduct and its relations, foreign and domestic. If you abrogated the Union, a result to which this measure would, in his opinion, lead, the foreign policy of the country would hardly ever be in accord with that of England, and then the question of education would face you. When once you meddled with this question of the Irish Church, only two courses were open to you—the voluntary system, or the endowment of all religious denominations. Now, as it was absurd to talk about the voluntary system in a poor and thinly populated country like Ireland, though it might succeed in large towns. The voluntary system had been well described by an old writer, who said—

“That he was not aware of any other Scriptural authority for this system than that derived from the period when every man did that which was right in his own eyes.”

And, again—

“The voluntary system if it be understood to intend the exclusion of national and parochial provision for the support of religion, is only another phrase for the wish of the Devil, who is content that much should be professed to be done, so long as little be really done, to overthrow his kingdom.” Though the voluntary system had been much praised, the evidence was that, while in the large towns of America it answered very well, in the country it amounted almost to a closing of places of worship. The other alternative was the endowment of all religious denominations. But it would be impossible to persuade the people of England or of Scotland to endow the Roman Catholics; and if you endow all denominations you must endow Mormonism. What was called religious equality was nothing but the equality of truth and error. Between Protestantism and Popery antagonism prevailed, well expressed in the words of Old Evelyn—

“The emissaries and instruments of the Church of Rome will never rest till they have crushed the Church of England, as knowing that alone to be able to cope with them, and that they can never answer her fairly, but lie abundantly open to the irresistible force of her arguments and the antiquity and purity of her doctrine.”

It was asked why, if the voluntary system answered among Roman Catholics in Ireland, it could not answer among other denominations. But there was an enormous difference between the spirit and the working of the two creeds. An omission of religious duty on the part of Roman Catholics was punished in this world. It was punished by a suspension of the offices of the Church, and the charges made by the Roman Catholic clergy under the so-called voluntary system were really compulsory. The hon. Member for Birmingham said that the process of disestablishment would be easy and gradual. Easy it undoubtedly would be—

Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad
aureas,

Hic labor, hoc opus est.”

The Protestants in Ireland might, perhaps, do without so many Bishops as they now had; the few cathedrals might do without deans and canons; though these were not paid as such, as was generally supposed, but in almost every instance were simply the clergymen of neighbouring parishes, with parochial duties. But if the clergyman of the parish died the “gradual” process would be this—His life-interest would be respected, but on the day of his death, even though the church was well filled, it must be closed, and there could be no more services unless an appeal were successfully made to the voluntary system. This was what was called gradual disestablishment. But the effects of these proposals were already perceptible, and he for one would prefer that the disestablishment, if it were to take place, should take place at once. He did not at all approve of postponing the matter for the consideration of another Parliament. Few, if any, would stand up for the anomalies which existed in the Established Church of Ireland; but this was not a question of anomalies. He had letters without end from all parts of the country, many of them from Roman Catholics, and throughout but one idea appeared to be prevalent. One writer said, “The Romish population about here are beginning to exult at the prospect of becoming the Established Church.” A Presbyterian clergyman, who, he might add, was a Liberal, and had voted against him at several elections, writing to him lately, said that the Presbyterian Church in Ireland regarded the withdrawal of the endowments from the Established Church as a heavy blow, and a discouragement to Protestantism in the country, and a great triumph for Roman Catholicism. The writer said it was moreover feared that at no very distant day we should witness the Establishment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. And this enormous change was to be made to secure what he regarded as a purely imaginary result—peace. The hon. Member for Birmingham held out the prospect of the disendowment leading to the inauguration of an era of peace for Ireland. That result he regarded as so desirable that he would make any sacrifice short of abandoning principle to secure it; but he could not see how the hon. Member could prove the prospect which he held out was anything but imaginary. He had listened attentively to the speeches which had been made in the House, but he had failed to find that any corroboration had been afforded by the Roman Catholic Members. He thought it a somewhat remarkable fact that no Liberal Member connected with Ireland—and several had spoken—had referred to the proposal as likely to promote the result suggested by the hon. Member for Birmingham. The Roman Catholic Members, though they had not taken part in the debate, had significantly enough voted for the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He would ask these Gentlemen whether, in their opinion, a more peaceable condition of the country would ensue upon the adoption of the course proposed. They knew, and the fact was generally recognized by the Roman Catholics, that the question of education was of far greater importance to them, and its great importance was recognized, too, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, who had changed many of his opinions on Irish matters, some of those changes having resulted from sitting on Select Committees. Among other important questions, too, which demanded consideration were the law of Mortmain and the land question. But another object that was desired was what was called the overthrow of Protestant ascendancy. He desired, however, to ask the hon. Member for Birmingham, whether, in his opinion, Protestant ascendancy would be destroyed by this course? The hon. Member, as he understood, proposed to leave the church, the glebe, and the residence of the minister untouched, so that where an “obnoxious minister” previously resided, that obnoxious minister was to be maintained by voluntary contributions, still continuing his former duties and trying to persuade the people of the country to change their religion. There remained the fact that so many of the owners of land belonged to the “obnoxious” religion. There was, in his opinion, no means of getting rid of the Protestant ascendancy in Ireland short of the absolute banishment of the present race of Protestants in Ireland. He would pass over the remarkable comparison in this debate by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), in which he compared the Ulster settlers to the planters of the Southern States of America, and threatened them with a similar fate. Such threats in an assembly of men whose ancestors for the most part were also the ancestors of those maligned Ulstermen, who had been originally largely sent from this City of London, much against their will, and forced by Royal authority to contribute funds to buy land, might well pass for what they were worth. That industrious race, both of English and Scotch descent, had, at any rate, made Ulster what it is, although it was now sought to confiscate the endowments of their religions, which had been guaranteed them. He denied that the loyalty of the Irish Protestants would depend upon the issue of this question. He believed there was no gentleman in Ulster who would be disloyal, whatever loss of security there might be to the institutions of the country by such proposals as this. Their loyalty sprung from a principle that was far deeper. But we were told that the object which the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his supporters had in view would be the result of an easy and a gradual arrangement. The moment, however, that these Resolutions passed, the Church of England as a ministry and a profession would lose its independence, and the standing of the clergymen under the new order of things would be very different from what it was at present. Their position would be something akin to that of the domestic chaplain in Esmonde, who, as Thackeray told them, was expected to say grace at table, to baptize the family, get the eldest sons out of their scrapes, train up the young hopefuls, and, in fact, to make himself generally useful. So far from the adoption of these Resolutions tending to promote peace, he thought we should find that there would be less peace than before, which would represent the withdrawal of confidence and countenance from the old form of Faith. In fact, they were so regarded in every quarter. Let them not be deceived. This was nothing less than the reversal of the policy of 300 years—the withdrawal of the countenance by England of the old Reformed Faith—triumphantly known to be so by all the Roman Catholics of Europe and Ireland. If they cared so little for this question of the Established Church, and would have none of its endowments, and despised its hold on the world, why should they so rejoice at the perils that environed her? Had Archbishop Manning written nothing? And the Roman Catholic papers in every country in Europe? Do the Irish hierarchy feel no joy at the downfall of their rival—no secret anticipation of their enthronement in its place? On every ground he opposed these Resolutions. They were fatal to the principle of the Union between the two countries; they treated England and Ireland as distinct nations; and they proposed no disposition of the confiscated endowments. In the case of Ulster and some other parts of Ireland, as appeared by the statistics he has given—which he quoted on the authority of Dr. Lee, whose ability and labours deserved every commendation—there was no case. He wished, indeed, to see the Presbyterian ministers raised to a position of greater independence, and the utmost religious freedom professed by every denomination. Instead of promoting the stability of Ireland, the Opposition had thrown the apple of discord in the very midst of the people, and had set on foot a war of race against race, embittered by religious rancour.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,"—
(Sir Frederick Heygate.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR:—Sir, the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate) as it appears to me is precisely tantamount to a direct negative. He wishes the House to affirm that, as long as the Union exists, the Established Church in Ireland should exist also; but on this side of the House we wish the Union to exist for ever and the Established Church to disappear at once. The hon. Member for Cambridge, though he wandered over a great deal of ground through which it is unnecessary that I should follow him, did not fail in accordance with the never-failing tactics of his party to refer the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman for the disestablishment of the Irish Church and the support which it receives on this side of the House to causes with which it is going out of the way to suppose that they have any connection, and this is the more singular because the course is not far to seek from which they naturally and inevitably flow. Is it possible that hon. Gentlemen opposite can have forgotten the debate which took place at the commencement of this Session upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork; is it possible that they can have forgotten the long speech made on that occasion by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the satisfaction with which he dwelt upon certain statistics by which he proved that this is not the worst period of Ireland's adversity, the candour with which he admitted that notwithstanding this, throughout large districts of the country and large masses of the population there was a prevalent sympathy with Fenianism, and then the deplorable announcement which he made that Her Majesty's Government thought it best, upon the whole, to preserve a dignified neutrality in presence of the raging contest between a tendency to improvement and a tendency to decay? It seems to me Sir, that both the Liberal party and their Leader would have been faithless to the great interests confided to their care, if they had pretended for a moment to sanction such a policy; if any time had been lost by them in seizing upon the most salient point in the Irish difficulty and bringing it before the House in such a manner as not only to involve a discussion of its merits, but also to compel a decision upon its principle. But hon. Gentlemen opposite say that the great mistake has been to select this question of the Irish Church. They argue that if the Irish Church were disestablished to-morrow there would not be one Fenian the less, and though the assertion is sweeping it is not necessarily inaccurate. I am inclined to believe that even if the Church were disestablished to-morrow the active and actual Fenians in their very limited numbers might still remain undiminished. It is but indirectly that a Resolution of this kind can attempt to deal with the active organization of Fenianism; but I think it will be admitted that even that active organization will have received its death-blow when we can reach that smouldering sympathy with rebels so freely admitted by the Chief Secretary, that passive organization of Fenianism, founded upon a sense of wrong which has its depôt in the hearts of the people. I apprehend that to reach that is the object of those who wish to disestablish the Irish Church; and let me remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that an argument which they are in the habit of using, even if it had any foundation in fact, would not be conclusive against the possibility of attaining that end by these means. Their argument is that the disaffection of the Irish to our rule does not proceed from religion but from national antipathies. Time will not permit me to give this argument a very comprehensive refutation; but I will at least remind hon. Gentlemen that there is no antipathy so inveterate as not to require sustentation, that there is no antipathy so rooted but it may be expected to yield to the influence of softening suggestions from a friendly and respected source. And I will ask them to consider first, the enormous power for good or for evil which is vested in the Roman Catholic hierarchy; secondly, the course which we can pursue with the greatest probability of throwing its weight into the scale of order; and thirdly, the grave responsibility assumed by those, who pursuing a course diametrically opposite, risk the indefinite prolongation of a state of things which common sense and common humanity compel us all equally to deplore. And now let me turn to another argument which is also very popular with hon. Gentlemen opposite. They say that union between Church and State in Ireland rests upon the same principle as union between Church and State in England, and if either can be said to rest upon any absolute and well-defined principle, so far I agree with them; but upon this premise they build the conclusion that, a blow struck at the one is a blow aimed also at the other, and that if the dissolution of the one be effected the dissolution of the other must follow in its wake. From this conclusion Sir, I entirely dissent. Union between Church and State as it appears to me is an admirably wise but purely political arrangement entered into for the general well-being of a nation. So long and in so far as it procures that end its maintenance is clearly advantageous and its disturbance would be a national calamity; but what is the wisest method of avoiding a calamity, which, from the very nature of the arrangement, some persons must always be striving to bring about?—surely, Sir, to restrict that arrangement within the sphere of its beneficial action, not to press it to a point at which ample experience has taught us that it becomes subversive of the very objects which it was devised with consummate sagacity to attain. In England this arrangement, this union, has been fraught with blessing; in Ireland it has produced nothing but a curse. If it be true, as has been more than whispered, that its origin was unhallowed, all the more reason why its end should be unregretted. Sir, for many years it was the custom to characterize religious inequality complained of in Ireland as a sentimental grievance; and a sentimental grievance truly it was, cutting a sensitive and enthusiastic nation to the quick. Let me ask any hon. Member in this House, whether, if he had a friend of a sensitive and enthusiastic temperament who might be useful or who might be noxious, there is any extremity he would not rather face than put him in possession of a sentimental grievance? Hon. Gentlemen have at last discovered the fallacy of that unlucky sneer. More than once in the course of these debates it has been turned upside down and used as an argument to prop the falling fortunes of a hitherto favoured minority. There is one more argument which, if the Committee will bear with me, I should like to notice before I sit down; it is an argument in which the sentimental is used for the practical to a degree which approaches if it does not touch the verge of political probity. It is the last of a long array by which, not so many years ago, Protestant ascendancy seemed surrounded and ruined. One by one they have melted away before the expanding mind and conscience of this country, and now there remains but this one alone—this garrison argument. It warns us to beware lest our mad veneration for justice should cost us loyalty with which we can ill dispense. It points to a minority numerically small, but financially and intellectually powerful, which has hitherto faithfully guarded our interests; and again, it warns us that if we alienate their hearts all government in Ireland will become impossible for the future—all government at least except that of the bayonet. Truly a terrible alternative if we needed no bayonets now. My answer to that argument is that our dependence upon that minority in the past is a real dependence. I do not dispute it to have been vicious in principle; it has broken down in practice, and that it is time for them as it is time for us to give heed to the warning of the present and the lessons of the past. But having said thus much in reply to an argument used by others, I feel bound to add that the very use of it involves a weight of accusation which I should never have ventured to originate, and the truth of which I am quite unprepared to assume. I have confidence enough in a body of my countrymen, so wealthy, so intelligent, and so loyal as the Irish Protestants to believe that the sacrifice which they are called upon to make will not deprive them of the will any more than

of the power to do good service to the State. I am fully persuaded that both the clergy and the laity will rally all the closer round the standard of a creed whose emblems are love and peace. I have confidence enough in the Church of which I am a member to believe that she fears no rivalry upon equal terms; and I have confidence enough in my own knowledge of human nature to feel sure that her doctrines will have fuller play and a fairer chance when the exponent of Protestant truth, dissociated from the representative of oppression and conquest, can gain free access to the minds of a warm-hearted and unprejudiced population through his virtues as a minister and his qualities as a gentleman. But even if this were otherwise, the alternative of right or wrong, of justice or injustice, drawing as it does so unpleasantly harsh a line between the two great parties in this House would still remain untouched. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are the consistent advocates of Protestant ascendancy at any time, because it exists and because they think "whatever is is right;" for this side of the House I hope and believe there is no disposition to violate the sanctity of long existing rights, provided they can shelter themselves even in the shadow of justice: but when such claims as these of Protestant ascendancy in Ireland are dragged into the light and proved, as in my opinion they have been proved, incompatible with justice, insulting to a nation, and injurious to the interests of the Empire; when, moreover, Ireland hard pressed in the struggle for a decent and orderly existence cries aloud to us to send religious equality to her aid, I think it would be wrong, morally and politically wrong, to stand by with folded arms and let her fight her battle as she may.

MR. DYKE said, he had listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member opposite (Captain Grosvenor), but failed to discover in it any clear argument proving that the Roman Catholics were suffering from present injustice. Looking back upon some of the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had used in former years, and contrasting these with his more recent utterances, he had been altogether unable to discover in his modern views any sufficient answer to those which he formerly entertained. This was peculiarly the case with a speech made in 1835 upon the Appropriation Clause. The right hon. Gentleman no doubt would say that the speech was made some time ago, and that times had changed since then; but the lapse of time made no change in the clearness of the argument. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“If the Protestants should ever happen again to be in a minority in that House, he, for one, avowed his conviction that a return to the ancient appropriation would be the fair and legitimate consequence. Until that should be the case—until the Legislative Union should be dissolved, until the representatives of the Roman Catholics constituted the majority in that House—he, for one, should raise his humble voice as a Protestant against the principle involved in the Motion before the House. The great grievance complained of in Ireland was that the Protestant Establishment there was paid for by the Roman Catholic inhabitants. Was it so paid for? Were tithes paid for that purpose, or were not tithes rather a part of the surplus profit of the land, which went, not to the cultivator of the soil, but to the owner of it? Tithe was paid by the landlord, and the grievances on this point complained of by the people of Ireland were rather in theory than in reality.” [3 Hansard, xxvii. 507.]

The House was now invited to deal with this question not in a comprehensive manner, but by affirming, blindfold as it were, the principle of disestablishment, leaving the vast ulterior difficulties of the question to be dealt with in a future Parliament. Only three years ago the right hon. Gentleman stated that “no sooner did you approach this question practically than you met a whole nest of problems of the utmost political difficulty;” and the difficulties certainly had not disappeared in the interval. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) had one plan for disposing of the revenues of the Irish Church; Lord Russell, till the other day, had a different plan of his own, but he appeared to have relinquished it at a meeting which he attended in St. James’s Hall. A question was addressed the other day to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire with regard to the Regium Donum, and also with regard to the Grant to Maynooth—the latter especially being one of considerable moment among the Nonconformist population—but the right hon. Gentleman had given no distinct pledge with regard to the future. On the contrary, he seemed to find himself between the Scylla of Nonconformity—the dislike of all endowments—and the Charybdis of Roman Catholicism, which might succeed after all in overcoming his present scruples with regard to endowments. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) treated all objections to disestablishment as so many hobgoblin arguments, having nothing substantial about them. But, for his own part, he could not discover those securities and safeguards supposed to exist in such abundance. In a quarter which ought to be well-informed as to the views with which agitation was raised, in the great Liberal newspaper in Dublin, The Freeman’s Journal of March 26, he found passages such as this—

“The debate will be one of the most memorable on record, and the issue will involve not only the fate of a Ministry, but the fate sooner or later of the dominant State Church, not only in Ireland, but in England. The great Liberal party are determined to deal a deathblow at all State endowments. The Irish Church, as the most vulnerable in structure, must be the first righteous victim.”

After that, he supposed they would be told in this country that there was no need to be alarmed. See, again, how the matter was viewed upon the Continent. He took from a foreign paper, expressing strong Ultramontane opinions, this extract—

“We applaud the fall of the Irish Church—first of all, because it is a barrier to the development of the Catholic faith, an outpost of the Anglican Establishment, which is the fortress of Protestantism in Europe. Once the Church has fallen, the sect will crumble away.”

A few nights ago the hon. Member for Birmingham said, he should not be surprised if the same conversion took place in Scotland, and that disendowment were asked for there also. All these things indicated that disestablishment would not stop at the Irish Church. It was not shown that any actual grievance is now felt by Roman Catholic clergymen or laymen; but hon. Gentlemen who sought to make a case against the Irish Church went back sixty or seventy years and referred to the Penal Laws and other such things, which we all, whether Irish or English, Protestant or Roman Catholic, now regarded with horror. He believed that no class of men had worked with more honesty and with less of bigotry against those who were opposed to them in religion than the Irish Protestants. The other day he received a letter from one of them, asking him to vote against the Resolutions. In that letter the reverend gentleman, referring to the Roman Catholic people of a parish in which he had lived for some years, made these remarks—

“When they found I was anxious for their good, as well as that of my own Protestant people, we were soon on the pleasantest terms, spoke in a friendly way on practical religious duties, avoiding irritating subjects; they came to me for advice, or relief in sickness; they trusted me with their letters, money, and affairs, and my leaving the parish was occasion for much lamentation among them. I quote words used by one when saying good-bye. ‘How shall we all get on when you leave us, sir ? ' Why, just as you did before I come.' ' Sure, and we didn't get on at all thin, your honour.' "

Were these Resolutions to have a prospective effect on a Parliament ? If not, it appeared to him the House were wasting a Session by a proceeding of a vague, factious, and party-serving character. If the Resolutions were prospective, would not the House, in passing them, be doing a great injustice to the Members of the next Parliament, by denying to them the right of having any part in legislation which struck at the foundation of the religion which the people of this country professed, and which they desired to uphold. In 1866, when the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland was proposed by the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire found out no crisis which was to terminate in the destruction of the Irish Church. In the twenty-five years during which the Liberal party had been in power, and during which, according to the hon. Member for Birmingham, the sword had seldom been out of the hands of the governing party, they had never discovered an Irish crisis ; but with the coming in of the present Government the Liberal party seemed to be endowed with the keenest vision, and almost with microscopic eye they were now able to detect the cause of Irish discontent. From the large constituency which he represented he had received representations of the most earnest nature on the subject of these Resolutions ; and, however humble and ineffective his voice might be, he could not give a silent vote on what he conceived to be hasty, untimely, and party-serving Resolutions, affecting a Church of which he was a supporter, and a religion which he felt himself bound to uphold.

MR. DILLWYN said, he believed that the existence of the Established Church in Ireland was an injustice to the people of that country ; and he would support the Resolutions, because he thought that, in removing an injustice, we took the first step towards ameliorating the condition of a country. The House could not doubt what the verdict of the United Kingdom would be, for during the last three weeks in England, Scotland, and Ireland public opinion had pronounced itself singularly favourable to the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). [ " Hear, hear ! " and " No, no ! " ] Well, he had stated his opinion. An attempt had been made to raise the " No Popery " cry, but the country had refused to take it up. Seeing that the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Roman Catholic laity did not ask for a State endowment for their Church, he thought the endeavour to get up that cry was a very unwise one. Another means by which it had been sought to defeat the Resolutions was by alleging that the case of the Established Church in this country was identified with that of the Irish Church. The section of the Established Church who put forward this statement were, in his opinion, acting foolishly. The two Establishments stood on such different bases that there was no comparison between them. The connection between Church and State in any country was a practical rather than a theoretical question. If he understood the matter rightly, the State represented the whole community viewed in regard to its material interests. The Church again did not represent any section of the community, but the whole of the community, as far as their spiritual interests were concerned ; and when a community agreed to delegate certain powers in reference to religious teaching and administration to the governing body, the connection between the Church and State arose. That connection would be maintained as long as it was sanctioned by the whole body of the community, as was the case in England, where the majority of the people belonged to the Established Church. In this country, too, there were many persons who, disliking strict observance on the one hand, or sentimental ritualism on the other, nevertheless were in favour of the State Church because they thought it prevented religious intolerance and persecution. The Roman Catholics and other small sects also accepted the connection between Church and State in this country, because they felt that it afforded them a protection which they would not otherwise have. The Dissenting bodies, indeed, were opposed to the connection, though not violently, for they objected to the Church with regard to matters of form and discipline rather than of doctrine. In this country it should be borne in mind the vast majority of the people were united by the common bond of Protestantism, and this would probably prevent any violent assault being made on the Established Church. In Ireland none of those conditions existed, and therefore he regarded the connection between the Church and State in that country as a fallacy. There the people were not united by the common bond of Protestantism. The great mass of the people, being Catholics, regarded the State religion as a dangerous not a fatal heresy, and as a badge of conquest. Until that badge of conquest was removed Ireland could not, in his opinion, be governed in a satisfactory manner. There was no justification for this anomaly and injustice, for as a missionary church the Establishment had signally failed. He sincerely rejoiced that this session had been at last taken up by the Liberal party. The right hon. Gentleman, a Member for South Lancashire had been very much assailed for change of opinion on this question. Now when he (Mr. Dillwyn) brought forward this question in 1865 the right hon. Gentleman urged him to withdraw the Resolution, and he was so well satisfied with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—knowing his character—that he withdrew it. Subsequently, when a hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Ray) gave notice to bring forward the same question he (Mr. Dillwyn) advised him not to bring it forward in the form of a Resolution, but to be content with having raised the question, and then to leave it in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, because he was confident that the right hon. Gentleman would in due time carry out the intention of which he had given so earnest to remedy the great injustice of the Established Church in Ireland. He sincerely hoped that the Liberal party, in or out of Office, would not give the subject up, and that no Government, calling itself Liberal would be content to remain in Office without securing the same justice for Ireland in religious matters that this country enjoyed.

MR. WALROND said, that he must put aside the appeal that had been made to them to limit their view of this great controversy within the narrow scope of Irish prejudice, and apply to it the broader considerations of an Imperial policy. The expression of a not unreasonable fear, that successful attack on the Church in Ireland would give a base for future successful attacks on the Church in England, had been met by the simple assertion that the position of the Church in England and in Ireland are so different that the fate of the one cannot influence that of the other. The hon. Member who had just sat down talked the position of the Church in Ireland being isolated and independent; but it was a misnomer to call the Irish Establishment the "Church of Ireland"—it was, in fact, a portion of the "United Church of England and Ireland." If one part were destroyed, the other must be endangered. If one member suffers, the other member must suffer with it. It was not reasonable to say that the health of a body would not be endangered by the paralysis of a portion of it. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Exeter had told them to look at this question from an Irish point of view. It was just this narrow Irish view of Irish interests which was the bane of Ireland, and a heavy cloud of adversity would hang over her until Irishmen would consent to view Irish questions in the broad clear light of Imperial interests, then also will, it was to be hoped, share fully in the general prosperity of the Empire. To limit thus the question of the Church necessitated the recognition of a separate nationality. For if the State, as the embodiment, concentration, and development of the feelings and conscience of the majority of the nation maintained a connection with a Church Establishment, in conformity with the feelings and conscience of this majority, it must be of the majority of the whole Empire, and not that of any special district in it. Any such district, before it can claim a different principle of legislation, must first prove its claim to a separate nationality. And it was in truth this sentiment that underlay all so-called Irish grievances. If it be not allowed to Ireland, how did she differ from any well-defined district in which the members of any one creed may outnumber the members of the Established Church? In each case they would be but the majority of a minority. If allowed, it is impossible to recognize it more fully than by acknowledging the justice, not of an equality only between the Churches, but an equality secured by the destruction of the Established Church. It justified the claims of the celebrated "Declaration" for a separate Legislature and a national divorce. In it was repudiated the efficiency of any measures an English Parliament could pass. By it was destroyed all hope that any such concession as was proposed would accomplish the end at which it aimed. Yet thus forewarned, they were asked to sacrifice in a hopeless experiment what many of them deeply and ardently cherished. They had been referred by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire to Mr. Burke, and he felt grateful for the reference. But Mr. Burke's policy was not that of the right hon. Gentleman. He begged to read an extract to the Committee. In his letter to his son he wrote—

“If ever the Church and the Constitution of England should fall in these Islands (and they will fall together), it is not Presbyterian discipline, nor Popish hierarchy that will rise upon their ruins; it is not the Church of Rome, nor the Church of Scotland, nor the Church of Luther, nor of Calvin. On the contrary, all these Churches are menaced, and menaced alike; it is the fanatical religion of the ‘rights of man,’ which rejects all Establishments, all discipline, all ecclesiastical, and, in truth, all civil order, which will triumph and lay prostrate your Church.”

Again—

“I will say that not one of the zealots for a Protestant interest wishes more sincerely than I do, perhaps not half so sincerely, for the support of the Established Church in both these kingdoms. It is a great link towards holding fast the connection of religion with the State, and for keeping these two Islands in a close connection of opinion and affection. I wish it well, as the religion of the greater number of the primary land proprietors of the kingdom, with whom all Establishments of Church and State, for strong political reasons, ought, in my opinion, to be firmly connected.”

But they had been told that a great crisis demanded a great sacrifice—a crisis arising from an aggregation of circumstances, no one of which, it was acknowledged, would justify it. But there was no novelty in these circumstances, taken in the aggregate or in the mass. Fenianism was the chief, which seemed to possess a chemical affinity to the morbid state of Irish political life. But Fenianism was new in name only; those who in former years preached the rights of man and the wrongs of Ireland were as much Fenians in doctrine and in practice as any modern Irish American adventurer. They were enemies to all religion, all Establishments, all order, and such were opposed by the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian clergy—a very good reason for strengthening all religions, but hardly for withdrawing from the Church of England the sanction and protection of the State. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire had thus described the positions of the three Churches in Ireland. “The English Church had little work and much pay; the Presbyterian Church much work and little pay; and the Roman Catholic Church much work and no pay.” And how did he propose to rectify this inequality? The Roman Catholic Church, the object of his special sympathy and legislation, he left precisely as he found it, except that he took away the Maynooth Grant, and so got the vote of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley).

The Presbyterian Church he left with its much work and little pay; and the English Church he disestablishes and disendows. The most ingenious legislation could not more effectually secure injury to all, and good to neither. Hitherto concessions have implied a benefit to be acquired; but now was conceded only the right and the power to attack. It is this which gave satisfaction to the Romish Church and her advocates; they hailed it as the great Roman Catholic triumph of the century. He did not deny the policy of relieving a “sentimental grievance,” but the remedy proposed shifted only the “sentimental grievance” from the majority of the district to the majority of the Empire, adding a substantial grievance on the minority of the district. But they had been told that the Church when destroyed was to be tenderly dealt with; that vested interests were to be respected; so the dead body of Cæsar was to be respected. His funeral was to be honoured with “all due pomp, and lawful ceremony”—

But the lifeless and wounded body lay before the conspirators—

“Look! in this place ran Cassius’ dagger through;
See, what a rent the envious Casca made;
Through this the well-beloved Brutus stabb’d;
And, as he plucked his cursed steel away,
Mark how the blood of Cæsar follow’d it;
As rushing out of doors, to be resolv’d
If Brutus so unkindly knock’d, or no;
For Brutus, as you know, was Cæsar’s angel.”

The vested rights of the clergy and the patrons of livings were to be considered, but not those of the Church, nor of the Protestant landlords. True, they bought their land with the rent-charge on it, and gave less for it on that account; but they bought it with the distinct understanding that they had secured to them an equivalent for that rent-charge, of which they would be now deprived. The Knight of Kerry had placed this so clearly in a published letter, and so confirmed this view of the case, that he begged leave to read an extract to the Committee. He wrote in his letter to The Times—

“The landlord has no right to put the amount of the tithe rent-charge into his pocket; but is it equally clear that he has no just claim or right in the application of it? . . . I think the case may be made more clear by excluding the ecclesiastical element for a moment, and treating it on ordinary principles of business. Suppose, for example, that all the estates in this county were liable to a charge, of say 1s. per pound, for the maintenance of some necessary local institutions, the County Hospital, for example—which we will suppose, moreover, had for centuries been supported from this fund, and this fund alone—would not all the landowners of this county have just cause of complaint if an Act of Parliament seized the above fund for the public Exchequer, and left them either to support the hospital out of their own pockets, or to allow it to collapse? I confess it does seem to me that a serious injustice would be done in this case, and I cannot possibly see where the parallel fails.”

The Union between England and Ireland was at all events so complete as to render different principles of legislation an inconsistency—so complete as to disqualify the Roman Catholic clergy from taking the position they assume. Their advocates in the House took a degrading rather than a high position. They placed themselves in the position of a professional beggar, who insisted that his neighbour, better clad and with more outward show of wealth, should cast aside these evidences of prosperity—which he will neither assume, nor share, nor receive an equivalent for, for in them he cannot beg, and so he insisted that both should wear the same garb, and both be beggars together. This was the monstrous position of the “levellers down”—in it the right hon. Gentleman opposite would maintain them, and he is supported by those Nonconformists who will not see that our Established Church is the most efficient obstacle to Roman Catholic development. The Roman Catholic hierarchy are well aware of this, and so they press earnestly for its disestablishment; but it seemed to be a natural law that common grievances united men more closely than common interests. Was there one who objected more strongly than another to the errors of the Church of Rome, it was the hon. Member for Peterborough; one who had a greater aversion than another for her political and social influence, it was the hon. Member for Birmingham, yet both would unite with that Church in all her attacks upon our Establishment; still he would be the last man to suggest that either hon. Member was a Jesuit in disguise. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has borne honorable testimony to the general absence of personal attacks on the change in his opinions; but he made a scarcely fair exception in his allusion to the “few stones cast by the Home Secretary out of his own glass house.” It appeared to him (Mr. Walrond) that the remarks of his right hon. Friend were addressed less against the consistency of the right hon. Member than as a proof of how thoroughly unprepared had been the country by the right hon. Member or the Liberal party for the great change proposed; and on this was based the argument that it was unfair to lay on this Parliament, especially under its peculiar condition, the responsibility of legislating on such an important matter. The Constitution had provided for a somewhat analogous case; and he was surprised at the observation that had been made that the argument was a thoroughly unconstitutional one, and that it was anarchical and democratic. When a Member of this House took high office under the State, he was sent back to his constituents to receive their sanction, and it was for them to justify his appointment. The Member was chosen for a general service; a special duty being added to it, he must obtain the sanction of his constituents. This Parliament was elected for purposes of general legislation. An unexpected change of policy imposed on it a special and unexpected responsibility, should it not seek the opinion of the constituency? And now as to the alternative policy forecast by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had characterized it as Pantheistic. No one had a greater facility for applying a hard word than the right hon. Member. [Mr. GLADSTONE intimated that he did not originate the epithet.] At all events, the right hon. Gentleman adopted it, which would serve his (Mr. Walrond's) purpose equally well. Well, whether it be applied to Ireland only, or used as a precedent for future legislation in England, if he was compelled to choose between the Pantheistic policy attributed to the Government or the atheistic policy of the right hon. Gentleman, he should unhesitatingly choose the former. It was far more in accordance with the spirit which inspired Mr. Burke, to whom he must ask leave again to refer. He wrote thus, alluding to the necessity of giving such education to the Roman Catholic clergy as should make them good and serviceable parish priests, in his Letter on the Penal Laws—

“I speak on the supposition that there is a disposition to take the State in the condition in which it is found, and to improve it in that state to the best advantage. On this idea, an education fitted to each order and division of men, such as they are found, will be thought an affair rather to be encouraged than discountenanced.”

Again in his Letter to Mr. Smith—

“My decided opinion is that all the three religions prevalent more or less in various parts of these Islands ought all, in subordination to the legal Establishment, as they stand in the several countries, to be all countenanced, protected, and cherished; and that in Ireland especially the Roman Catholic religion should be upheld in high respect and veneration, and should be, in its place, provided with all the means of making it a blessing to the people who profess it."

Again—

"I am the more serious on the positive encouragement to be given to this religion (always however as secondary), because the serious and earnest belief and practice of its professors form, as things stand, the most effectual barrier against Jacobinism"—

the Fenianism of the present day. But they were told that the day for this policy was past; it was never too late to do that which is just and right, but always too soon to do that which is unjust and wrong. It may be said that to propose any exceptional legislation for Ireland deprived him of all argument founded on a common nationality; but he had used none which could be applied against such principles as are involved in the maintenance of an Established Church, nor so used any that they could be applied against such modifications in our legislation as might be demanded by the special necessities of Ireland. No Member had risen from the Treasury Bench who had given them reason to believe that the Government was satisfied with the present relative position of the Churches in that country; or to doubt that when the requisite data were before them they would deal with the question in a "truly liberal" spirit, truly liberal because truly just, not only to the Roman Catholic but to the Protestant population, and, therefore, in their hands he should willingly leave the interests of Ireland, and of the Empire.

MR. GILPIN said, he thought

"The force of fancy could no farther go"

than the hon. Member's (Mr. Walrond's) comparison of the Irish Church to the body of Cæsar, and his attempt to crown the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) with the laurels of Brutus. He wished that those who spoke on this question could agree to confine their speeches within a period of ten minutes, because it appeared to him that hon. Members were only reiterating over and over again the same arguments, and nothing new seemed likely to be said. He desired, however, to say a few words from the stand-point of Protestant dissent. He believed he was representing a not uninfluential body of Dissenters, when he expressed an opinion in favour of the disendowment of all religious sects in Ireland. That body did not believe in the necessity of applying the public money to any religious purposes. The question before the House was one of simple justice. It was absolutely unjust that a Church of the small minority in the sister country should be the Established religion of the country. To endow one Church and not another would be an injustice—to endow all Churches would be an outrage upon religious truth. He wished hon. Members would keep the question of the Protestant Church separate from mere questions of power, pelf, and position. He would certainly be no party to any attack upon the Protestant Church. But the Protestant Church was one thing; the exclusive right to the loaves and fishes was another. It was his sincere conviction that the Protestant religion in Ireland would make infinitely more progress if it were cleared from the trammels of the State, and enabled to advocate freely the glorious doctrines which it upheld. Although Edmund Burke was an exceedingly able man, he (Mr. Gilpin) should much prefer the opinion of Dr. Chalmers on this question. That learned divine said—

"What have all the enactments of the statute book done for the cause of Protestantism in Ireland? And how comes it to pass that when single-handed Truth walked the land with the might and prowess of a conqueror, no sooner was she propped up by the authority of the State, no sooner was the armour of intolerance given to her, than her brilliant career of victory was for ever ended? When she took up the carnal and laid down the spiritual weapon her strength went out of her, she was struck with impotency. In giving up the warfare of principle for the warfare of politics she lost her power. Reason, Scripture, prayer, ought to comprise the whole armoury of religion, and by these alone the battles of our faith are to be successfully fought. . . . I want truth and force to be dis severed from each other; the moral and spiritual not to be implicated with the grossly physical means. Never will our cause prosper, never will it prevail in Ireland, until it is delivered from the outrage and contamination of so unholy an alliance. It is not because I hold Popery to be innocent that I want the removal of these disabilities; but because I hold that, if these were taken out of the way, she would be ten-fold more assailable. It is not because I am indifferent to the good of Protestantism that I want to displace these artificial crutches from under her; but because I want that, freed from every symptom of decrepitude and decay, she should stand forth in her own native strength, and make manifest to all men how firm a support she has on the goodness of her cause, and on the basis of her orderly and well-laid arguments."

He (Mr. Gilpin) believed that the cause of Protestantism needed no help from any much gravity. He was desirous of raising his voice in unison with those who held the Established Church in Ireland as a sacred institution, and who were determined to use their utmost endeavours to maintain in its integrity the connection of Church and State which they believed to be necessary to the stability and welfare of their country. Whatever might be said of the political consistency of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) the Resolutions he had submitted to the House gave no uncertain sound. They were clear, distinct, and unmistakable. They constituted the weapon with which the right hon. Gentleman intended to strike the first blow at the Established Church of both countries—the wedge driven in with which he hoped to uproot those institutions in this country, of which, unfortunately for so long, many have believed him to be the eloquent advocate and champion. They were now asked by the right hon. Gentleman to disestablish and disendow the Irish branch of the Establishment, with the assurance that all vested rights were to be preserved, and that the fabrics and residences of ministers were to be maintained. They were told if they consented to the Gentleman's proposition they would destroy Fenianism, and save the reality the two countries. Now, even be induced to believe that they would follow the proposition. In the House, he might hesitate to destroy some of our old landmarks and landmarks in agreeing the Resolutions.

"Ireland for the Irish." By acceding to the proposition of the right hon. Genl. they would be only giving the Fenian another lever to work with. What he really proposed to do was to sacrifice the interests of a portion of the country, which was undoubtedly loyal, to the interests of another portion, which was undoubtedly loyal, still did not attempt to owe a higher allegiance to the Sovereign than our own. Would the proposition satisfy Catholics themselves? would. There was much supposition. The Church things would be liable to endless abuse of our character. The land question did they think mild treatment the right hon. had been told will it be bribery and so on. How did he propose to proceed? Catholic Cl. vote it a gentle measure, such Cl.

the freer liberty in matters of political conduct for peace and harmony.

He did not look on the members of the Church as a cure for the grievances, but he did regard the stone in a future temple of peace would appeal to Irish Protestants to accept what was in their hands. They for years had possessed the position, and position; when religious prejudices were removed they would have the advantages in the race for political action, and without, as now too, in the case being obliged to coerce the tenantry they would find themselves voluntarily elected to seats in that House.

He said this much, being anxious to be Catholic to reply to the questions that had been put to the Catholic Members in the House as to the grounds on which they supported the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. KARSLAKE said, he had listened with much pleasure to the interesting speech of the learned Serjeant who had just sat down. [Laughter.] Well, had the hon. Baronet chosen the legal profession he could hardly have failed to attain that distinction. The hon. Baronet had said that to accede to the first Resolution would be to take the Irish question out of hot water. But, if so, how did it happen that the Irish question had been kept in hot water so long? Why had it not occurred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) that it was necessary to propose such summary and stringent Resolutions before? He would shortly state his objections to the Resolutions. The first Resolution must be considered by the Committee either by itself or in connection with the second and third, and what was that Resolution? It was a declaration by one branch of the Legislature alone, which was not intended to be followed up by any action whatever. Now, in a judicial body, and in that House, too, it was contrary to all rule to give opinion to expressions which were not to be followed up by action, and that rule prevailed even where the body could give effect to such expression of opinion. How much more strongly, then, could it hold good of that House, which was fluctuating in its nature, and a great part of which must be changed before next year? Even if this were to be the House of Commons which would sit next year, it would be contrary to all the views

Frederick Heygate), he doubted if he should have addressed the House at all. The hon. Member (Mr. Forster) said that that was not an Irish question. He agreed with him, it was not an Irish question. The people of England and of Scotland must have learned by that time that the discontent existing in Ireland, and the necessity of considering it in that House, operated injuriously on Scotch and English interests, and interrupted the course of legislation requisite for that portion of the Empire. Until a system of legislation was entered on for Ireland, founded on truth and justice, hon. Members must expect discontent. And it was because he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) believed that the Irish Church was a bar to social union, and operated in effecting a complete separation of classes, that he was there to oppose its continuance. He had ever entertained the opinion that sectarian and religious differences were the curse of Ireland. He did not thereby mean to say that a man was to repress his religious opinions or to be deprived of his full religious freedom; but he did assert that the existence of the Establishment created an idea of superiority in the minds of the middle class and poorer Protestants especially, which was a bar to that thorough union of all classes in Ireland without which there could not be prosperity. He repudiated the notion, no doubt in error put forward by the Member for Cambridge, that in supporting those Resolutions Catholics were attacking the religion of Protestants, and were assailing their theology. Nothing could be further from his intention, and he might say from the intention of all Catholics with whom he was acquainted? What was the social position of the Catholics and Protestants in Ireland at that moment? He believed that they were as separate and distinct as they were fifty years ago. They met, no doubt, in public fairs and markets, purchased cattle, or entered into commercial transactions together, but there their intimacy ceased. They had no intimacy in one another's houses, especially the female members of their families, one with another; and this arose from the feelings of superiority generated by the profession of a State religion. He appealed to Protestant Irish Members opposite if this were not so, and if it were he asked the House was this a state of things that should exist? He had no ill will, he need not say, nor had the mass of his fellow Catholics, to the members of the Protestant Church in Ireland

nor to their clergy; and it was to induce a better spirit, remove asperities, and advance mutual conciliation that he advocated the removal of the barrier of the Established Church. He must confess he was astonished to find the Roman Catholics accused of entering into a confederacy with the High Church Ritualists. He, as a Catholic, was there to deny such a charge; indeed, he should rather retort it on its authors. He had known of an attempted confederacy to catch the Irish vote, and by its influence to trample upon Liberalism. He had felt its effects, and could speak feelingly on the subject as regarded his own county. The hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench had been asserted to be, par excellence, the supporters of Catholic interests. A union had been attempted to be proved between those whom the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury now designates as the Ultramontane Catholics and the Orangemen, by means of such a coalition to resuscitate what was called constitutional Conservatism in his own county. Persons who were afterwards Ministers of the Crown had advised such an alliance. He always thought and expressed his belief that to maintain for any time such an alliance would be futile. His opinion had turned out true, and now they had the Government who had formerly tried to creep into power by the Catholic vote endeavouring to maintain Office by a cry of "No Popery." He was happy to observe that there was growing up in England among Protestants a new school of politicians, strongly Protestant in their religious opinions, but who were freed from the slightest taint of bigotry, and preferred to see an enlightened policy pursued towards Ireland. As a type of them he might mention the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone), who by his speech in that House, and by a pamphlet which he had written, had exhibited a liberality worthy of all honour. He had alluded in his pamphlet to the fact that the people in England were too much given to ignore the feelings of the Irish people, and to regard nothing of importance that did not affect their material interests. It was the vice of the school of mental philosophy of the last century to regard every human motive to be founded on considerations of utility, and that vice we were too much disposed to put in practice there, and to disregard, as Mr. Johnstone said, all Irish sentiment. It was this sentimental feeling, as he said before, which kept Irishmen apart, and a feeling of this kind, be it sentimental, or be it material, must in the interest of the country, command attention in that House. There had been three defences usually made for the retention of the Establishment—that it was the Apostolic, that it was the united, and that it was a missionary Church. To be the Apostolic would be inconsistent with its being the united Church, for the Church to which it was united, created as it was by Act of Parliament, could not claim to be Apostolic. As regards its being the united Church, it was strange for an united Church how jealous the clergy in Ireland were of English appointments being made there; and as to its doctrine, it could be considered as Anglican only by virtue of its union with the State. He need not speak of it as a missionary Church. Burke had said, if Ireland were Hindoo there would have been no Church Establishment, but in India, composed as it was of populations professing Bhuddist, Hindoo and Mahomedan doctrines, he saw that the British Government of India allowed none of its officials to meddle with the religion of the people; and could it be contended that what we did not permit in India we were to allow in a country like Ireland, separated from England but by a narrow sea. The anxiety to preserve this Establishment existed alone in the higher classes. He had that evening been credibly informed in that House that seven-eighths of the Presbyterian clergy were against the continuance of the Establishment. He could well understand members of some leading families in Ireland, traditionally connected with Toryism, being anxious to preserve it. The representation of the North of Ireland was preserved to the Tory party alone by shaking this rag of ascendancy in the faces of the Ulster Protestants. Were religious distinctions no longer to exist an Ulster Protestant would in politics be like his co-religionist in Scotland or in the North of England, he would not say a Republican, but a very advanced Liberal, and political loss would ensue to the Irish Conservatives. It might, however, be said that the genius of Catholicity being Conservative, there might be a gain in the opposite direction. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) did not care if it were so, but he might be allowed to say, with the mass of Irish Catholics, that the very submission to authority which was imposed upon them by their religion in matters of faith they felt left them by the very contrast the freer liberty in matters political. Irrespective of political consequences he wished for peace and harmony in that country. He did not look on the disestablishment of the Church as a cure for Ireland's grievances, but he did regard it as the first stone in a future temple of concord. He would appeal to Irish Protestant gentlemen to accept what was inevitable. They for years had possessed wealth, education, and position; when religious prejudices were removed they would give them advantages in the race for political distinction, and without, as now too often was the case being obliged to coerce an unwilling tenantry they would find themselves voluntarily elected to seats in that House. He said this much, being anxious as a Catholic to reply to the questions that had been put to the Catholic Members in that House as to the grounds on which they supported the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. KARSLAKE said, he had listened with much pleasure to the interesting speech of the learned Serjeant who had just sat down. [Laughter.] Well, had the hon. Baronet chosen the legal profession he could hardly have failed to attain that distinction. The hon. Baronet had said that to accede to the first Resolution would be to take the Irish question out of hot water. But, if so, how did it happen that the Irish question had been kept in hot water so long? Why had it not occurred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) that it was necessary to propose such summary and stringent Resolutions before? He would shortly state his objections to the Resolutions. The first Resolution must be considered by the Committee either by itself or in connection with the second and third, and what was that Resolution? It was a declaration by one branch of the Legislature alone, which was not intended to be followed up by any action whatever. Now, in a judicial body, and in that House, too, it was contrary to all rule to give opinion to expressions which were not to be followed up by action, and that rule prevailed even where the body could give effect to such expression of opinion. How much more strongly, then, would it hold good of that House, which was fluctuating in its nature, and a great part of which must be changed before next Easter? Even if this were to be the House of Commons which would sit next year, it would be contrary to all the views and practices of Englishmen to pass a Resolution which would be mere brutum fulmen. But to the first Resolution taken in connection with the second and third there was a still more serious objection. The second Resolution in itself was open to the same objection as the first—it was not a declaration of opinion by the Judges who were to pass sentence, but by a body, many of whom would not be in that House next year. But were they to declare in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church—in other words, were they to give the Reformed Parliament a hint as to the few it ought to entertain on a question so serious, so momentous, involving so many questions running into one another, as it were wheels within wheels, that he believed younger Members than himself would never see the end of it? But even if the first and second Resolutions were carried, and a Bill introduced to give them effect, in spite of all the able speeches he had heard on the subject, he felt still a difficulty in understanding the third Resolution. That Resolution recommended an Address to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to place her interest in the temporalities of the Irish Church at the disposal of that House. Now, he did not attach much weight to the objection derived from the Coronation Oath. It was imposed by Parliament, and the same power which tied the knot could untie it. If hon. Gentlemen thought that before August next the House of Commons would pass a measure which would be accepted by the House of Lords and by Her Majesty, the thing might be done. But he was not sure that hon. Members recollected the words of the Oath. They were to this effect—that Her Majesty was bound to the utmost of her power to maintain the Reformed Religion established by law, and to preserve unto the Bishops and clergy of his realm and the churches committed to their charge all such rights and privileges as by law appertained to them or any of them. By one of the Articles of the Act of Union the Church of Ireland and the Church of England were made one and indivisible, under the title of “The United Church of England and Ireland.” By that Article the preservation of an endowed Church in Ireland was maintained. Now, the first two Resolutions, if taken without the third, would lead to nothing—they were merely abstract. As regarded the third, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, knowing that an Act of Parliament on the subject during the present Session was impossible, called on the House to address Her Majesty to take a step which would prejudice the whole question that was to come, not before this Parliament, but before a Parliament which, to a great extent, was certain to be differently constituted from the present one. He submitted that the House ought to stop the proceeding in limine by saying that the time had not come for taking this question into consideration. He spoke with great deference, because he knew that his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) would say again, as he said before, that the time had come and the man. For himself he knew that, if a few years ago, when he was asked to go down to Oxford to vote for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, not as a Liberal candidate, but as the best of two Conservative candidates, he could have supposed that in 1867 the right hon. Gentleman would bring forward such Resolutions as were now before the Committee, he should have asked a question or two, and have hesitated to give him (Mr. Gladstone) his vote. The constituencies of England would have to make up their minds on this question, and he had no doubt they were considering it now. At present he should content himself with saying that the hour was not come, and that the place for deciding on the fate of the Irish Church was not this present House of Commons.

Mr. ALLEN said: I felt anxious to say a few words in the course of this debate, looking at the matter from that stand-point which I think a member of the English Established Church may fairly take. And I feel bound to give my vote in favour of this Resolution, because I am fully convinced of the justice and necessity of the Irish Church ceasing to exist as an Establishment. For although a Churchman myself, I regard the Irish Church as an anomaly which ought to exist no longer, and indeed as an anomaly which never ought to have existed at all; that in a country with a population of 5,500,000, the Established Church, with its great revenue of £450,000 per annum, should be the Church of a small minority of 690,000 people. Now this is a state of things with reference to an Established Church to which, I believe, no parallel can be found in the history of Christianity; and it is a state of things which I hold it would be unwise and unjust in this House to allow to exist any longer.

There can be no question that as a missionary Church, as it has been termed in the course of this debate, it has been a failure; and, indeed, I believe it has caused the Roman Catholics of Ireland to look on Protestantism with hatred and disfavour, and has naturally prejudiced them against it, when they have seen the Church of a small minority placed in the position of a richly endowed Establishment, to which they have been compelled directly and indirectly to contribute. Protestantism has thus been constantly presented before them as the religion of ascendancy; it has been daily presented before their eyes as the richly endowed religion of what they considered a conquering race, and it is no wonder that they have rejected it. Instead of coming before them as a faith which was trying to win its way with the meek and earnest zeal of a missionary Church, depending alone for support on the devotion of its own adherents, it has come before them with all the pomp and state of a richly endowed Establishment, with a long array of Archbishops, and Bishops, and deans, and canons, with large incomes, and, unfortunately in many instances, scarcely any duties to perform. Many of these have been excellent and holy men—men who would have adorned any Church, but they have been placed in an entirely false position; Protestantism has itself been placed in a false position; and the consequence has been that in Ireland it has been a failure, and the efforts of its teachers have been paralyzed. In fact, speaking myself as a Protestant, I can come to no other conclusion than that the Irish Church Establishment has been one great barrier to the spread of Protestantism in that country. I will put it to any Protestant Gentleman in this House, if here in England, where the Roman Catholic Church being as it is, the Church of a small minority, were nevertheless the Established Church, supported by great revenues and endowments, whether it would not render the Protestants of this country much more hostile to Romanism than they are at present; because it would then always be presented before their eyes as a Church which was based on, and supported by, a great act of injustice? Now there are two ways of dealing with this question: the one is the plan of disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church, and in time reducing and taking away the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum, or, as it is termed, levelling downwards; the other, which is the plan of

hon. Members opposite, and has been frequently hinted at in their speeches, is, instead of disendowing the Irish Church, to endow the Roman Catholic priesthood, to found a Roman Catholic College, and to raise the amount of the Regium Donum, or, in other words, to level upwards, by endowing all alike. But how supremely ridiculous and costly this scheme would be. In the first place, in order to do justice, you would have to give the Roman Catholics—being eight times as numerous—just eight times as much endowment; in the second place, you would have to largely increase the Regium Donum; and in the third place, you would have to offer endowments to the other Protestant sects, who would most probably have too much good sense to accept them. Now do you for a moment believe that the Protestant feeling of this country would allow you to do this, more especially as the Irish Catholic priesthood do not ask for endowment, and even declare they would not accept it, and when, moreover, many of the most enlightened Presbyterians are of opinion that the Regium Donum does them more harm than good, by checking the flow of private liberality? Now this being the case, there only remains one way, and that is the plan recommended in these Resolutions, and I honestly believe it is the only wise and just course we can pursue. But then it is said that the disestablishment of the Irish Church is only the first step towards the disestablishment of the English Church: but this I deny altogether; the condition of the two Churches is essentially distinct: the one is the Church of a small minority, existing in the face of, and opposed to, the wishes of a large and hostile majority; the other is the Church of the majority, and even many of those who do not belong to it agree with most or all of its doctrines. The disestablishment of the Irish Church can never be used as an argument for the disestablishment of the English Church, till the situation of the two Churches becomes identical; so long as the English Church is the Church of the majority it will stand, and when it ceases to be the Church of the majority it must fall, because then its existence as an Establishment will be opposed to the feelings and wishes of the majority of the nation. There is a vital difference between the existence of a Church as an Establishment and its existence as a teacher of truth and religion; its existence as the former can only be maintained while it is the Church of the majority of the people; as the latter it may exist, though its members are few and only a very small minority; the one is a mere State arrangement, depending on time and circumstances; the other depends on the truth of the faith it teaches, and the zeal of its adherents. As a Protestant, and as a Churchman, I hold it just and right that the Irish Church should cease to exist as an Establishment, opposed as it is to the views and wishes of a vast majority of the Irish people; while, as a teacher of truth and religion, I believe it will still survive, and live a more vigorous life, and flourish more than it has ever done before.

MR. BENTINCK said, he thought the House ought to be grateful to the hon. Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) for his statement that the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman would not be a panacea for the people of Ireland. That was not the only time the hon. Baronet had made that significant statement, for at a meeting of the Liberation Society, held in December last, he said that the Irish Church was no serious grievance; but they had still higher authority to the same effect from Archbishop Manning in his letter to Earl Grey, who said—

"I will not shrink from venturing even upon the land question, because it is the chief condition on which the peace of Ireland depends. . . . In comparison with it all others are light. It is the question of peace or social war."

If that were so what became of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman? What did the right hon. Gentleman himself say was the primary cause of his bringing forward the Motion? He said it was the intensity of Fenianism. But Fenianism existed while the right hon. Gentleman was in power, and how, on his own shewing, could he justify himself for not then endeavouring to deal with the question? The right hon. Gentleman addressed his constituents last December at Ormskirk, and did he say anything about disestablishing the Irish Church? He said he wished to establish in Ireland the principles of religion. [MR. GLADSTONE: The principles of religious equality.] That did not involve the necessity of passing such Resolutions as were now proposed. The fact was, it had not then been settled by the governing body of the so-called Liberal party that such was to be their policy. If it had, Earl Russell would not have written his letter to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue). The principles embodied in that pamphlet were not those now advocated; and, moreover, the right hon. Gentleman in speaking on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) did not venture to express an opinion that if the Irish Church should be disestablished and its property confiscated tranquillity would necessarily follow. This was the first time of late years that it had been proposed to confiscate the property of the Church to appease Irish discontent, and the same arguments that were now used for the disestablishment of the Irish Church would ultimately be applied to the Church of England. The action of the so-called Liberal party would prove this position. The hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) had lately declared that there could be no such thing as a principle of Establishment. Again, the meeting at which a noble Earl, at one time Leader of the Liberal party, now the follower of the right hon. Gentleman, did penance in a moral white sheet and with a moral candle in his hand, and the meeting at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, crowded with persons, who did not care about the Irish Church, but went to see the Member for Birmingham as they would have gone to see Garibaldi, the late King Theodore, or the Pope of Rome, had any of those worthies mounted the rostrum, showed that the destruction of Establishments was the end sought to be attained. The object of the meeting at the Tabernacle was especially to declare hostility to the Church of England, and to the same effect was the letter from Mr. Spurgeon read on that occasion, and applauded to the echo by the audience. It was fair to admit that a section of the so-called Liberal party denied these conclusions. He had observed that at the meeting which was recently held in Willis's Rooms to present a testimonial to a right hon. Gentleman, the latter stated that he was an attached member of the Church of England, and that nothing would ever induce him to part with any of the property belonging to it; and he (Mr. Bentinck) had no doubt there were many others on the same side who entertained similar sentiments. But if in their hearts they were true Conservatives, how could they vote for these Resolutions? Nay, more, how could they place confidence in the right hon. Gentleman as a Leader? Was there a single question on which the right hon. Gentleman had not changed his opinions? He very well remembered the contest at Oxford in 1852,

when the right hon. Gentleman first joined the Ministry of Lord Aberdeen. He had always thought that the right hon. Gentleman would come to his present condition of opinion, and, although a Cambridge man himself, he had subscribed a small sum in 1852 to assist in displacing him from the representation of Oxford University. At that period the hon. Baronets, the Members for Oxford University and North Devon, were the right hon. Gentleman's chief supporters, but as time went on the right hon. Gentleman forced his old friends to leave him one by one, till at last he was defeated. He then hastened to South Lancashire, where he announced to the electors that he stood before them "unmuzzled," by which expression he intimated that if they would return him, he would bring all the artillery of his unrivalled talents to bear against his former friends. He (Mr. Bentinck) considered, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman had thus fully justified the opposition against him at Oxford. It was clear from the letter addressed by the right hon. Gentleman in 1865 to a dignitary of the Church in Scotland, and lately cited and published, that the right hon. Gentleman had only recently adopted his present views with regard to the Irish Church; for the reference in that letter to the 5th Article of the Union, and to the position of the Irish hierarchy was conclusive that "disestablishment had not then entered his mind." The right hon. Gentleman's mode of escape from his difficulty was curious. He said, "That was my idea at the time, but I have abandoned it." The right hon. Gentleman would remind the House of Touchstone, in As You Like It, who, after explaining the "retort courteous," the "quip modest," and so forth, showed how the "lie direct" might always be avoided with an "if"—so the right hon. Gentleman always avoided a position he had formerly taken by saying, "That was my idea, but I have abandoned it;" and if this Resolution was agreed to, he might use the same phrase next year against the protection of vested rights and personal property, which he now disclaimed any intention of attacking. The support of the thirty Roman Catholic Members, probably, gave the right hon. Gentleman his majority on the eve of the Recess; but he was at a loss to understand that support when he remembered that the two cardinal points of the Roman Catholic policy all over Europe were the maintenance of the temporal power of the Pope and religious denominational education, and called to mind what had been the language used by the right hon. Gentleman in reference to both these points. He would quote for the benefit of Roman Catholic Members the last opinion which the right hon. Gentleman had uttered in the House with reference to the temporal power of the Pope—

"The doctrine upon which the Papal Sovereignty is supported is so intolerable that the Roman or Italian who could acquiesce in it would be nothing but a worm fit to be trampled under foot."

And after referring to the doctrine of M. Montalembert, that every one of the 200,000,000 Roman Catholics has a vested interest in the maintenance of the Papal Sovereignty, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say—

"Therefore the people who inhabit the States of the Church have not so much hope left as this, that if the Pope and the Cardinals are favourable to them, they may have some chance of relief. No! every Roman Catholic in the world is to presume to deal with their feelings and destinies and to assert a political right to dominion over them. This appears to me a doctrine more monstrous than that upon which the laws of Draco were founded."

He (Mr. Bentinck) last week read this passage to a distinguished prelate of the French Church, and asked what he thought of it. The prelate said, "Very bad indeed." He then asked, "Can your Lordship believe that your co-religionists are at this moment fighting under the banner of the Gentleman who made that speech?" The prelate replied, "I could not believe it; it is very wrong indeed; they ought to be good Conservatives." And so they ought. But the right hon. Gentleman did not stop there; when General Garibaldi visited this country the right hon. Gentleman was his humble servant. Now, General Garibaldi was admitted on all hands to be, not only the determined enemy of the Pope, but also the type of anti-Christianity; indeed, he did not believe it was on record that the General while in this country visited any place of worship. The right hon. Gentleman not only patronized and entertained him, but actually visited him on one occasion at nine o'clock in the morning in order to induce him to leave this country. [Cries of "Question!"] That fairly applied to the question, which was how Roman Catholic Members, when the cardinal points of Catholic policy all over the world were to maintain the temporal power of the Pope and to keep up Establishments, could follow the Leadership of the right hon. Gentleman, who was so hostile to them upon every material question in which they were interested. The so-called Liberal party contained men of every shade of opinion; and it was a sad result that if ever an independent voice was heard among them it was stifled directly, either by the tyranny of the Whips, or by the pressure of political influence. The unfortunate individual who raised the voice of independence was pressed down, sank, and was carried away by the torrent of official despotism. When the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. B. Osborne) rebelled against Lord Palmerston he was expelled from the quiet southern constituency which he then represented, and was obliged to take refuge in a rougher atmosphere in the midland counties; and though not long ago he advocated the retention of ecclesiastical endowments, the pressure had been put upon him and he had been brought back to the fold. So it was with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), who, when he endeavoured to follow an independent course, was attacked by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) and compared to a Scotch terrier, and who now, under the pressure of the so-called Liberal party, had assumed a humble position and sat just beneath the hon. Member for Birmingham. The Resolution of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was nothing more than a mere contrivance devised for party purposes, and he should give it the strongest and most determined opposition.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he thought that the House would agree with the hon. Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) that the settlement of the Irish Church question would not settle the land question or any other question; but he believed that the majority of the House would be of opinion that a satisfactory settlement of the Church question would remove a very great grievance, and go a long way to convince the people of Ireland that there was a growing anxiety in that House to deal fairly with questions of vital interest to their country. Under ordinary circumstances a Motion for the disestablishment of the Irish Church would have attracted no more attention than was bestowed on any of the frequently recurrent topics of the day. The subject to which the Resolution of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) referred was familiar to the minds of hon. Members and to the country, and the object which the Resolution sought to attain was one which had been sought through many hopeless years by those who loved religious equality for its own sake, as well as by the millions who had to endure the pressure of ascendancy. But in the hands of the right hon. Member this threadbare subject was re-habilitated and arrayed with new and essential qualities derived from the right hon. Gentleman's character. For the first time in the history of Irish politics a great statesman, the Leader of a powerful party, and the representative of that enlightened opinion which must control the destinies of the people throughout the Empire, had come forward to propose an Irish policy based on and demanded by justice. The Motion had brought the Irish nation and an ascendant minority face to face. It was just such a one as might have been made in an Irish Parliament by Grattan or O'Connell, and it would have been resisted there as it was resisted in that House by a party who were the representatives, not of the Irish people, but of Protestant ascendancy. The success of such a Resolution in an Irish Parliament would have established the triumph of the principle of religious equality; and its success in the English Parliament would do that and something more, for it would show that the sympathy of the House of Commons, and of the English people—more liberal than the House of Commons—was with the nation, which sought for religious equality and the extension of popular rights, and against a minority whose guiding policy was religious ascendancy and resistance to popular demands. A measure of justice, free from alloy, was now proposed. Former attempts to settle Irish questions of national importance had been so interwoven with qualifying proposals that, though nominally some changes were made, yet for all practical purposes things were left just as they were. Thus, when Roman Catholics were again permitted to sit in Parliament, then, as a set-off to that concession the 40s. freeholders were disfranchised, and every Roman Catholic favourable to popular claims was left to depend for a seat in Parliament on landlord influence, or, in other words, Protestant influence. The Tithe Commutation Act of 1834 was little more than an alteration of the manner in which the tithes were collected. Those were the days of half measures, or, more accurately speaking, of sham measures. They were now going to try a remedy pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury twenty-four years ago; but they were going to try it in a sense and spirit very different from that contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman. The impartial treatment, in every respect, of Protestants and Catholics was a matter of course in France, Prussia, Belgium, Switzerland, and the United States. Legislation in accordance with the wants and wishes of the majority was the rule almost all over the world; but the recognition of that principle would amount to a great revolution in Ireland. Viewed in that light, the Resolution of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was a revolution, but, unless evil be preferred to good, it was a revolution which must command the sympathy and support of every man not carried away by party spirit or selfish interest. Nothing had astonished him more than the reckless assertion that the Irish farmers neither felt nor had any interest in the settlement of the Church question. Could it be denied that the money with which the tithes were paid was produced by the labour of the Irish farmers? When the farmer paid his rent he also paid the tithes, the landlord acting as collector. And could the farmers then, as reasonable men, be indifferent as to the way in which that money was expended? Take a district in which there were twelve farmers, all of whom paid tithes, but only one of whom was an Episcopalian Protestant, and he alone derived any benefit from the expenditure of the tithe money; and was it reconcilable with human nature to suppose that his eleven neighbours could be contented while he enjoyed this monopoly? But though at present the Irish Roman Catholic farmers obtained no value for that money, the case would be different when the ecclesiastical revenues, now misappropriated by a small minority, were applied to national purposes. There were three parties in the House on this question—first, those who were of opinion that the State Church must cease to exist; secondly, the Gentlemen from Ulster, who said it must be maintained; and lastly, others who supported a compromise which would remove some ecclesiastical inequalities. Now, to defend the Established Church as it existed would be a plain and manly course; but a compromise was the last resort of a tottering Administration. If the Government could obtain a majority they would maintain the Established Church, flatter the Orangemen, scout the idea of a compromise, and hold Office in defiance of the most solemn appeals for justice. This was what they intended to do now that they were in a minority; but he ventured to predict that, if they attempted to defend the Irish Church on its merits, they must fall before the onward march of the majority. If, on the other hand, they attempted to save their places by sacrificing the Established Church, many of the props which sustained them would be rudely withdrawn by the infuriated zealots of Ulster. English Protestantism and Ulster Protestantism were two different things. The former wanted the inflaming recollections of the Boyne, the slapping of the gates of Derry, the cracking of the boom, and the exploits of the immortal Walker. The Catholics had done everything to conciliate these Protestants. They had refrained from irritating allusions, political or otherwise, and had even made a joke of the exaggerations about Orange prowess. Notwithstanding this, there was as wide a gulf between the Irish people and Orangeism as there ever had been. If the first Lord of the Treasury could induce the Orangemen to abandon their principles in order to save his Administration, he would deserve the gratitude of mankind, and no one would then care to criticise his motives. To say that the House of Commons was unable to deal with this question was a device as disingenuous as it was weak. It was an indirect mode of saying that the House was afraid of the verdict of the country. Everybody knew that the question could not be finally settled without an appeal to the country; and everybody also knew that the action of the new constituencies would be less favourable to the Irish Church than that of the old constituencies. If the argument for delay was good for anything, then, on the passing of the English Reform Bill, Parliament ought to have suspended all further legislation except the Irish and Scotch Bills. But it was impossible to show that there were some questions which they might, and others which they might not, deal with. He maintained that, as long as the present House of Commons lasted, they were free to legislate on any question they thought proper to deal with. The conduct of the Government led one to suppose that they had no special policy upon this any more than upon any other question; that, like a sailor without a chart, they were drifting about, having not the least idea where the storm might ultimately land them. During the agitation of such a question everybody knew that an appeal would be made to anti-

Irish and anti-Catholic prejudices; but nobody would have anticipated that such an appeal would have been made by the First Lord of the Treasury. Yet he had not hesitated to raise the cry of "The Church in danger!" and had further declared that the safety of the Throne depended on the maintenance of this alien Church, and that the Ritualists had united in a conspiracy with those to whom the right hon. Gentleman had given the nickname of Irish Romanists. A respect for Parliamentary decorum prevented him from characterizing this Parliamentary fiction in adequate terms; in charity, it must be supposed to be the product of the right hon. Gentleman's heated imagination. The hostility of the Irish people to the Protestant Church had nothing whatever to do with doctrinal points, as was shown by the relations between Catholics and Presbyterians; it was directed solely against that political and religious ascendancy which were inseparable from the position of the Protestant Church as an Establishment. But although the appeal of the Prime Minister to prejudice and passion might create some turmoil and agitation, it could not postpone for any lengthened period the satisfactory settlement of the Irish Church question. There was at length to be religious equality in Ireland. The Protestant Establishment was to be disestablished and disendowed. For many long years justice had been denied to Ireland, and wise and good men who had had to yield upon this question to the superior influence of a favoured faction had gone down to their graves leaving to their countrymen the corroding conviction that injustice was enthroned in this House. The present, therefore, was a moment of triumphant exultation to the Catholics, because the cause of truth and justice was triumphant. It was not, however, exclusively a Catholic triumph, for the Catholics could not have advanced one step but for the aid of their Protestant fellow-countrymen. At every period they had given them a generous and an earnest support. There was not a district in the three provinces where there were not many Protestants, men of great territorial standing, who were, and whose fathers before them had been, fast friends of religious liberty. And he could say with pleasure on the part of the Roman Catholics that they had not been ungrateful, for in those districts not merely the rights but the feelings of the Protestants were scrupulously and religiously respected by the majority of their countrymen in every rank of life and in every sphere of duty. It had been frequently said that if the Irish Church were disestablished the Irish Protestants would be greatly irritated. No doubt those who sought for exclusive privileges would be irritated, but, fortunately, they were only a small minority. He would say to the House, "Remember that your fears must not overcome your sense of justice. Remember, moreover, that you have nothing to fear if now, although it be for the first time in your history, you put your faith in the Irish people. And remember also that in every province, county, city, and town in Ireland, with only two or three exceptions even in the North, the friends of religious equality are the immense majority, and its opponents an insignificant minority."

GENERAL PEELE: Sir, I start now from the point to which we were conducted by the celebrated division on the morning of the 4th of April. I do not think it worth while to speculate on the many causes which tended to swell the majority on that occasion; but I firmly believe that if "all hearts were open, all desires known"—if there were no secrets as to the motives which served to produce that majority, it would be found that the Protestant Church in Ireland had very little indeed to do with it. It was a great party move, and as a means of uniting—at all events for the moment—the fragments into which the party opposite were broken, and of showing the strength of the great Liberal party, I am perfectly willing to admit that it was a great success, and that the concoctors of it deserved great praise in a party point of view. A noble Letter-writer—there are really so many political letter-writers now that it is necessary to particularize them—a noble Letter-writer has remarked upon my having failed on a former occasion to recognize the justice of the comparison which he drew between the Liberal party opposite and the pioneers and engineers of an army. Now, I am bound to acknowledge, after carefully considering these Resolutions, the motives which have dictated them, and the objects for which they are brought forward, that I recognize in them a similarity to one duty which is performed by the pioneers of an army, and that is, that they do all the dirty work. I think this military comparison might be extended much further. I think the political movements of the present day very much represent the manœuvres of skilful generals in the field; that in politics in this House, as in war, every advantage is taken, and everything is regarded as fair. I can easily imagine, Sir, the anxiety under which the Leaders of hon. Gentlemen opposite met to consult how they might best counteract the great success of the able tactician by whom they were last year opposed, who completely turned the flank of their engineers and pioneers, and who seized not merely their guns, but the very great gun, which only the year before, 1866, he had himself pronounced to be dangerous, even with a comparatively moderate and diminished charge, and he loaded it to the muzzle with any projectiles which hon. Gentlemen opposite would contribute towards it, until even the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) who claimed the gun as his own, and who, like many other inventors, complained of the Government having taken his invention without allowing him any reward, declared that it was no longer safe; and I verily believe that hon. Gentlemen had good grounds for coming to the conclusion that there was too much residuum in it. I must confess I think that the very first effect of the discharge of that gun will be to blow the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury and all those who sit beside and behind him, to at all events the opposite side of the House, and that it will also imperil all those institutions which that party, previously to the schoolmaster being abroad among them held, to be of the greatest importance. Now, the Resolutions before us propose two things—namely, the disestablishment and the disendowment of the Established Church. Between those two things there is the greatest possible distinction. The disendowment of the Established Church in Ireland bears upon the matter which a Royal Commission is at present considering; and it will be quite time enough to deal with that question when the Commissioners have made their Report. But the disestablishment of the Church is the severance of all connection between Church and State. It is a refusal on the part of the State to recognize the Protestant Church in Ireland. Upon what grounds are we called upon to do that? Why, to please the Roman Catholics, who say they really do not want its endowments; but that the acknowledgment of that Church by the State is an injury and an injustice to them. And a distinction is drawn between the Protestant Church in Ireland and the Protestant Church in England—a distinction which I, for one, do not for a moment admit. I say they form the one Church of the United Kingdom, of which the Sovereign of the United Kingdom is the head. You may dissolve the Union if you please, but as long as that Union exists there is but one Church, and if you dissolve the union between Church and State in Ireland, the dissolution of the union between Church and State will follow as a necessary consequence in England also. There was a meeting held, I think, on the 16th of the present month at St. James' Hall, of which Earl Russell was the Chairman; and I believe it was the noble Chairman on that occasion who stated that no single argument was ever brought forward by those who opposed these Resolutions. Now, I hold it to be a very strong argument that the necessary consequence of severing the connection between Church and State in Ireland will be the dissolution of that connection in England also. And I am not singular in this opinion. In a debate which occurred in "another place" not long ago with respect to the Established Church in Ireland, one of the speakers said there were the usual three courses which might be pursued, and having talked of the first two he came to the third course, and I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it is not exactly like the course proposed by the present Resolutions. The speaker in question went on to say—

"A third course would be to "secularize" the Church funds—that is, to adopt the voluntary principle in regard to the Church in Ireland—to establish no new Church, and to abolish the Establishment which at present exists, giving to education or to any other object of public utility the revenues which are now absorbed by the Established Church in Ireland. Of course, this proposal contemplates securing a life interest to the present holders of benefices in the Church. This is a plan which I have often thought might be realized."—[3 Hansard, clxxxiii. 364.]

"But it has very great defects in it. In the first place, you immediately destroy, as far as Ireland is concerned, the principle of Establishment. Such an example would hardly be lost on the Dissenters of this country. Although the cases might be very dissimilar, those who strove for the destruction of the Church Establishment in Ireland in favour of the voluntary principle would avail themselves of the precedent to overthrow the Established Church here. I therefore think it would be unwise in us to assent to a Bill embodying that view, even if it came from the House of Commons."—[Ibid.]

Well, who was the speaker on that occasion? Why, the very Earl Russell who presided over the meeting to which I have referred. But let me ask why are the Protestants of Ireland to be deprived of the advantage of being acknowledged by the State? Are you ashamed of being a Protestant country? Do you think that the Roman Catholics in Ireland would have greater respect for you if you professed yourselves to be a Godless State? Do you not think, on the contrary, that those Roman Catholics who would not acknowledge your "Godless Colleges," but insisted on having Colleges of their own, would not be the very first to insist on the religion of the majority being acknowledged as the religion of the State? What they object to, as I before said, is not the endowment, but the acknowledgment by the State, of the Protestant religion. I am perfectly aware that has been said by some that the connection between the State and the Church was dissolved when the doors of this House were thrown open to persons of all religions. I think it was the late Mr. Drummond who observed that if Mr. Speaker went up with an Address to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty chose to ask him, "Pray, of what religion is the House of Commons now?" he would be obliged to answer, "It is of no particular religion, the same religion as other people." Now, I object to these Resolutions. I object more particularly to the time at which they are brought forward; and I think that, except for party purposes, never was there a more inopportune moment for considering this question. Why, we have always been told that everything has been conceded to Ireland from fear. Do not you suppose that as long as a single Fenian exists he will say, and say, at all events, with some appearance of truth, that had it not been for Fenianism these Resolutions would never have been brought forward? We of course know better; they have been brought forward on account of the exigencies of party. But what will posterity think of the statesman who brought forward these Resolutions at a moment when it was utterly impossible for the House to settle this question? You hope by these Resolutions to disestablish the Protestant Church, yet, at the same time, you profess to maintain the rights of individuals. Now under what law, temporal or ecclesiastical, are these rights to be exercised, which, as the right hon. Gentleman told us, may last for nearly a generation? Take the case of two adjoining parishes. The incumbent of one parish may live thirty years, while the incumbent of the other may not live thirty days. Are the parishioners of the former to go on all that time with endowments while the parishioners of the other—perhaps a poorer parish—are to tax themselves, or go without any minister at all? Under what law, I ask, is the incumbent of the former parish to carry on his duties? There may be no Bishop, or, if there be, he may have no power to exercise any control over him. Such incumbents will be perfectly independent as long as they exist, and I cannot see what provision there will be for their duties being carried on. These Resolutions, brought forward at such a time and for such a purpose, have almost worked a miracle upon me; for they have almost reconciled me to the Reform Bill of last year. I venture to say that no Parliament assembled under the provisions of that Act will ever show such glaring inconsistency as has been shown by this Parliament. Accusations of inconsistency are bandied about from one side of the House to the other, and the other day we heard a Leader of the party opposite reminding his opponents of the adage that they who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Well, it seems to me that as this House is not large enough the sooner it is adjourned to the Crystal Palace the better, for then hon. Members would there be constantly reminded of the danger of throwing stones. I think, too, that the very first Motion which ought to be made in the new House should be that all copies of Hansard and all records of past proceedings should be burnt. Well, now, a moribund Parliament proposes to make a moribund Church. You are either about to carry out the greatest change which has ever been effected in the Constitution of this country, or else you propose to leave on record your opinion that this ought to be done, whereas you have no power to prevent the agitation which must occur before another Parliament meets. An hon. Member behind me suggested the other evening that some pieces of old china should be secured for the British Museum. Now, I would suggest that a still greater curiosity should be secured for that institution. I think the Treasury Bench should be removed and handed over to the British Museum, with the inscription, "This is the Bench, for the honour of sitting on which all other honour, all consistency, and all statesmanship have been sacrificed."

MR. HORSMAN : Amusing and characteristic as was the speech of the gallant General, it offered no exception to the most remarkable feature of the debate, that every conceivable argument has been urged against the disestablishment of the Irish Church except the one which was most needed, and which alone could have weight. We have heard from the gallant General about the Act of Union, and the union of Church and State, about waiting for the Report of the Commission, and the danger as to the English Church, which is sure to follow if the Irish Church is disestablished. We have heard, too, in the able speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry of the irritation which the measure will cause in Ulster. The changes have been rung over and over again upon these objections ; but, strange to say, no speaker on either side has thought fit to urge that which would be the only valid objection to the Resolutions—namely, that the Established Church in Ireland has fulfilled the conditions for which alone an Established Church could ever be intended, or ought to be permitted to exist. The Government and their supporters, not having a word to say upon the merits of the Established Church, having no argument whatever upon the case against the Resolutions of my right hon. Friend, are mindful—the hon. Members for Cambridge and West Kent especially—of that which is the great rule in Courts of Law, when you have a bad case abuse the plaintiff's attorney. Leaving their own lines undefended, they have turned their battery upon their opponents, whom they accuse of inconsistency, insincerity, and factious motives. " See," they say, " how inconsistent you are. Why, when you were in Office you would not touch the Irish Church, and now, when you are in Opposition, you will not let it alone. You change your sentiments with your seats in this House, and you unsay on one side of the House what you were vehemently saying on the other." In fact, they accuse us—and nothing could be more disagreeable or severe to my mind—of doing exactly what they did themselves last year. " We wonder," they say, " you are not ashamed of yourselves ; and there is your Leader exactly following the tactics of our Leader. Why, we wonder how you can follow him." Now, this charge would be a very unpleasant one if it were not ridiculous. The Reform Bill of last year was carried by such means that even the hon. Member for Birmingham declared that the country was paying a high price for it. Is it possible that the Liberal party are carrying the disestablishment of the Irish Church by like means, and are thus lowering the character of public men ? Now, do not let us take refuge in ambiguity and evasion. Let us in that respect eschew the example of the Government. Let us meet the charge openly and fairly ; show what it is the Government charge us with, and what is our answer before the country. The gallant General, following up the speeches of the hon. Members for Cambridge and West Kent, brings these charges against the Opposition. He says,—" You were twenty-six years in Office, with full power of dealing with the Irish Church, and you refrained from exercising that power ; but now, when you are in Opposition, you raise it for a party cry suddenly and unreasonably. You bring it forward solely for party purposes at an inconvenient time, in the last Session of a dying Parliament, when you know it cannot be dealt with." Then, again, we are told, " Your Leader has also being inconsistent. He has changed his opinions ; his language and policy have undergone a sudden and surprising change. Three years ago he expressed opinions directly the reverse of those he is expressing now, and only one inference can be drawn from it, that he is anxious to regain Office." Now I think I have stated your accusations fairly ; let me see whether I cannot meet them fairly. Is it true that the Liberal party were twenty-six years in Office with the power of dealing with this question ? Why, at the earlier part of that period, at the time when the high tide of popularity which followed the passing of Lord Grey's Reform Act had not receded from the Whigs—when they were more powerful than they have ever been since—they attempted more than once to deal with the question. And why did they fail ? They failed because the Tory Opposition was too strong for them. Since that time parties have been so evenly balanced, the opinion of the country has been so divided that I am sure any hon. Gentleman opposite will admit that any Liberal Minister attempting to deal effectually with the Irish Church would have been rushing upon his own destruction. In those twenty-six years we could not even abolish church rates ; we could not carry the admission of Jews to Parliament, nor any one of these ecclesiastical or religious questions upon which the Tory party always rallied as one man, with the House of Lords to back them. When we could not even carry a small question like the abolition of church rates, how could a Liberal Minister have dealt effectually with the Irish Church? But the moment the Tory party came into Office these vexed questions were all settled; and why? Because the conduct of the Liberal party in Opposition was directly the reverse of that of the Tory party in Opposition. Why, it has been the practice of the Liberal party—to their honour be it remembered—to assist their opponents on getting into Office to carry those measures which they had obstructed in Opposition, and for which the mind of the country had been prepared by the efforts and sacrifices of the Liberal party. How was Catholic Emancipation carried in 1829? How was Free Trade carried in 1846? How was the Reform Act carried last year? On all these questions the well-disciplined Tory party had one unvarying consistent rule of conduct. As long as they were in Opposition they held to the pass; as soon as they got into Office they sold the pass. Now, what they had done upon other questions they might have attempted with the Irish Church, and what we have done on other questions we were ready to do with the Irish Church. We were ready to give them the facilities they refused to us, and enable them by our assistance to do what we have always found it impossible to accomplish in the teeth of their determined hostility. Well, but if that charge, that we have been twenty-six years in Office without dealing with the Irish Church be unfounded, what shall we say to the second charge brought against us by the gallant General, that we have been the first to obtrude this question upon Parliament, and press it this Session to the obstruction of other and more important measures? But is that the case? Is it the Liberal party that first brought this question forward during the present Session? [“Hear, hear!” from the Ministerial Benches.] Is that what you say we have done? [“Hear!”] Do you again repeat it? [“Hear, hear!”] When did my right hon. Friend give his Notice? On the 23rd of March. Had the Government done nothing before that to make the Irish Church the most important question of the year? Was it not authoritatively announced in the Recess that this was to be an Irish Session, and that the Government had a great scheme of Irish policy in which the Irish Church was to be included? [“No!”] Were not the Irish Members told that their demand for religious equality was to be conceded in the course of the present Session? [“No!”] Did not the Government themselves indicate an intention of establishing that equality? What was the meaning of the speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo), and of the policy he announced in placing the different religions in Ireland on a footing of equality by “levelling upwards?” Who was it that proposed to give a charter and endowment to the Catholic University? [“No endowment.”] Who declared an intention of elevating the status of the Catholic Bishops? Who was it that promised to give a large increase to the Regium Donum, and endeavoured by all these measures to commit Parliament to an endowment of the Roman Catholic Church? The Government knew very well when they proposed these vast and sudden and startling changes that they must give rise to long and animated discussions; they were not deterred by the consideration that we were in the last Session of what the right hon. Gentleman calls a moribund Parliament, with Scotch and Irish Reform Bills to pass, and with a Boundary Bill and a Bribery Bill still to come before us. It was only when their aggressive policy of “levelling upwards” was met by our defensive policy of levelling downwards, and when it was found that throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland our policy was approved and their policy universally condemned, then it was we were told that the Irish Church was not a fit question for a “moribund Parliament” with two Reform Bills to pass. Why, Sir, they ought to have reflected on that before they threw down the challenge we were compelled to take up. If a “moribund Parliament,” with two Reform Bills to pass, could endow three Churches in Ireland, surely it was able to disendow one. If a moribund Parliament with two Reform Bills on its hands could grant a charter to the Catholic University in Dublin, assuredly it could withdraw an endowment from the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. And if a moribund Parliament could charge a large addition to the Regium Donum on the Consolidated Fund, assuredly it was competent to say that all religious charges whatever on the Consolidated Fund should cease and determine. No, Sir, it was the Government itself and not the Opposition that interposed the Irish Church between this House and the Reform Bills. It was our "No Popery" Premier who deluged us with those propitiatory offerings to Popery, and who was prepared to be the humble servant of the Pope as long as he thought the votes of Irish Romanists were to be ensnared. But when the Government find what a blunder they had made, then they throw on us the responsibility of obstructing public business, and call on us ignobly to retreat from a discussion into which they themselves were the first to force us. But I hope we shall not retreat. We have not raised this question, but being once raised by the Government for their own purposes, I trust we shall not let it rest until the battle is fought out, and that there shall be no truce and no quarter until the outworks at least are carried. It would be a pitiful proceeding for the Liberal party if, when the Government had delivered this question into their hands, they were to suffer you to leave that Chair until by passing all the three Resolutions they had protected themselves against the taunt of having obstructed Public Business for the mere mockery of passing an abstract Resolution, and did not show their sincerity and their courage by giving effect to the principles which they profess. I think, therefore, I am justified in maintaining that both the charges brought against us—the first, that we had the power of dealing with this question for a quarter of a century and did not do so; and the next, that we have been the first to raise the question in the present Session—are both unfounded. I do not know whether it would be worth while, or whether my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) might not think I was taking too much on myself, when in appearing to defend him I was in reality defending myself, if I were to allude to the charge brought against the whole Liberal party of following a Leader, who, upon this occasion—as it is said on the other side—has shown inconsistency—and a sudden change of opinion and policy. In answer to that I can state that, with my vivid recollection of the events of 1865, I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the other night with great amazement. I really felt, while he was speaking, that either he or I must have been dreaming, for I never heard a speech which—every word of it—was so entirely contrary to the facts as I remembered them; and it was not until I referred to the speech the next morning that I was assured my ears had not deceived me. My right hon. Friend opposite (Mr.

Gathorne Hardy) is always an agreeable speaker; but never so agreeable or powerful as when he descants on the subject of inconsistency. When he comes forward as the champion of consistency his dislike of inconsistency is carried to an excess which is almost a weak point in his character. Then he is impressive, then he is even severe. Turning to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire, he said, "You are the last man who should move these Resolutions, because only three years ago you expressed opinions diametrically the reverse of those you are expressing to-day. Your change has been a surprise to the House and the country, and above all to the Press." And he added, "Those very organs of the Press which are now supporting the policy of the right hon. Gentleman are expressing their surprise at his change of opinion." Then he went on to say, "After the exposure I have made of this flagrant change even those who have expressed confidence in the right hon. Gentleman must now"—

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I beg to say that I never used any language of the kind.

MR. HORSMAN: If the right hon. Gentleman will refer to-morrow, as I have referred, to the report of The Times, he will find that language attributed to him.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I must request the right hon. Gentleman to quote from some authority on which I can rely.

MR. HORSMAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman repudiate the report of The Times?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I never repudiated any report. I have repudiated what the right hon. Gentleman says.

MR. HORSMAN: I am so challenged by the right hon. Gentleman that I hope the House will give me its indulgence while I join issue with him on points upon which I would not otherwise trouble the Committee. Did he or did he not say that my right hon. Friend had made a speech in 1865 in which he indicated a policy the reverse of that which he is now pursuing? [MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I said nothing of the sort.] Did he say there had been a change in my right hon. Friend which was very sudden and very surprising? Do you repudiate that? Did he say that the organs of the Press, even those who were now supporting his policy, were expressing their surprise at the suddenness of the change? I am thankful I have got the right hon. Gentleman to admit one thing.

Now, I affirm that if I am capable of understanding language, or if the newspapers to whose reports we attach most importance are capable of reporting a speech correctly, they have accurately described the statements attributed to the right hon. Gentleman. He repudiates them, and of course as I have not at hand the evidence of what I have stated I at once put that aside. But I have got this point admitted—that the right hon. Gentleman said that the Press of this country, and especially those organs which now support the policy of my right hon. Friend, expressed surprise at the suddenness of his change. But what did these newspapers—the newspapers which are now stated to be expressing amazement at the suddenness of this change and the novelty of those opinions—say the morning after the speech of 1865? I can give the right hon. Gentleman some of the criticisms that were made on that speech. Here is a short opinion of one of the leading organs of the party to which the right hon. Gentleman belongs. It is only about half a dozen lines—

“No lover of his country can look forward without something like terror to the day so confidently predicted, when Mr. Gladstone is to hold the chief place in the national councils. That day will inaugurate an era, a new system of Government, in which many good things and true, many institutions, time-honoured and cherished, among which the Established Church of Ireland will be perhaps the least, will be destined to fall before the march of popular enlightenment, as understood by Mr. Gladstone.”

Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that that newspaper now expresses astonishment? [“Name!”] Why, it is the newspaper in which the right hon. Gentleman gropes for extracts—The Morning Herald. It is the right hon. Gentleman’s own organ. Here is the opinion of another Conservative organ—

“The debate on the Irish Church Establishment exhibited Mr. Gladstone in a light which strangely foreshadows his future career. His speech, beyond doubt, was the political event of Tuesday evening, and it reached to a point of Radicalism, threatening danger, should the right hon. Gentleman ever assume the chief responsibility of Government and Legislation in this kingdom. . . . We can understand Mr. Dillwyn and Mr. Bernal Osborne—but when Mr. Gladstone, a Member of the Cabinet, speaking in the name of others than himself, assails the constitutional position, denies the efficiency, questions the rights, and would litigate upon the trusts of a great national Establishment, at what point are we to pause? Mr. Gladstone advocates a confiscation of endowments; he would carry an act of religious devastation through every diocese and district of Ireland. . . . He would give up the Irish Church to be devoured, and what then becomes of settlements, bequests, property, peace, loyalty, liberty, and order? for they are equally imperilled by his doctrine.”

That is from another Conservative organ—The Standard. Now, does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say he was justified in telling this House that the Press of England was now expressing surprise at the suddenness of the change and the novelty of the conversion of my right hon. Friend? You may say that these are exaggerated opinions of opponent journals, but I could give you, if necessary, the opinions of journals of the opposite extreme in politics, such as The Morning Star and The Nonconformist, all putting precisely the same construction on the speech, only they praise what the others censure. I may say that I should not have ventured to read these extracts had it not been that the right hon. Gentleman repudiated everything else, and compelled me to produce the only evidence I had. I will now read a few sentences from a neutral organ, a weekly paper—and I say this because I am not endeavouring to defend any particular Leader, but the whole of the Liberal party, from the charges in which we are all implicated.

MR. DODSON: I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that he is not at liberty to quote extracts from newspapers referring to debates which have taken place in this House.

MR. HORSMAN: I must apologize to you, Sir, for not having explained that the extracts which I am quoting do not refer to any debates which have occurred this Session or during the existence of the present Parliament. A dissolution has taken place since their publication, and the events to which they refer are now historical. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to read the following extract:—

“The first part of his (Mr. Gladstone’s) speech was devoted to the establishment of the proposition that the Irish Church Establishment ought to be swept away. . . . He first laid down, in the most extreme terms, that its present position was a gross injustice to the Roman Catholic population, and that all proposed remedies short of absolute confiscation were hopeless; and then proceeded to explain to the Roman Catholics that this injustice was riveted on their necks by the Protestants of England and of Scotland.”

[“Name!”] That is taken from a neutral paper—at least, I have never known whether it preferred a Leader on this side or that side of the House—The Saturday Review. [“The date.”] It was the week of the debate. But the right hon. Gentleman said that the Government was surprised, and that his Colleagues were surprised. Now, Sir, if the House will permit me, I will read an extract from a speech that was made by one of his Colleagues who sat by him in that debate. Mr. Whiteside described the speech in the following words:—

"I ask any one to consider what was the meaning of the picture which the right hon. Gentleman drew of the two provinces of Munster and Connaught. His argument, if I understand it, means this—The property there reserved for the Church is far beyond its necessities. . . . That being so, what are we to do with it? It is impossible for me to suggest what should be done with that property. That I leave to the councils of the future. I may hereafter be called upon to say what is to be done with it; but I wish that my speech may be on record in Hansard, showing that my argument was that that property may be abstracted from the Church for some purpose or other, either for the Roman Catholic Church or for some other object; but it is not to remain the property of the Church." If the argument did not mean that, what did it mean?—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 444.]

Well, now, Sir, I again ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified in fixing upon this side of the House charges of inconsistency of conduct and great change in policy, and of stating that the surprise which was felt at the change was shared in by the newspapers which had in 1865 indicated and predicted as inevitable that very change? It is with great reluctance that I have read these extracts, but there is one more with which I wish to trouble the House, the more so as it refers to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in complimentary terms, and cannot therefore, be regarded entirely as a one-sided article. It is also from a weekly paper published in the week of the debate, and the article is headed "Hardy v. Gladstone." It goes on in this way—

"The debate on the Irish Church gave an admirable opportunity to Mr. Gathorne Hardy and Mr. Gladstone to address indirectly that great University constituency, for the suffrages of which they are to compete at the next election, on one of those subjects which lie nearest to his heart. We are afraid we must admit that the able Conservative who represents Leominster has made a great point for himself in the coming contest by the speech which he delivered on that occasion, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, while raising his reputation as a Liberal politician—say with thinking men not only as a Liberal politician but as a Churchman and a Christian—by the admirable speech of Tuesday night, has taken another step towards that all but inevitable doom which, if not at the next election, before many years are over, must transfer him from the representation of a learned corporation always in the rear of the political life of England to the representation of some great city or populous county division which leads the van. Mr. Hardy's speech was a masterly speech considered in relation to his candidature for Oxford University. Mr. Gladstone's speech was a rash and almost a reckless speech considered in the same light; but, considered in relation to the duties of the Liberal party and his own political future, it was a speech to increase our confidence in his wisdom and to raise our estimate of his prescience."

I again, therefore, put it to the House—was the right hon. Gentleman justified in fixing upon my right hon. Friend the charge of inconsistency for pursuing a course which at the time was pointed out by the organs of the public Press, and in taunting us with having for some party purposes changed our opinions? Did that speech not express the opinions and indicate the policy now embodied in these Resolutions; and if they had not been brought forward, might not the Irish followers of the Pope—a new appellation for them from the Treasury Bench—have fairly charged him with breaking the pledges to which he had given utterance in 1865? Let the House consider for a moment what are the circumstances which have brought about a more sudden and extensive change of opinion than we have ever known to take place on a question equal in importance to this. What was the feeling of the Liberal party in 1865? When the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) first brought forward his Motion it was a matter of conversation and counsel among those who agreed with him in opinion; and I remember that I strongly deprecated the continual bringing forward of the question. I asked, "What practical object do you expect to attain through the discussion you invite? You know the Liberal party is thoroughly united upon the question; you know our Leaders have spoken out," and I said, "Supposing Lord Palmerstone were to send for you to-morrow, and ask you to draw up a scheme for dealing with the Irish Church, to the support of which he would pledge his Government, even to resignation, could you propose any scheme short of disestablishment?" Their answer was, "We could not." "Then," said I, "what is the use of making speeches denouncing an evil if you cannot even suggest a remedy; because you know, as well as I do, that the disestablishment of the Irish Church is what no Minister is likely to propose in our time?" That was my opinion in 1865, but I was a very short-sighted mortal. There are many of us on both sides of the House who then thought the disestablishment of the Irish Church very remote; there were also many other questions which we thought even still more remote. I thought the day very remote, indeed, when we should see the great Conservative party wheel round as suddenly as ever any regiment wheeled round at the word of command, and, with one accord, set themselves to unloosen, as one of their Leaders has expressed it, "the moorings of the Constitution." I thought the day was very far distant when they would precipitate that change in the governing power of the country which, up to that very moment, they had one and all sincerely and passionately denounced as revolution. Yes, Sir, we were then all short-sighted mortals, and I put it now to the candour of hon. Gentlemen opposite, if they had been asked in 1865 which change would come first—the disestablishment of the Irish Church at the hands of the Liberal party, or household suffrage at the hands of the Conservative party, what would they have said? They would have answered—"Disestablishment of the Irish Church by the Liberals is possible; but household suffrage by the Conservative party is a sheer impossibility." They would have concluded that no Government calling itself Conservative could have so made merchandize of its principles for the sake of Office, and they would have told us that the outraged feelings of a great and chivalrous party in its dignity and might would have risen as one man to exterminate the Government. Politics has been defined as the madness of the many for the gain of the few ["Party."] Well, Sir, "party" has been so defined, and I suspect not a few on the other side of the House are now of opinion that that was the saying of a very wise man. But I fear that the lucid interval has not yet returned to the party opposite; for if we may judge from the speeches during this debate, there are Gentlemen on the other side of the House who are still under the delusion that they can enact a revolution and afterwards relapse into a policy of obstruction. They have evidently not yet become acquainted with the cardinal law in our Parliamentary system—that we never go back. A battle once fought out and settled within these walls is never revived; the vanquished join with the victors in giving loyal effect to that change which Parliament has decreed. Therefore, Sir, although I was not one of those who originally demanded the change that has been made, now that Parliament has resolved on it, I accept it as Parliament intended it—as a boon to be perfected, and not as an evil to be crippled and counteracted. I accept it as my hon. Friend behind me has done, not as the termination of reform, but as the precursor and instrument of other reforms. I accept it in the sense in which it was received by the unenfranchised masses, not as an end, but as a means to be honestly, loyally, and effectually carried out to its just and legitimate results. I can very well imagine a Tory Government—I use that phrase because the gallant Member opposite was cheered by his party when he said he preferred it—I can well understand a Tory Government that in 1866 denounced a £7 suffrage as revolution only to discover in 1867 that household suffrage was high Conservatism—having abandoned their principles and embarked without chart or compass on a new and turbulent sea of legislation—would stand confused at what they had aptly described as their "leap in the dark;" but to those who have been watching the signs of the times, and seen how the horizon has been studded with troublous questions, it has been no "leap in the dark;" they see in that change the creation of a new power that will inaugurate a new future in legislation, and in that future they see the doom of all that has nothing but antiquity to recommend it. Things will no longer be tolerated because they are; changes will no longer be rejected merely because such things have not been; public wants and public duties will be measured by a new standard, and settled by the requirements of a new opinion. Questions that might have been dormant for a generation have been advanced a generation by one year of legislation, and, foremost among them, the Irish Church has been propelled into a front place, to fall under that law of progress and transformation to which hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House last year unconsciously imparted so sudden, so irresistible a new life. Observers have noted that, in England, all great questions rise to their settlement in a day. Mr. Cobden often remarked to his friends that the English mind was only capable of taking in one great question at a time; so it is that when one great question is disposed of another instantly takes its place; and when last year the Reform question was settled, it required no great foresight to predict that the Irish Church question was the next to occupy a front place. Consequently, although in 1865 I believed the question was very remote; when I was written to last winter on the subject, and asked my opinion of the Irish Church, I said my opinion was that the time for disestablishment had come, and I took the earliest opportunity of expressing that opinion in this House; and before I knew the right hon. Member for South Lancashire had resolved to take action in the matter; indeed, he could not have done so, because the policy of that Government was only made known to him in that debate. At the same time, I certainly should have deprecated any attempt at legislation, or the coming to any resolution of any sort in this Session had it not been that we were driven to it by the proceedings of the Government. When the Government unfolded its policy to the House the right hon. Gentleman very properly propounded his counter policy, and we have now in the Propositions of the Government and the Resolutions of our own Leader that clear and distinct issue which the right hon. Gentleman said he desired. It has been said by the Member for Cambridge that the issue before the House was disestablishment or the existing state of things. That is not the fact; the issue is between the policy of the Government and the policy contained in these Resolutions. The Government policy, as stated by the Irish Secretary, is to establish religious equality in Ireland by levelling upwards; the policy of the Resolutions is to establish equality by levelling downwards. The policy of the Government is to charter and endow a Roman Catholic University as a preliminary to endowing the Roman Catholic Church; the policy of the Resolutions is to disendow the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, and to leave the Roman Catholic, like the Protestant Church, to its own resources. The policy of the Government is to elevate the status of the Roman Catholic Bishops, and give them the countenance of the State; the policy of the Resolution is to divorce the State from all ecclesiastical styles and dignities in Ireland, and to put Protestants and Catholics entirely on an equality, without countenance or interference of the State. Again, Sir, the policy of the Government is to increase the Regium Donum by a new charge on the Consolidated Fund; the policy of the Resolutions is to relieve the Consolidated Fund from all charges for any religious purpose whatever. In a word, the policy of the Government is to have three endowed Churches in Ireland; the policy of the

Resolutions is to have none. These are the points of difference between the two sides of the House on which we shall go to the country. ["No, no!"] Well, then, if you are afraid or ashamed of them, you are repudiating the policy of the Government. These are the points of difference. ["No, no!"] They have divided the House into two hostile camps; we have already had one clear party division, and what, under other circumstances, would have been a very decisive Government defeat. But in these days there are no decisive Government defeats; the Government are not remarkable for sensibility; they court defeat. Defeat is the element in which they live. And, if they court defeat, they will find us of a very accommodating disposition; and I trust our supply will be quite equal to their demand. The fact is, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government made a slight miscalculation. He had an idea—and it was a very clever idea, if only it was not too clever—that Reform was the stumbling-block in the way of his perpetual retention of power. He did not see what I should have expected so clever a man to see—that, by the settlement of the Reform question and the infusion of so large a popular element into the new constituencies, he raised up a new crop of popular questions that must give a distinctiveness to the fading differences of party, and draw a new line more hard and more impassable than ever. And, so far from Reform being the only question which divided the two sides of the House, it happened to be precisely the reverse. Reform was the only great question that divided, and confused, and perplexed the Liberal party. Ever since I have been in the House there has been this great gulf between the two sections. There has been a section of moderate Liberals that recognized a Leader upon the front Bench, and another section of advanced Liberals that recognized a Leader on the Bench behind me. But the right hon. Gentleman has bridged over the gulf. The one great wave of Reform has merged all small differences upon this side of the House as if they were straws or cobwebs. This one difficulty about Reform, with its bickerings and soreness, petty persecutions and angry recriminations, spread itself into every question on which Reform was a question rather of degree than of principle. The gallant General reminds us of our differences. Let us, who listened to the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs and then to the reply of the gallant General himself from below the Gangway, remind him that those terms of distinction which have become obsolete in our vocabulary are likely to become fashionable with our opponents. Having made themselves welcome to our measures, they are welcome now to our terms of distinction. On this side of the House we had no more use for them: the right hon. Gentleman had educated his opponents much more effectively than he has educated his friends. I think it was the Secretary for India (Sir Stafford Northcote) who said in a tone of emotion, as if unwilling to prefer so grave a charge against any one of his fellow-creatures — "We know what you are at—you want to turn out the Government—that is what you are at." And then, turning up his eyes, he almost exclaimed like Mrs. Malaprop, "Good heavens! what a wicked world we live in." "But," he added, "you will not find it so easy to do; we mean to die hard; we are at the beginning of a long fight, and it shall not be our fault if we give in before the battle is fairly fought out." I must say that I thought this rather an ill-timed and injudicious bravado. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think the Government had a body of followers behind them who would follow them as the tenth legion followed Cæsar. But I can assure him that, if he had seen the physiognomies of Gentlemen below him and behind him while he was speaking, he would have found these anything but re-assuring. We who sit here have observed for some time past that the prevailing expression on the countenances of hon. Gentlemen opposite has for some time past not been such as those who wish to see the human face divine in its most graceful forms would altogether desire. But I will give the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends some comfort. I assure him sincerely that the friends of disestablishment feel that their work is done for them far more speedily and far more effectually by the Government remaining in Office than by their resignation. Once let us pass these Resolutions before the House with large majorities, and then the three stages of the Bill that will be founded on them, and without those Gentlemen budging from their places; and then what the House of Lords do with the Bill will be of much more consequence to the Lords themselves than to the Irish Church or to the Liberal party. A very weak citadel may withstand a vigorous assault from without, but the strongest citadel cannot survive an insincere and treacherous defence. From the creation of the world there has been but one test of the sincerity of men or of parties, and that has been the sacrifice which they were ready to undergo for that which they professed to value. The Government are ready to carry their opposition to any extremity, or to make any sacrifice short of imperilling their retention of Office. When they come to that point they stop. Out of nine Members of the Cabinet that adorn that Bench, I believe it is notorious now that no less than eight are in favour of disestablishment. The ninth—the Secretary of State for the Home Department—is much averse to the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but is still more averse to the disestablishment of the Government; he evidently considers that the more valuable institution of the two. And that is a question upon which his Colleagues, without one dissentient voice, cordially agree with him. Therefore they retain their seats with an unanimity, and give to us in furtherance of our measures an assistance which I really think will entitle them to a large share of the honour of carrying the measure. I am sure my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire will not grudge them their due share of that honour, and I venture to say he will be generous enough not to complain when next the First Lord of the Treasury is entertained by his admirers in Edinburgh, and boasts—as he may do without imperilling his character for veracity—that the disestablishment of the Irish Church is the thirty-third great measure of Reform which has been carried with a Tory Government in office, in spite of the obstruction of factious Liberals.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had appeared in the character of the historiographer of the Liberal party during the last thirty years; but if his statements had been as accurate as no doubt they were interesting, he should still have been at a loss to discover their relevancy to the present question. What the conduct of Lord Althorp in 1833 had to do with the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in 1868 he failed to discover; but his statements were as inaccurate as they were irrelevant. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the Liberal party after the passing of the first Reform Bill made every effort to settle the Irish Church question; but were unable to do so owing to the opposition of the Tory party. Was this the fact? What Liberal Government had ever proposed in a speech from the Throne to disestablish or disendow the Irish Church. Was it the fact that any Liberal Government or statesman had ever made such a proposition to the House of Commons? In every measure introduced in those days—to quote the very words—“the increased efficiency and permanence of the Established Church” was invariably made the basis of legislation. What became, then, of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the obstinacy of the Tory party had prevented Liberal Governments, with some of which he himself had been connected, from settling the Irish Church question? Again, the right hon. Gentleman told them that, owing to the opposition of the Tory party, they could not even settle the comparatively small question of church rates. Did the right hon. Gentleman forget, or expect the House to forget, that year after year, and Session after Session, the most powerful vindicators of the principle of church rates were Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell, heads of Liberal Governments under whom the right hon. Gentleman had served? Then the right hon. Gentleman told them that whenever the Tory party came into power it was easy to pass those great political and ecclesiastical reforms, as these invariably received the most hearty and generous assistance from the great Liberal party, of which he was so distinguished an ornament. The right hon. Gentleman even had the courage to speak of the Reform Bill of last year. Her Majesty’s Government undoubtedly felt greatly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the powerful assistance which he rendered to that measure; but if they had not received more effective assistance from other quarters, the large and numerous class of Her Majesty’s subjects who now looked forward to exercising for the first time the privilege of the franchise would not be in that position at the present moment. Coming down from remoter periods, as to which the right hon. Gentleman had been thus singularly inaccurate, he next gave a sketch of what he fancied had occurred during the Recess. According to the right hon. Gentleman the Government had declared that this Session was to be devoted to the settlement of all great questions, including that of the Irish Church. The whole thing was a dream of the right hon. Gentleman, and he could only characterize it as being on a par with that wonderful misconception and mystification of what had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Government knew that a severe and protracted task lay before the House in the completion of the great measure of Parliamentary Reform to which Parliament last Session had given its assent; and though there might indeed be time found for some measures of subordinate importance, who could imagine that, with the supplementary measures of Reform to be carried, the Government would even undertake to submit the great question of the Irish Church to the present Parliament? It was a dream, an invention; and not the only one for which they were indebted to the right hon. Gentleman. It was perfectly well-known that the moment Her Majesty’s Government came into power they appointed a Commission to inquire into the subject of the Irish Church; and having taken that step, they naturally concluded that further action upon the matter must be postponed until the Report of that Commission was received. The right hon. Gentleman said that, if the Government had made no other mistake, they made one in their statement on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire); and that their Irish policy was such as left the Members of the Opposition no alternative but to raise their banner and propose a counter proposition. The right hon. Gentleman went through a catalogue of errors which he said the Government had committed upon that occasion; but he thought he should not be wrong if he assumed that, in the right hon. Gentleman’s opinion, the head and front of their offending was their proposal to grant a charter to a Roman Catholic University. It was true that the question of granting a charter to a Roman Catholic University had been much discussed in the course of previous Sessions; that the late Government had taken a most unwise and unfortunate step with reference to this subject; and that the present Government did not think that granting a charter to a Roman Catholic University was a question raising such enormous issues as would prevent its decision by the existing Parliament. The difference between the treatment of this question by the present Government and the late Government was not one of which the former need be ashamed. The present Government proposed to do openly in the face of the country what they believed would be the best for the country, and what would bring the question at issue clearly before the House; while the course taken by the late Government was well known to the Committee, and therefore there was no need for him to refer to it more distinctly. Then the right hon. Gentleman went at enormous length into what he was pleased to term the unjust charge which was brought by the Secretary of State for the Home Department against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and illustrated his argument with most copious quotations from every kind of newspaper. The right hon. Gentleman misunderstood and misquoted his right hon. Friend from beginning to end. His right hon. Friend never said that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was inconsistent in 1868, in consequence of the speech he made in 1865. What he did say was that after the speech of 1865, which had undoubtedly produced a certain effect in various quarters, the right hon. Gentleman, in order, as those who sat now on the Government Benches supposed, to mitigate the effect of that speech, wrote a certain letter, in which he stated, that in his opinion, the question of the Irish Church was so remote as really to be beyond the domain of practical politics. The right hon. Gentleman spent a long time in elaborating that simple statement, and in doing so used what was, no doubt, very cutting language, but those who took part in these fights in a free assembly must submit to have imputations thrown upon them which might be unjust, although couched in the most polished language. The right hon. Gentleman told them that a Government placed in a minority of 60 was bound to resign; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Government came into office, as was well understood, in a minority of 70. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the course which he now so warmly espoused, but which was so remote during the years when he was the responsible Minister for Ireland, would be benefited by the present Government remaining in office. Time alone would show whether or not the right hon. Gentleman was correct in that supposition; but if the right hon. Gentleman thought that the Government had any other reason for remaining in office than because they believed that the Established Church of Ireland and of England and the union between Church and State would be better served by their remaining in office than by their retiring,

he was most completely and entirely mistaken. When the Government were convinced that the cause of the Established Church would be benefited by their retirement from that Bench, the right hon. Gentleman need be under no apprehension that they would remain there a single instant. Passing from the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, which appeared to him to leave untouched the real question at issue, he would briefly touch upon the Resolutions brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. In the first place, on what ground did the right hon. Gentleman ask the House to agree to his first Resolution; that ground was distinctly stated in the opening part of the Resolution? Did the Resolution say that it was "just," or that it was even "expedient" that the United Church in Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment? No. The Resolutions said it was "necessary" that the Established Church should cease to exist as an Establishment. Necessary for what? Was it necessary for the continued progress of Ireland's material prosperity? No one could say that, in the face of the statement that had been made by his noble Friend with reference to the present condition of Ireland. Was it necessary for the suppression of a vile, hateful, and contemptible conspiracy? No; for it was well known that the ordinary forces of the country and the loyalty of the great mass of the Irish people had been sufficiently powerful to crush it completely. Was it necessary to produce a better feeling between the owners and the tillers of the soil? No; for it postponed indefinitely all legislation on that subject. The abolition of the Irish Church might, however, be necessary for one purpose, which had been pointed out by the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) — namely, for the union and the consolidation of the scattered elements of the great Liberal party. In former times, when the great Continental Powers fell out, the inhabitants of the Low Countries or of the Milanese could pretty well calculate upon the battle being fought out on their fertile fields; and in this country during the last twenty or thirty years, when the great Liberal party fell out, Ireland had always been made the battle-field of contending parties. He was sorry to find that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, in succeeding to the Leadership of the Liberal party, had, unfortunately for Ireland, also succeeded to its traditional policy. Was the prosperity, the peace, the tranquillity, and the real progress of Ireland to be "whistled down the wind" in order to give the great Liberal party a party triumph on the present occasion? One word as to the phraseology of this Resolution. They had heard from the mouth of Earl Russell, at a meeting held in St. James' Hall, that the Resolutions were strictly in accordance with those which were proposed by that noble Earl some years ago. On comparing the Resolutions of the noble Earl with those of the right hon. Gentleman it would be found that they differed in a very important particular; for, whereas the Resolutions which the noble Earl moved in 1835 proposed that the surplus revenue of the Established Church "in" Ireland should be devoted to such and such a purpose, the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions proposed the disestablishment of the Established Church "of" Ireland. Why, in point of fact and of law, there was no such thing as the Established Church "of" Ireland. It was the Established Church of England and Ireland established in Ireland with which the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions proposed to deal. He (Lord John Manners) submitted that it was not competent for the right hon. Gentleman to misdescribe and misrepresent one of the greatest and most sacred institutions of the country for the purpose of facilitating his attack upon it. It was quite obvious that had the right hon. Gentleman used the proper phrase the eyes of the people throughout the country would have been opened to the inevitable consequences which the carrying of these Resolutions would entail. But he would submit further that if the right hon. Gentleman was at liberty to disintegrate the Church of England and Ireland for the purpose of devouring them both the more easily, it was open to the Government to ask the Committee for the same freedom in her defence—

Dicatur quare non Taratalla mihi."

He would suggest that they should carry the disintegrating process one step further, and consider the question provincially. All the right hon. Gentleman's arguments apply to Leinster, Munster, or Connaught, none to Ulster. They were told that they must take this gigantic step—that they must reverse the history of the country and dissociate the Church from the State in order to gratify the wishes of the Irish people, but how would that principle apply to Ulster? He believed that in the division on the Motion for going into Committee on these Resolutions every single Member from Ulster voted in the minority against the right hon. Gentleman. Well, were the feelings of the people of Ulster as exemplified by their representatives to count for nothing? What were the facts as regarded Ulster? What was the case as to the glebe lands of that province? How had they come into the possession of the Established Church? Everyone knew that they had not come from Roman Catholic sources. They came to the Church at the time of the plantation of Ulster, and he ventured to say that no corporate or private proprietors of property in Ulster held their estates on a better title than that on which the Church held its glebe lands there. He ventured to say also that no corporate or private landlords had more properly fulfilled and discharged their obligations than the obligations attached to the glebe lands of Ulster had been fulfilled and discharged by the clergy of the Established Church. He asked the Committee for a moment to consider the two propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. It had been well said the first Resolution embodied the principles both of disestablishment and disendowment. As regarded the first part of the Resolution, it involved the greatest and gravest revolutionary change ever proposed in this country since the Church and State were united. He did not except even the Revolution in the time of Charles I., for though at that period the prelacy, the peerage, and the monarchy were swept away, the sacred character of Church property was respected. He believed that the first and last statutory sanction given to church rates was during the Commonwealth. They all remembered that in 1862 there was a celebration of the anniversary of the remarkable exodus of the Dissenting ministers at the time of the Restoration, when they yielded up their livings which had been preserved at the Rebellion, to their Episcopal successors. He said, therefore, that the present was the first attempt to separate the Church from the State. On what ground was the attempt made? He could not see that the arguments in its favour could be legitimately or logically confined to Ireland. They had had two main arguments addressed to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. One was an argument of consolation addressed to the Irish Church; the other was an argument to justify the scheme of spoliation. The argument of consolation was this: he said the Irish Church would still retain three-fifths of its property. Now the right hon. Gentleman had arrived at that conclusion he had not exactly explained; and he believed that the estimate was one which still puzzled some of the right hon. Gentleman's own followers. He had further said that when disestablished the Irish Church would have greater liberty—it would be dictated to by no Ministry; it would be able to do what it pleased; and then what a career of power and glory and utility would be open to it! There was nothing in that argument which might not, and probably would not, be applied to the Church in England. The more powerful the Church, clearly the more powerful would be that argument. In a few years hence the right hon. Gentleman would be able to say to the Church of England—"You will have three-fourths of your property when you are disestablished. We shall not interfere with the appointment of your Bishops. Unfettered by Ministers or Monarchs you may appoint to the archiepiscopal thrones of Canterbury and York, and what a career of utility, moral influence, and ecclesiastical power is there not open to you!" Then came another argument which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to rely very strongly on, but which, he (Lord John Manners) ventured to think, would lead to a policy of a very violent and extreme character. He said that for the practical inutility of the Irish Church up to within the last thirty years he did not hold that Church responsible, because the State had so treated it as not to allow it to act on its own responsibility; but that for its failure as a missionary Church during the last thirty years it was responsible, and he would judge it on that experience. Now, in his opinion, to judge a Church which had existed for centuries on an experience of thirty years was a hasty mode of judging. But taking the last thirty years, he would ask had there been no ecclesiastical events of a startling character in Scotland and England during that period which would bring the Established Churches in those countries within the same rule as that which it was sought to apply to the Established Church in Ireland? The last thirty years had witnessed the secession of great masses of the people of Scotland

from the Established Church; and he could see nothing in the present condition or past history of that Church which could save it from the application of the rule which the right hon. Gentleman was endeavouring to apply in the case of the Church of Ireland. Again, on what ground was it that the Bishop of London, a few years ago, called on the people of this metropolis to make a great special effort? It was on the ground that of the 3,000,000 inhabitants of this metropolis great masses were alienated from the Established Church. Tested by the principle of thirty years' experience, he wanted to know how the Established Church of England was to be preserved, supposing a Church was not to remain Established if it did not number in its members a majority of the people? The principle appeared to him to have a common application to all Establishments if it were to be admitted in the case of the Irish Church; and he felt no doubt that if the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman were agreed to by this Parliament and ratified by the next, a demand for the disestablishment of the Churches of Scotland and England must and would follow as a necessary consequence. He now came to the second part of the Resolution before the Committee—that dealing with disendowment. He submitted that it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to state what he contemplated doing with the endowments of the Church which he proposed to disendow. Upon that point the House had nothing but a negative assurance. The right hon. Gentleman told them that those endowments should not be devoted to the service of the Almighty God, according to the rites and forms of the Established Church. That was a purely negative proposition. If there had been anything more positive it had been from the hon. Member for Birmingham, who had said that those endowments must be devoted to some purely Irish purposes. "Irish purposes" was, he thought, a rather vague phrase. He thought the House of Commons might press the point and ask what "Irish purposes" might mean. A gentleman who had recently been described as a great and good man, and who, though not in the House now, was still the Leader of the party who were attacking Establishments, stated on one occasion that he would devote the endowments of the Irish Established Church to lighthouses and lunatic asylums. If the representatives of Ireland were prepared to make that use of endowments intended for religious purposes, he thought they would merit the reproach which 150 years ago a great humourist, Dean Swift, conveyed in an epitaph which by anticipation he wrote for himself—

“He left what little wealth he had,
To found a house for fools and mad;
To show by one satiric touch
No nation needed it so much.”

After the Church had been disestablished and disendowed, could anyone hope that the other great questions which had been referred to more than once in the course of this debate would not be brought prominently forward? The hon. and learned Member for Sligo (Mr. Serjeant Armstrong) said the other night that he regarded the success of this movement much more in the hope of its enabling the land question to be dealt with in a manner satisfactory to the Tenant Right League than on account of the particular results it would bring about, and that evening the hon. Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had asserted that this was not really the question on which the Irish people had set their hearts. Who, then, could doubt, when this question was removed out of the way and these great international and solemn legislative Acts trampled under foot, that prescription would be shaken and all confidence in property destroyed? Who could doubt that the tenure of land would be attacked with more vigour and success than had been before displayed, and that, as he feared, Ireland would be reduced to a country inhabited by cottiers, and not governed by those who had hitherto directed the affairs of that kingdom? But before we arrived at so lamentable a state of things there was one barrier to be surmounted, and that barrier was one which he trusted would be found insurmountable. The right hon. Gentleman who preceded him had dwelt much on the issue to be decided at the next Election. Now, that issue, in his humble opinion, was not only the particular proposition contained in the present Resolution; but also the great question of the maintenance of the relations between the Church and the State. That was the issue which, in consequence of the action of the Liberal party, would have to be submitted to the new constituencies at the General Election. On that issue the Government would most cheerfully meet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and those who acted with him; on that issue he believed the people of this country would give an unmistakable verdict. That verdict he believed would be in favour of maintaining the immemorial relations between the Church and the State; and should he be so fortunate as to obtain a seat in the new Parliament his voice would be raised, as it always had been, and his vote given in favour of maintaining the relations between the Church and the State in this free, this Christian, and this Imperial land.

COLONEL HARTTELOT moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry we are not in a position to close the debate on this Resolution to-night; because the subject, though undoubtedly one of very great importance, has been discussed in two debates, lasting four nights each, which we have gone through in the present Session. As far as hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House are concerned, I am extremely anxious that this question, important as it is, should not be in conflict more than can be avoided with the general progress of business. If, however, it be the decided wish of Gentlemen on the other side of the House to continue the debate to-morrow, I hope we shall at least arrive at an understanding that it shall not be prolonged beyond then.

MR. DISRAELI: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I wish to remark that this is a subject the importance of which really cannot be described in language which could be accused of exaggeration. It is, indeed, a far more important question than that which has been adverted to so liberally in the course of this debate—the great measure of Reform which we passed last year. And we attach greater importance to this first Resolution than we do even to the second or third. They may involve questions of constitutional and even legal difficulty, but, comparatively speaking, they are Resolutions of detail. This really announces and describes a policy. The preliminary discussion referred merely to the question of going into Committee, and the opinion of the Committee has not been given on this Resolution. [“Oh, oh!” and “Hear, hear!”] That is our opinion, and I would remark—for I think it best to be candid on these questions—that there is on this side of the House a great desire that this Resolution should be distinctly and definitely discussed. Everybody must feel that this is a question which must have ultimately very serious consequences, and it cannot be considered unreasonable that hon. Gentlemen should wish to have an opportunity of expressing their opinions on this matter. Therefore I could not under any circumstances enter into an engagement that the discussion should close to-morrow night. I wish to convey to the right hon. Gentleman that we consider this first Resolution of greater importance than he gives us credit for, and he must not suppose from anything I have said that we think this Resolution trifling as compared with the others. On the contrary, we regard this as really the first occasion on which the opinion of the Committee can be taken concerning the new policy which has now been introduced to the notice of the Empire, and it is on this Resolution that Gentlemen on both sides of the House — certainly on this side — desire to have their opinions distinctly placed before the country.

MR. AYRTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman could not, of course, engage to bring the discussion to a close to-morrow night; but he wished to impress on the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of exercising all his influence in order to bring the debate to a termination as early as possible. There were many other important questions for consideration, and he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that, as far as the principles of these Resolutions were concerned, they had, in fact, been debated for a great many nights. All sections of the House had stated their views on the subject, and the House had by an overwhelming majority pronounced their opinions upon it. [“No!”] Was it likely that that side of the House, having expressed its opinion by so large a majority, would recede from the position it had taken up? And if it would not, what would be the effect of the Government opposing these Resolutions night after night? They would be persisting in a hopeless resistance to the determination which must ultimately be arrived at, and the delay would be most disastrous to the conduct of the business of the House. It was impossible not to foresee that the position of unofficial Members of the House would be one of the greatest embarrassment. After the lapse of some time all the public questions which had hitherto been kept in abeyance would be hurried on with, and the House would have no opportunity of properly discussing them. In conclusion, he urged the right hon. Gentleman to lend all his influence for the purpose of bringing the debate to a close as soon as possible.

MR. DISRAELI: In reply to the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, I must say I think it necessary that the House should have a very distinct idea of the position in which it is placed. We are arriving, no doubt, at a very critical point. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) is one which—as all must agree—involves very great changes, and in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government it might lead to very serious consequences. Under such circumstances, it is extremely desirable that the opinion of this House should be taken in a manner which cannot lead to misconception. It has not yet been taken in that manner. Speaking in the interest of hon. Members on both sides, it is desirable that when those consequences are felt by the country, at least it shall not be in the power of Gentlemen to put various interpretations upon the motives and views with which they arrive at their vote. Now the vote before the holidays was not of that clear and unambiguous character. [“Oh, oh!”] Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to agree with me as to the propriety of there being no ambiguity in their vote, but if they were satisfied with such a solution as was arrived at before the holidays, all I can say is, that I cannot agree with them. We wish to have a distinct issue raised on this important policy of the right hon. Gentleman respecting the disestablishment of the Church. We wish to have a distinct issue taken in the House on that subject. Such an issue has not yet been taken, and we look on this first Resolution as one of the greatest importance, and many hon. Gentlemen have intimated to me their desire to express their opinions upon it. If they can do so conveniently in the course of to-morrow evening, I shall not oppose the division. I never yet attempted to protract or prolong a debate unnecessarily; but I rose in order that I might not be misinterpreted as having entered into any agreement that the debate should finish to-morrow night. I have already explained the reason why we attribute to this Resolution so paramount an importance.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought his right hon. Friend's Motion had really disposed of the question; because it was not the ordinary Motion that the House should resolve itself into Committee on a distant day to consider Resolutions, but a Motion that the House should forthwith go into Committee for the purpose of considering certain Resolutions of which notice had been given. In the present instance there had been a clear affirmation of the principles contained in the Resolutions, and the House had in the most deliberate manner recorded its vote by an overwhelming majority in favour of them.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, it appeared to him not only that he would give the House no assurance that the debate would close to-morrow night, but that he had given them an assurance that it would not close to-morrow night. The position of affairs appeared to him to be this—and he spoke as one interested, not only in this Resolution, but in the general conduct of the affairs of that House—that there was a Government in office which, as far as he could understand, had made up their minds, whatever the decision of the House might be upon this subject, to treat it merely as the decision of the majority, and then to proceed to business. Let the House bear in mind that the second and third Resolutions had hardly yet been touched in argument, and there were several very important measures besides these Resolutions to come before them. There was the Reform Bill for Scotland, the Reform Bill for Ireland, and also the Bill for the prevention of Bribery and Corruption, and how was time to be had for discussing these important measures? Those who had spoken to-night had not advanced much new argument; and if they went on in this way there was no human probability of their being able to overtake the other important business of the Session. Unless the Government imported some novelty into the discussion to-morrow, it would be within the competency of the House to decide that the debate should not be further protracted; and he thought that it ought not to be spun out unless there were some argument to be adduced, by which hon. Members could hope to change the opinion which was deliberately arrived at before the Easter Recess.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had not been fortunate enough to catch the Speaker's eye in the former debate, and he was not disposed to allow an Establishment which had lasted 300 years to be swept away, with as little ceremony as if the question were one of a turnpike trust, without stating his opinions on the subject. There were many points connected with the first Resolution which had not yet been touched upon, and the two following Resolutions had not been discussed at all; he was, therefore, glad that the Prime Minister of the Crown would be no party to prevent hon. Members from expressing their opinions, which were a great deal wider and deeper than many Gentlemen opposite appeared to suppose. If there had been any delay in proceeding with the Public Business, on whom did the blame rest? There were not a few, he suspected, on the other side who had no great desire to see the Reform measures completed. And he did not think it would be decent to pass Resolutions with the haste of the last division. The right hon. Gentleman had only given a week's notice of his Resolutions before he asked the House to go into Committee, and no time had been afforded for hon. Members to consult their constituents. Since he had had a seat in the House he had never known a measure of such magnitude brought forward in such haste and discussed so summarily, he would not say so superficially.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that there was a growing tendency in some quarters to "job" debates and check the freedom of discussion in that House by making arrangements that certain persons were to address the House as they pleased, while less eminent Members had no opportunity of stating their opinions. It was not right that A and B, and perhaps Z, should address the House, and that then it should be arranged that the debate should close. The consequence of the system was that the same persons addressed the House on every subject, and no fresh ideas were presented, because no one, not in a certain category, had any chance to be heard; and he knew an instance of a Member who was told that if he wished to address the House, he had better apply to the Whips. He thought things were come to a strange state, when a Member could not address the House without asking permission of the Whips. He protested against Members being thus silenced or gagged. It was time for the House to take this into consideration, for otherwise the freedom of debate would be practically at an end. When great questions were brought before the House, it was not to be expected that Independent Members should remain silent. The system of terminating debates by arrangement between the Whips ought to be brought within very narrow limits. The right hon. Gentleman had brought forward Resolutions which ought to be discussed fully, and he thought every Member should have an opportunity of expressing his opinion on this important subject. They might still find time to discuss the other important measures of the Session.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he was one of the humble Members coming under the letter "Z" who had failed to catch the eye of the Chairman. As the representative of an important constituency he thought that their views on this important and solemn subject should be allowed to find expression. He agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer). If he had the good luck to address the House as often as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) he should not complain.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) a little misapprehends the nature of these understandings which appear so formidable. He treats them as conspiracies against the liberty of private Members. They cannot very well be that, when they are made in public, and they simply amount to this: they are appeals to the general sentiment of Members of the House, upon the general expediency and convenience of the case, to judge when they think a question has been sufficiently discussed. It is a mistake to suppose that any understandings of this kind can interfere with the liberty of hon. Members. But I think it would be idle to spend this evening in discussing whether we will close the debate to-morrow night. If the right hon. Gentleman says he can enter into no engagement, I must point out that a sentiment has prevailed on this side of the House that there has been a singular languor, though not in the latter part, yet in a large portion of the debate this evening; and we on this side of the House must reserve our own liberty to judge and act for the best to-morrow night. And especially if we observe a like languor to-morrow, it is possible that we may come to the conclusion that it will be for the general convenience that the debate should be closed. But that cannot be carried even by a slight preponderance of opinion; it must be by a general reference to the sense and convenience of the House.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that no Member for Scotland had yet spoken on the subject. Having spent part of the Easter holidays among his friends in that country, he could say they had very strong feelings against any proposition tending to overthrow the Protestant Establishments of the country. They were determined that they would neither be the slaves of a dominant superstition nor the subjects of an infidel State.

MR. WHALLEY said, he regretted that he had not been able to catch the Speaker's eye, as he had wished to elicit some explanations from the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) with whom he had voted in the late division. In the previous debate he had asked the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) to explain what course he intended to adopt with regard to certain details of the question before the House, and the right hon. Gentleman promised to give him an explanation, but failed to do so. Under these circumstances, he desired an opportunity of pointing out the grounds on which he voted on the last occasion, as well as those which might reasonably justify the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government in retaining his seat on the Treasury Bench rather than hand over the Government to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER explained, that he had not said that there was any conspiracy in the matter. But what he would say was, that a programme was made of those who were to speak, and he had even heard of the case of one hon. Member anxious to address the House who was told that he ought to go to the Whip on his side and ask his permission to speak. When that was the case he thought it was time to change the system, and for the House to consider seriously whether they ought not to retain the liberty of debate.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS BILL—THE PARCELS CLAUSE.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX wished to ask a Question of the noble Duke the President of the Board of Trade with reference to the 15th clause, commonly called the Parcels Clause, of the Regulation of Railways Bill. It appeared that the intentions of the noble Duke in inserting this clause had been very much misunderstood, and several petitions had been presented against it. The matter had been fully explained in "another place;" but probably it would be more satisfactory if the noble Duke would state, Whether or not his views in inserting this clause were correctly understood out-of-doors?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that out of doors the Parcels Clause in the Railway Bill was entirely misunderstood, as it had never been the intention of the Government to deal with the question in the manner the public supposed. He had that day received a large deputation of traders on the subject. He proposed to revise the clause, and to amend some other clauses. For that purpose he would recommit the Bill, in order that the Amendments might be printed and the matter placed distinctly before the public, so that there could be no misunderstanding.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)—THE RESOLUTIONS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY, who had given notice to put a Question in reference to certain proposed Resolutions regarding the Church in Ireland, said: My Lords, I have, in the first place, to apologize to your Lordships for having, I am afraid, kept you waiting some few minutes; but the truth is, as several Orders of the Day stood before the Motion of which I had given notice, I thought they would occupy some considerable time. My Lords, I am quite aware that if I were to attempt to enter upon any discussion of the Resolutions which are at the present moment under the consideration of the House of Commons, I should violate the spirit if not the letter of the Orders of your Lordships' House. But I believe I am perfectly in order in referring to the matter of fact which appears on the Journals and Votes of the other House of Parliament, that, immediately before the Easter Recess, a very important Motion was made by a most eminent Member of the House of Commons, and was acceded to by that House by a large majority. That Motion was that the House should go into Committee for the purpose of considering three Resolutions most deeply affecting that branch of the Established Church that exists in Ireland. My Lords, the first of those Resolutions purports to declare the expediency of altogether disestablishing that Church, and separating the State altogether in that country from any connection with its religious institutions or with the religious education of the people, and relying altogether upon the voluntary principle. The second Resolution proceeds to say that, in order to further the object in view, it is expedient—I am not quoting the words of the Resolutions, but stating their substance—it is expedient that no new ecclesiastical appointments should be made; and the third suggests an Address to the Crown praying that the patronage of the Queen in regard to ecclesiastical dignities should be transferred to the control of Parliament. [Earl Russell: Should be placed at the disposal of Parliament.] Well, that the rights of the Crown in regard to all ecclesiastical dignities and appointments should be placed at the disposal of Parliament. These, my Lords, are the three Resolutions of which notice was given in the House of Commons; and I suppose I am not assuming too much—I am afraid I am not assuming too much—when I say that there is every probability that the first Resolution will be sanctioned by the House by a majority something like that by which the Motion for the Committee was carried. I suppose I may also take for granted that that Motion, though made by a very eminent Member of the House, was not made on his own authority alone, and without communication with those who act politically in connection with him. Further, I suppose I must assume that the eminent persons who have determined, somewhat unexpectedly, on that course of proceeding, have not done so without making up their own minds as to the course they will take in the event of the success of their Motion; and it is as to those further proceedings that I propose to put the Question of which I have given notice to the noble Earl my predecessor in office. Had the Question been put before the Recess, I should probably have addressed it to the noble Earl the late President of the Council (Earl Granville), or to the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), inasmuch as I understand that both those noble Lords were present at the private meeting at which the Resolutions were arranged. [Earl GRANVILLE was understood to dissent.] I shall be much obliged to the noble Earl to correct me if I am wrong; but, perhaps, I may relieve him of the responsibility of answering the inquiry by transferring or making it over to the noble Earl (Earl Russell) opposite; because, since the Recess that noble Earl has put himself very prominently forward at public meetings as a supporter of those Resolutions, and avowed his adherence to the principle they involve. I assume, therefore, that the noble Earl does adhere to that last phase of his opinions in reference to the Church in Ireland, although it is at least a fortnight old; but the alterations which have taken place in his views within the last few years have certainly been somewhat extraordinary, and I am sure he will forgive me for recalling to his memory what those alterations have been. In 1866, the noble Earl was charged with the responsibilities of Office, and upon the occasion of a Motion made by the noble Earl who sits on the cross Bench (Earl Grey) for inquiry into the state of the temporalities of the Irish Church, he opposed the Motion, stating that all manner of evil consequences must be the result, and he succeeded in defeating the Motion of the noble Earl. In 1867, the noble Earl was free from the responsibilities of Office, and in that year the Motion which the noble Earl on the cross Benches had brought forward the year before, and was resisted by the noble Earl—the same Motion was made by the noble Earl himself. It met with no opposition, and a Commission was appointed. In the commencement of 1867, the noble Earl—having moved for this Commission of Inquiry into the state of the temporalities of the Irish Church as a necessary preliminary to any further proceedings—thought it expedient, before the termination of that Commission, for which he was not content to wait, to move an expression of opinion in their Lordships' House that the incomes at present enjoyed by the Protestant Church of Ireland should be distributed in certain proportions, according to a rule of three, which he had himself framed, among the different denominations in Ireland. That was the third change in the views upon this question of the noble Earl since he filled the office of the First Lord of the Treasury. In two or three months there came a fourth change over the mind of the noble Earl, who then declared that he was quite ready to adopt the views of the right hon. Gentleman who had brought forward these Resolutions in the House of Commons, though the noble Earl confessed that he had a slight preference for the mode of proceeding he had himself suggested. Now, I ask your Lordships to consider what was the question in reference to which the noble Earl had a slight preference for his own mode of proceeding, but was ready to waive it? It was neither more nor less than one of the most important questions which could occupy the attention of a statesman—namely, whether the State should or should not connect itself with an arrangement for making a religious provision for the people. Well, on that subject the noble Earl stated that his own opinion was in favour of making a provision for all religions; that he had a slight preference for that mode of proceeding; but, that as his Friends near him were of opinion that the State provision should be withdrawn from the Established Church in Ireland, he was ready to waive his own preference, and after having published his opinion that it was expedient that the State should support all religions, he was ready to acquiesce in the proposition that the State should support no religion at all. I must say that these changes of opinion are somewhat remarkable and sudden, especially on the part of the noble Earl; for, before his fourth evolution, he informed this House that a change of opinion and conduct on the part of a Minister on any great question was quite sufficient to cause him to forfeit any claim he might have on the confidence of Parliament and the country. I must now assume that the noble Earl adheres to the last views he expressed; or that, if he has not made up his mind, his opinion has been made up for him, and that he is quite prepared to go in for the entire and total disendowment and disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. The question I desire to put to the noble Earl has reference to the future course of proceeding on this question. I wish to know whether in the event—I am afraid the probable event—of the House of Commons affirming the principle, at least, of the Resolutions brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, it is the intention of the noble Earl, and those who act with him, to refer the Resolutions to your Lordships' House, and to ask how far your Lordships are prepared to concur in that line of policy? Last year the noble Earl on the cross Benches (Earl Grey), when it was proposed to proceed by Resolution on the subject of Reform, argued with great force on the propriety of the concurrence of your Lordships' House in the Resolutions being applied for before the introduction of the Bill, in order that it might be ascertained how far the two Houses were in accord on the main and important principles. The plan of proceeding by way of Resolution was, however, dropped, and therefore there was no occasion for the suggestion of the noble Earl to be acted upon; but if it was thought desirable that such a suggestion should be acted on at a time when it was evident that, immediately on the adoption of the Resolutions, a Bill would be brought in and submitted to the consideration of Parliament, such a course of proceeding is doubly important, when there is a doubt whether it is proposed that any Bill founded on the Resolutions in the present case is about to be brought up to your Lordships' House, and whether your Lordships will have any means afforded you of expressing your opinion on the Resolutions, without which concurrence of your Lordships the Resolutions will be a mere dead letter. Therefore I wish to know, whether it is the intention of those who promote these Resolutions to ask, previous to taking any further stage, the concurrence of your Lordships' House in them, and to ascertain what views your Lordships take with respect to the extraordinary and unexpected measure for disestablishing the Irish Church. Then, my Lords, in reference to another point, I have to observe that a speech was reported to have been recently delivered at a public meeting by the noble Earl (Earl Russell), and in order not to misrepresent his sentiments, I shall read from the report in The Times newspaper a few passages, to which I call his attention. The noble Earl is reported to have said—

“I must say a few words on the very important third Resolution proposed by Mr. Gladstone. That Resolution asks the Crown to place at the disposal of Parliament Her Majesty's interest in the ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland. Now, that is in conformity with the advice which, a great many years ago, I gave to King William IV., and which His Majesty was pleased to accept, although, as I had to contend with Sir Robert Peel, Lord Derby, and Sir James Graham, I did not succeed, and was beaten in that encounter. I trust, however, that Mr. Gladstone will be more fortunate; that the advisers of the Crown will—as I suppose they will—advise Her Majesty to do what William IV. did, and that disestablishment and disendowment will take place.”

It is now very long since the period to which the noble Earl referred: but I apprehend that he must have alluded to what occurred in 1835. It certainly is rather curious to see how history repeats itself, and how a circumstance which had almost dropped into oblivion re-appears again almost in the same form. My Lords, the noble Earl and I are, I am sorry to say, the only survivors, with the exception of Lord Brougham, of those who took an active part in the debates of that period. Now, I will venture to state what really did occur on the occasion referred to, and then your Lordships will see how erroneous is the noble Earl's statement. It is rather singular that a few months before the Motion referred to by the noble Earl was made in the House of Commons, the previous Government had been summarily dismissed from Office; and the consequence was that Sir Robert Peel was called on to undertake the formation of an Administration, his party being at that time in an avowed minority in the House of Commons. The first thing which Sir Robert Peel did was to dissolve the Parliament, so that he might meet a Parliament elected under his own auspices, and afterwards—there having been a Commission then, as now, to inquire into the temporalities of the Irish Church—the noble Earl (then Lord John Russell) thought it necessary to call upon the House to support an abstract Resolution, then, as now, to the effect that any surplus that might appear to exist after providing for all the requirements of the Irish Church should be appropriated to the purposes of general education. The noble Earl proposed a further Resolution, to the effect that no plan for the settlement of the tithe question would be satisfactory which did not involve such an appropriation. The noble Earl, on that occasion, not only gave notice of these two Resolutions, but he also moved an Address to the Crown, praying the Sovereign that he would be pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament his interest in the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland. My Lords, it is not correct to say that on that occasion he was defeated by the opposition of Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, and myself. We opposed them, and the noble Earl obtained a considerable majority. The last Resolution, which Sir Robert Peel said he would resist to the utmost, the noble Earl had not the opportunity of pressing to a division, because the result was the resignation of Sir Robert Peel, and the noble Earl acceded to power. Now, whatever may be the determination on the subject by the present House of Commons, which has only a few months to live, and which was not elected under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government, I trust that he and my noble and right hon. Friends who are Members of his Government, are too well aware of the importance of this question, and of the duty they owe their Sovereign, to think of resigning their offices under any amount of pressure or opposition, however factious, if any such should be offered, until they have had a full opportunity, if not of perfecting the measures for the Reform of Parliament, at all events of testing the sense and feeling, not of the existing constituency, but of the larger constituency created by the Reform Bill of last year. Therefore, I hope that the parallel of 1835 will not hold good at the present time. The noble Earl (Earl Russell) succeeded to Office; and he says that, as a Minister of the Crown, he gave the advice to his Sovereign to take the same course as that now proposed to be pursued. But the advice he gave to the Sovereign was, not to take the course proposed in the Resolutions now before the House of Commons, but to sanction the introduction of a Bill which, if carried into an Act of Parliament, would have had the effect of restraining the Prerogative of the Crown. It is impossible that two questions can be more distinct. One is whether, upon advice given by constitutional Ministers and sanctioned by a constitutional Monarch, you shall permit the discussion of a question in the two Houses of Parliament, by which, in the case of an Act of Parliament being passed, the Prerogative of the Crown would be temporarily sacrificed and suspended; and the other is the question whether, upon the Address of one House alone, the Crown is to abandon the exercise of those Prerogatives and those duties which are imposed upon the Crown, not by a Resolution of one House, but by Acts of Parliament which Her Majesty, as a constitutional Sovereign, is bound to obey. There is an entire and absolute distinction between the two questions. I admit the noble Earl is quite prepared to show that in 1835 he took the same course he recommends Mr. Gladstone to take in 1868; but he will excuse me saying that that is only a reference from Earl Russell in 1868 to Lord John Russell in 1835, and it does not add any authority to the proposal. I contend it is no precedent at all. What you asked the King, through his responsible Ministers, to do, was to permit the discussion of an Act of Parliament the effect of which, if carried, would be to limit the Prerogative of the Crown. I do not know what language was used in signifying—which, after all, is a formality—the assent of the Crown in Parliament; but this, I know, that when Lord Melbourne moved the second reading of the Bill which the noble Earl introduced in the other House, and in which he was successful in introducing as a sine quâ non—the settlement of the tithe question—the language of Lord Melbourne was, that in moving the second reading of the Bill, he was authorized to signify the consent of the Crown to the suspension of the Prerogative of the Crown for the purposes of that Act. But the proposal was not fully adopted. After that Act was passed, what became of the sacrifices of the Prerogative of the Crown? The Crown, in the present instance, is asked—not to sacrifice, not to consent to the suspension of Prerogative, for the purpose of an Act of Parliament, upon the recommendation of the constitutional and responsible Advisers of the Crown—but it is asked indefinitely to suspend the exercise of duties which, by Acts of Parliament and the Coronation Oath, it is bound to exercise, until at some period, and in case at some period Parliament should think fit to legislate in the sense of the Resolutions. I am not about to discuss on their merits the Resolutions now before the House of Commons; the proper time for discussing them will be when they come—if they ever shall come—before your Lordships' House either as Resolutions or in the shape of a legislative enactment, to which your concurrence is requested, and without which these Resolutions are waste paper. I am not, therefore, discussing the merits of the Resolutions, but I am showing the noble Earl that he was—no doubt unintentionally—in error when he stated that the course now to be pursued was that he had recommended to William IV. I venture to think that William IV. could not, and her present Majesty cannot, accept and act upon a Resolution of the House of Commons calling upon Her Majesty to suspend the operation of Acts of Parliament; and I say again there is a broad constitutional difference between the course proposed in 1835 and the course sought to be pursued now. The one was the legitimate advice of Ministers to the Crown to permit the passing of an Act of Parliament; the other is the advice of the House of Commons to the Crown, to act upon a Resolution of that House, not only without, but in defiance of the authority of Acts of Parliament. While I seek to draw this distinction, I should not have taken notice of it at all, if it had not been broadly and pointedly stated by the noble Earl that the course which he advised and to which William IV. assented in 1835 was identical with the course now proposed, and to which Her Majesty is asked to assent. The noble Earl concluded by expressing the hope that Mr. Gladstone would be more successful than he was. The noble Earl was so far successful upon the occasion alluded to that he ousted Sir Robert Peel from Office; and having done so he gave effect to his own principles by the introduction of a Bill. That Bill, so far from being defeated by Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, and myself, actually passed through the House of Commons, and was sent up to the House of Lords. Here a Motion was made to separate that portion of the Bill which related to the settlement of the tithe question, which was not objectionable, from that portion to which great constitutional objection was felt—namely, the principle of disestablishing the Established Church in Ireland. That Motion—that is, the omission of the Appropriation Clause—was carried by a majority of 96. The noble Earl, however, continued in Office; and, in the following year, he had the satisfaction of settling the tithe question, or what remained of it to be settled; and those who were opposed to the noble Earl had the satisfaction of knowing that they had defeated the principle against which they contended in the year before. The noble Earl had the satisfaction of retaining Office, and those who opposed him had the satisfaction of putting a stop for thirty-three years to all agitation on the subject of a change which the noble Earl had declared to be indispensably necessary. I hope Mr. Gladstone will not attain even the measure of success which the noble Earl attained on that occasion. Sir Robert Peel challenged the noble Earl when he was in Office to bring forward a Bill; and the answer of the noble Earl was—"I cannot bring forward a Bill; I must move Resolutions; I am not authorized to signify the consent of the Crown, and without it, signified by her responsible advisers, such a Bill cannot be introduced." I remind the noble Earl of that position. He says he hopes Her Majesty's present Ministers will give their consent, as the noble Earl did, to the measure which he recommended to William IV. I venture to express my hope that Her Majesty's Government will do no such thing; and that they will not facilitate the introduction, during the short space of time which this Parliament has to last, of a measure which, in my judgment, will, instead of producing peace and satisfaction in Ireland, stimulate to the utmost religious rancour and animosity.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg the noble Earl's pardon, but I understood him to say that he would not discuss the merits of the Resolutions.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I am not discussing the merits of the Resolutions; I am discussing a proposition connected with them—I mean the effect which would be produced if these Resolutions were carried in the other House, and if a new Government were formed and endeavoured to force forward a measure founded on them—the effect of which would be to produce discord and religious animosity instead of peace; and the passing of them will involve the introduction of a measure upon which the two Houses of Parliament will be irreconcilably at variance. Any person aspiring to hold the high office of Prime Minister should hesitate before introducing into Parliament a measure fraught with such dangerous consequences. I have thought it right to point out in what way I think the noble Earl's statement is incorrect in regard to what occurred in 1835 as compared with what is occurring now. One similarity occurs to me now, and it is that, in 1835, the noble Earl was asked the same question I am now about to put to him, whether it is intended to move the Resolutions in the House of Lords. Probably the noble Earl will give the same answer that he gave in 1835—that it was not the intention of the Opposition to the then Government to test the opinion of the House of Lords by submitting the Resolutions to them for their concurrence or disapproval. I have thought it my duty to state clearly where we think the noble Earl is in error in comparing the circumstances of 1835 with the circumstances of 1868 as to the course of procedure; and to point out that it would be contrary to the usages of the Constitution that an endeavour should be made to take action upon the Resolutions now under consideration by the other House before a Bill has been founded on them, and before they have received the sanction of your Lordships. Assuming that these Resolutions will receive the sanction of the House of Commons, the Question which I have to ask is, Whether, before proceeding with a Bill, or in the absence of any attempt to proceed with one, the noble Earl and his Friends propose to ask the House of Lords how far they concur in the principles of those Resolutions?

EARL RUSSELL: I think the course pursued by the noble Earl is somewhat extraordinary. In the midst of a discussion in the House of Commons upon certain Resolutions, and in the prospect of a division in that House upon the question, the noble Earl brings the subject forward; and he says he will not discuss the Resolutions, but he will discuss the effect of them. If a Member of the House of Commons was about to oppose the Resolutions, what more effectual way could he take than that of saying, "I will discuss the effect of the Resolutions; I will show you the bad effect they will have if they are carried, and how contrary they are to sound policy; and therefore I ask you to reject them?" That Member of the House of Commons would be quite in order and quite within the rules of debate. But to raise a discussion in this House on a debate proceeding in the House of Commons is, I must say, an unusual and a not very exemplary course of proceeding. The noble Earl has taken up three topics. He has first discussed my course of action on this question of the Irish Church, and has adverted to what he considers the inconsistency of my course. I will answer the noble Earl in the language of Burke, who, when he was taunted with some inconsistency, said, "I vary my means in order to preserve the consistency of my ends." My end has been the pacification of Ireland, and not merely to preserve a parchment union with that part of the kingdom, but that the hearts and minds of the people of England and Ireland should be reconciled; and, seeing the miserable consequences that have resulted from time to time from the almost periodical recurrence of discontent and disaffection from the date of the Union to the present time, I wish to see that Union become real, and the people of Ireland fairly convinced that they are treated with justice. I have always been of opinion that you could not say they were treated with justice when the whole of the revenues applied to the religious instruction of the people of Ireland are given exclusively to an eighth, a ninth, or a tenth of the community. That is, as has been shown over and over again, an inconsistency which exists nowhere else in the world; and, being complained of by the people of Ireland, the Roman Catholics of Ireland have this year asked for equality with regard to religious distinctions. It is obvious that the easiest mode at the time of the Union in which that equality might have been effected would have been by a large grant to the Roman Catholic clergy, and that was the mode that Mr. Pitt proposed, but unsuccessfully—we all know that not a single word he uttered on that subject took effect. In 1825 Lord Ellesmere proposed that a provision should be made by law for the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. I voted in favour of that proposition. I used very strong language at the time. I remember saying that I could not understand the construction of that man's mind who was not ready to vote for such a Motion as that if it would produce peace in Ireland. But that proposal was defeated—not in the House of Commons, for there it was carried by a majority—but the Minister of that day did not choose to adopt it, and it was altogether lost, and was not brought forward again in 1829, when the general question of the privileges of the Roman Catholics was settled. Well, when the subject came to be debated here in 1866, it was brought forward by my noble Friend on the cross Benches (Earl Grey), not in the shape of a Motion for a Commission of Inquiry, but by a series of Resolutions settling the whole question. I certainly did not feel myself justified at that time in agreeing to those Resolutions; nor last year, when the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) opposite was in Office, and was proposing a new Reform Bill, as the Ministry of which I was the head had done the year before, would I have thought it right, fair, or expedient that we should attempt to settle the difficult question of the Irish Church at the same time that we were endeavouring to pass Reform Bills seeking to settle the representation of the three parts of the United Kingdom. All, therefore, that I proposed in 1867 was, that there should be an inquiry by a Commission, but with this proviso and condition—that the Commission should inquire, whether the revenues of the Irish Church might not be applied in such a manner as would benefit the whole people of Ireland.

EARL RUSSELL: I did not mention that circumstance at first, but it is quite true that the proviso which I proposed was struck out by this House; and that shows, at all events, that I was ready for an inquiry, and that I wished that inquiry to be complete, and that we should have, as the result of it, some plan which would be for the benefit of the whole people of Ireland. I stated—and the noble Earl has certainly fairly repeated what I said—that my preference was, as it would be even now, if it could be effected, that the equality for which the Roman Catholic laity in Ireland ask should be obtained by an endowment embracing the Episcopalian Protestants, the Presbyterians, and the Roman Catholic instructors of the people. But when I find that neither the Established Church in England, nor the Established Church in Scotland, nor the Dissenters in England, nor the Dissenters in Scotland, nor the Established Church in Ireland, nor the Presbyterians in Ireland, nor the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland are willing to concur in such a plan, then I am perforce, in this free and constitutional country obliged, as I have already said, “to vary my means in order to preserve the consistency of my ends.” I am obliged to give up the plan which I myself preferred, and adopt, or rather follow, a scheme that has more chance of success, but which would attain the end—the pacification of Ireland. The noble Earl, in his history, made some remarkable omissions. He forgot to say that during Lord Grey’s Ministry that question of having a Commission of Inquiry into the revenues of the Irish Church—always proposing that a portion of those revenues might be applied to other purposes than the maintenance of the Established Church—was a matter of conference and discussion; and it was during Lord Grey’s Ministry, and not during that of Lord Melbourne, that the noble Earl himself and Sir James Graham quitted the Government on account of their differences of opinion with their Colleagues. It is not a matter of proof, but I have always believed that it was in consequence of the fears of King William IV. that the Government would propose plans to him which he would not be able to approve that he dismissed the Ministry of Lord Melbourne and sent for Sir Robert Peel. No doubt King William IV. acted according to his own conscientious views; but it seems to me it would have been very much better if he had left the Ministry of the day to introduce their own plans; and in that case I doubt whether we should have been successful in carrying them. However that may be, having had a strong opinion on that point in 1834, when Sir Robert Peel undertook the Government of the country under very adverse circumstances, we did not think ourselves bound to follow him. On, the first question of the Address, we proposed an Amendment with regard to municipal corporations, and also a censure on the Government of Sir Robert Peel for having dissolved the previous Parliament. After a time, there being this difference with regard to the Irish Church, and seeing no hopes of ever getting a majority in that Parliament which he himself had called together, Sir Robert Peel most constitutionally said that the Minister ought to have the confidence of the House of Commons; he ought not to remain Minister if he has not that confidence; and therefore, with my Colleagues, I have felt compelled to resign our power into the hands of the King. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) refers to the Resolutions now before the other House, and he asks me whether those who are favourable to them have had any communication together, and whether, opposing these Resolutions to be carried in the other House, they intend to propose them to this House. Now, I think it is rather premature to ask that question. I think they ought to be regular Resolutions of the House of Commons, made and reported, before that question should be put. However, I will not keep the curiosity of the noble Earl in suspense, but will say at once that, as far as I know the sentiments of those who sit on these Benches, it is not our intention in any way to propose these Resolutions to this House. My belief is that if a Bill containing the substance of those Resolutions, embodying the views of Mr. Gladstone, is brought before this House, that would be the best hope in which they can be submitted to your Lordships, with the view to their becoming an Act of Parliament. And if that Bill in its several stages were supported by a majority of the House of Commons and by the country, it would have far more chance of being favourably received and accepted by your Lordships than if I or any noble Lord near me were to bring forward Resolutions. That is a point, I submit, of discretion; and perhaps the noble Earl will recollect that when there was a question raised last year by a noble Lord on the cross Benches (Earl Grey) with regard to the expediency of proposing Resolutions or a Bill on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, I said that was entirely a matter for the discretion of the Executive Government; and, whether the noble Earl preferred Resolutions or a Bill, I should not make any objection to the course he might think fit to take in that respect. The noble Earl then comes to another question on which he accuses me of making a statement which is not historically accurate. But I must say he has attributed a meaning to my words which I never intended, and which I do not think they will bear. The whole question contained in Mr. Gladstone's third Resolution, as I read it, is this—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to the purposes aforesaid, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof."

That is a question which it appears to me is preliminary to any measure with regard to the Irish Church. It was, in fact, embodied in the Act of Parliament which the noble Earl himself induced the other House to accept, and which was afterwards accepted in this House, in respect to the temporalities of the Church of Ireland. It was there enacted in a clause that His Majesty had been pleased to place the temporalities of the Church in Ireland at the disposal of Parliament for the purposes of that Act; and your Lordships will recollect that ten Bishoprics were absolutely destroyed by that Act. So, likewise, when a Bill was brought into the House of Commons by the late Earl of Carlisle, affecting the temporalities of the Irish Church, and containing the Appropriation Clause, I then, as Minister of the Crown, brought down a Message from the Crown, to the effect that His Majesty was pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament his interest in the dignities, Bishoprics, and benefices of the Church of Ireland. It appears to me a necessary preliminary that you should have the assent of the Crown if you mean to have any legislation on this subject at all. I hold in my hand an extract from my speech, taken from The Times newspaper, which agrees as nearly as possible with the passage read by the noble Earl. It is as follows:—

"Gentlemen, I do not wish to detain you much longer, but I must say a few words on the very important third Resolution proposed by Mr. Gladstone. That Resolution asks the Crown to place at the disposal of Parliament Her Majesty's interest in the ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland. Now, that is in conformity with the advice which a great many years ago I gave to King William IV., and which His Majesty was pleased to accept, although, as I had to contend with Sir Robert Peel, Lord Derby, and Sir James Graham, I did not succeed, and was beaten in that encounter. I trust, however, that Mr. Gladstone will be more fortunate, than the advisers of the Crown will, as I suppose they will, advise Her Majesty to do what King William IV. did; and that disestablishment and disendowment will be the result."

Now, there was no part of the Message sent by King William IV., and there would be no part of the Message sent by Her Majesty, if she should graciously accede to Mr. Gladstone's third Resolution, which would bind the Crown or bind Parliament to disestablishment or disendowment. It can only be by an Act of Parliament—by a Bill receiving the approval, first of the House of Commons, next of the House of Lords, and lastly the assent of the Crown—that disestablishment and disendowment can be effected. But, if you take it the other way and say that no advice should be given to Her Majesty to place at the disposal of Parliament, even for the purpose of discussion or argument on the part of those who introduce the question—who I suppose would be the regular Official Advisers of the Crown—her interest in these revenues and appointments, it would be an estoppel to Parliament, and would prevent the subject being considered at all. It would, of course, be always in the power of the Crown to object to any particular measure, but in the event I have supposed the whole subject would be entirely in abeyance. Parliament would be condemned to silence or inaction on the subject, unless advice were given to the Crown in conformity with the advice given to William IV. I have been looking to see whether there is any precedent for that course, and I have found one that is exceedingly to the purpose; but it is rather remote, being nearly three centuries ago. I find that in 1575 a Bill for Rites and Ceremonies in the Church having been read three times in the House of Commons, the Speaker declared to the House that it was the Queen's pleasure that from henceforth no Bills concerning religion should be proposed or received into the House unless the same should be first considered and approved by the clergy. Now, is that the principle on which the noble Earl insists? Does he contend that a subject like this must not even be discussed in the House of Commons unless with the approval of the clergy? Such a principle, I am afraid, would very much limit the authority of the House of Commons, and would very much fetter the liberty of discussion which, since the Revolution of 1688, they have taken upon themselves. The noble Earl says that, as an historical fact, I was not defeated by himself, Sir Robert Peel, and Sir James Graham, because I succeeded in carrying the Bill in the House of Commons. Yes; but that does not at all diminish the importance I attach to their opposition, for it had an immense effect throughout the country, and when the Bill came up to this House, and one of the vital clauses was struck out by a large majority, it would have been impossible for us to appeal with any hope of success to the country. Their opposition was so influential that I had county Members constantly coming to me and saying that they would lose their election if we persisted in the measure and if we appealed to the country. I confess that, under these circumstances, we, rightly or wrongly, retained Office. It is clear, then, that those who opposed the Appropriation Clause were victorious. At that time, however, the ignorance that prevailed with regard to Ireland and the Irish Church was something quite astonishing. When I mentioned to my constituents that there were churches in Ireland in which no Divine service was performed my hearers could not believe it. They thought it impossible that such a state of things could exist, notorious as it now is, and that was the reason why we were defeated. For my own part, I see no reason because that measure was defeated in 1836, because it could not be carried in 1838, why now, when the people are far more enlightened and when opinion is far more favourable to a just settlement of the question of the Irish Church, we should not endeavour to obtain such a settlement. If these Resolutions are carried—I leave it entirely out of the question whether the Ministry should choose to resign or not, for that is no business of mine—my belief is if they give advice to the Crown to resist the deliberate opinion of a large majority of the House of Commons they would produce a difference, in fact a collision, between the Crown and that House which, happily, we have not witnessed for many years, and which in former times was averted by Mr. Pitt and Lord Grey by appealing to the country. Now, however, it is quite clear—it must be evident to the whole world—that, in the case of an appeal to the country, there would not be a less majority in favour of Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions, and in favour of taking into consideration the Irish Church, than there was on the 30th of March, when Mr. Gladstone, by a majority of 60, carried his proposal to go into Committee. I think I have already explained that the speech I made did not, as the noble Earl seems to suppose, imply that Mr. Gladstone in his Resolutions recommends the Crown to agree with the House that disestablishment and disendowment are necessary; but only that the Crown should, as on former occasions, allow Parliament to consider the question. The noble Earl apparently wished to impress on my mind that nothing can be done by Resolutions. I know that perfectly well. I am quite aware that the Queen would not be justified in suspending a single Bishopric or benefice in Ireland unless an Act of Parliament provided that that should be done. The Queen cannot be constrained, as it were, by the House of Commons to suepend these appointments. That is a question of convenience and arrangement; but the great question is, whether disestablishment and disendowment are due to the Irish people. It was no doubt a great triumph in 1836 not to agree to our Resolutions; and it was a great triumph in 1825 that the Roman Catholic Church was not endowed; but, however successful the Opposition was in those instances, it has brought on the question of disestablishment and disendowment; and if you mean to consult the real interests of Christianity in this country, you will act according to what Mr. Gladstone has proposed whenever a Bill comes up to you; and I feel very confident that when that Bill does come up—if it is supported by the great majority of the House of Commons, and that majority speaks the sense of the country at large—your Lordships will have the patriotism and wisdom to accede to it.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) stated that, had not my noble Friend given in his adhesion to Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions, he should have addressed his question to me or to the noble Duke near me (the Duke of Argyll), because he understood we were present at a private meeting at Mr. Gladstone's, at which those Resolutions were drawn up. Now, though I have long been in the habit of calling on Mr. Gladstone, sometimes alone, sometimes with a few friends, and sometimes with many, I think I have a right to ask upon what authority the noble Earl based that statement? When notice of the Resolutions was given it happened that, by a singular coincidence, some one very like a runner of the Treasury was observed to be excessively attracted by the architecture of Mr. Gladstone's house. That gentleman had not far to go, because Mr. Gladstone's house was not far from the Treasury; but it was remarked that he hovered around Mr. Gladstone's door as if drawn to the spot by some extraordinary attraction. Now, it is perfectly impossible that he could have been employed by any Member of the Government for that purpose; for, though we have seen many strange things in this country, it is not to be thought that he could have been made use of for what in Continental countries is called espionnage, but in this country and in more vulgar language "touting." At the same time I do not complain. I am willing to admit that I have been at important preliminary conferences connected with the Resolutions; I am very happy to say that I feel but a very small responsibility on that account, and I shall be glad to give your Lordships any information possible on the subject. But I do protest against its being drawn into a precedent that, if a man is seen to enter into the house of a political friend he should be called upon by his political opponents for such information as the noble Earl has indicated. There are a few points in what fell from the noble Earl to which I wish to refer. I do not profess to be a prophet, but this afternoon I have been a prophet and a successful one. I said to a noble Friend of mine that I thought it extremely possible the noble Earl in dealing with this question would begin by declaring his determination not to discuss the Resolutions at all, and would immediately rush straight into the middle of them. My noble Friend said he could not believe it, but I think I was right. I wish to follow the theory rather than the practice of the noble Earl. But there are one or two points which I think it important to notice. The noble Earl did not read the Resolutions, but said he would give their substance. He did give the substance of the first and second quite correctly; but, by a singular mistake, he gave the substance of the third exactly in the manner in which the Government Papers give it day after day, and which conveys a perfectly erroneous impression of what that Resolution really is. The noble Earl said that the third Resolution prayed the Queen to suspend the exercise of the ecclesiastical patronage of the Crown in Ireland. Well, having been admitted to some of the conferences on the subject, I must say that one of the most anxious considerations of its framers was how to proceed in these matters in the most constitutional way as regards this House, and in a manner the most profoundly respectful as regards Her Majesty. We looked for precedents, and we found one in the Church Temporalities Act, promoted by the noble Earl; and Mr. Gladstone has, in fact, taken the words of his Resolution from that Act. During our search, we looked not only to the Act in which the words occur, but also to the debates. We found that an objection was raised as to the Crown's consent not having been properly given, and the answer given by Lord Althorp and subsequently by Mr. Secretary Stanley—the noble Earl—was that they took the right way of proceeding to obtain the consent of the Crown, and he added that he could not help thinking that those who insisted on a point of mere form showed their disinclination to grapple with the subject. The Speaker, on being referred to, said that the consent of the Crown might be given at a future stage. Sir Erskine May in his work on The Law and Practice of Parliament, says that it is usual for the Crown's consent to be given before the introduction of any Bill which affects the Royal Prerogative. That consent is usually obtained by Her Majesty's Ministers advising Her Majesty to place her interest and Prerogative at the disposal of Parliament—a phrase upon which the noble Earl seemed to lay some stress—but the meaning is not that the Crown gives any approbation to the substance of the measure, but will merely remove an obstacle to the carrying on of the Bill, so that it may be considered both by the House of Commons and by the House of Lords, and ultimately be submitted for the Royal assent. I believe this is the usual course which should be adopted. But how will it be when a Motion of this kind is made by a Member of the Opposition? Can this course be taken when the Ministers are adverse? It was thought disrespectful to this House and towards the Queen that one branch of the Legislature should ask Her Majesty not to fulfil those duties which the law of the land imposes upon her. It was thought exactly in the same way that either branch of the Legislature might ask the Crown to remove the form of an obstacle to legislation. The noble Earl who introduced this subject did one thing, however, which appears very extraordinary. He, an unofficial, but certainly an eminent, Member of this House asked another Member, equally unofficial and equally eminent, what the Opposition in the House of Commons would do under certain circumstances? I am surprised that my noble Friend gave an answer, but he did, and a most explicit answer it was. I should not venture of myself to ask a Question on this subject of Her Majesty's Government; but since the noble Earl has set the example, perhaps I may be allowed to inquire of him, what is the course Her Majesty's Government will take in the event of their being defeated by an enormous majority in the House of Commons? I will put the Question on the Paper if the noble Earl wishes? But what I do protest against is this,—that a noble Lord, having retired from the official Leadership of this House—and there is no Peer who laments more than I do the noble

Earl's retirement—should, almost immediately after having so retired, endeavour solemnly to pledge the House of Lords, before the country and the House of Commons, to fly in the face of whatever Resolution the other House of Parliament may adopt, and so make themselves an unpopular assembly.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Perhaps the noble Earl will allow me to answer the Question as to what the Government ought to do in the event of the Resolutions being carried.

EARL GRANVILLE: That is not my Question. What I asked was, whether the noble Earl would tell me what the Government would do in the case I have stated?

THE EARL OF DERBY: Of course I cannot undertake to say what the Government will do; but if they are defeated by a large majority in the present state of Parliament, I do not think they would be justified in abandoning Office, inasmuch as, under present circumstances, it would be impossible, or next to impossible, to adopt the ordinary course of an appeal to the country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am so sensible of the inconvenience which would arise from a continued discussion of the Resolutions which are said to be pending in the other House of Parliament, that I should have preferred to let the matter rest upon the speech of my noble Friend and the answer of the noble Earl. But the noble Earl who gave that answer and the noble Earl who followed him have fallen into an error upon a matter of fact which ought not to pass without correction, because the accuracy of the statement of that fact really constitutes the turning point as to the parallel between what was done in 1833 and what is proposed to be done on the present occasion. Now, what was done in 1833? A Resolution was proposed by the Government of the day to recommend to Parliament the extinction of a certain number of Irish Bishoprics, and to deal with the temporalities which belonged to them. Having come to that Resolution, the Government of the day introduced a Bill on the subject in the House of Commons; and inasmuch as the Crown had an interest in the temporalities of those Bishoprics, the Bill recited that the Sovereign had placed those temporalities at the disposal of Parliament. I apprehend that that was a perfectly right, regular, and constitutional mode of proceeding; because Parliament was called upon to deal, and proceeded at once to deal with those Bishoprics, with their temporalities, the right to appointments, and the other interests and patronage involved. But what is proposed to be done on the present occasion? The noble Earl who has just sat down corrected my noble Friend in the inference he drew from the Resolutions which are said to have been proposed to the other House of Parliament. But the noble Earl himself in reading the Resolutions fell into a much greater inaccuracy. I will read to your Lordships the third of these Resolutions as they are read by both the noble Earls on the Opposition side of the House. They read the Resolution as follows:—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.”

That is the way in which the noble Earls on the Opposition side of the House read that Resolution; but they omit the most important words, which make all the difference between the present case and that of 1833,—namely—

Now, what are “the purposes aforesaid?” The designs of the framers of the Resolution are to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage pending the final decision of Parliament. Therefore, what the Crown is asked to do by this Address is, not to consent to Parliament legislating with regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, but to place at the disposal of the Parliament its rights and patronage—not with the view to their being extinguished or transferred to, or exercised by, any other body, but with the view of their being suspended until some future time—for one, two, or, perhaps three years—when Parliament shall have come to a final decision as to what shall be done with them. I do not desire to prolong the debate; but I ask the noble Earl to consider whether, in the course of Parliamentary history there is any precedent for an Address praying the Crown, by the creation of a vacuum or an interregnum in regard to the legislation of the country, to suspend its prerogative for an indefinite period.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The noble and learned Lord has entirely misunderstood the scope and intention of the Address which it is proposed by the Resolutions shall be presented to the Crown. The noble and learned Lord has endeavoured to impress upon the House—repeating, in this respect, the misconception of the noble Earl opposite—that it is the intention of these Resolutions to pray the Crown to suspend its Prerogative in respect to the filling of benefices in Ireland, in consequence of the Resolution of the House of Commons, without legislation upon the subject. [The LORD CHANCELLOR dissented.] Then, if the noble and learned Lord shakes his head and denies that to be the representation he made of the effect of these Resolutions, I affirm that he has entirely failed to make out any distinction in point of principle between the precedent of 1833 and the course which it is proposed to take in 1868. The Resolution proposed to the House of Commons asks the Crown to place at the disposal of Parliament—not of the House of Commons, but of Parliament in all its three branches—the intermediate patronage in respect to the Church in Ireland until the decision of Parliament shall have been taken in regard to it. In short, the Resolution does not in any way propose to dispose of the revenues of the Irish Church, which it leaves to be dealt with finally by legislation in Parliament, and not merely by the Resolution of the House of Commons. There is, indeed, this distinction between the present case and all previous cases of a similar kind, in which the Prerogative of the Crown has been placed at the disposal of Parliament—and that is, that in all previous cases the Crown has placed its interest at the disposal of Parliament under the advice, and at the initiative of, its responsible advisers; whereas, in the present case—the country having a Government which does not possess the confidence of the House of Commons, and which is opposed to the course proposed to be taken by the Resolutions, the House of Commons is compelled to address the Crown upon this subject, and to assume to itself the initiative with regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The discussion this evening is an example of the inexpediency of the course taken by the noble Earl opposite, who, occupying the position of an Independent Member of this House, has thought fit to put a question to other Independent Members on this side of the House, as to the future course they intend to take with regard to this question. I say respectfully to the noble Earl that the future course of the Liberal party as Independent Members of this House upon this great question is in our own keeping, and the conduct of the Opposition is our own business and not his; and if, through the good nature and the courtesy of my noble Friend (Earl Russell) he has condescended to answer the question the noble Earl has put to him, it is our duty not the less to protest against this occasion being drawn into a precedent. The noble Earl has put questions which he has not a right to ask, and to which he had not a right to expect an answer. His putting that question is, indeed, an acknowledgment of our position. The noble Earl knows well that although the Liberal party is not in Office it is in power. He knows further that we have the power to impress upon Parliament the policy we advocate; he knows, in short, that the Government which he has recently left is only, to use his own expression, a Government of "stop-gaps" and "make-shifts" and nothing else.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE thought that the House in discussing this question should take into consideration what might be the effect if Her Majesty, mindful of her Coronation Oath, were to refuse to accept the principle laid down in the Resolutions which had been submitted to the other House.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, two or three noble Lords on the opposite side of the House have taken upon themselves to read the noble Earl who sits near me (the Earl of Derby) a lecture; and, in return, I hope they will permit me to return the compliment by referring them to the usual customs and manners of this House. It is neither the custom of the House of Lords, nor the manner among Englishmen, for those who have made an attack upon individuals to retire when those whom they have attacked are about to reply to the charges made against them. I was about to rise a few minutes since, when I was interrupted by the noble Earl who has preceded me; and though the noble Lords who have spoken on the other side of the House saw that it was my intention to reply to the accusations which have been brought against the Government with reference to this question, those noble Lords left the House without giving me, who represent the Government in this House, any opportunity of replying to their accusations. Under these circumstances, I shall not attempt to reply to the charges which have been brought against us by those noble Lords whom I should never decline to meet face to face. The noble Lords have brought two accusations against those who sit on this side of the House to which I was particularly anxious to reply. One of those charges was directed against the noble Earl near me (the Earl of Derby), complaining that he, as an independent Peer, had taken upon himself to put a question to the noble Earl who sits opposite with regard to the course he intended to take with regard to the Resolutions which have been submitted to the consideration of the other House of Parliament. It is said that the noble Earl having retired from Office was not entitled to plunge into this debate. The charge is not worth replying to. Is my noble Friend to give up his right to speak on one of the most important subjects of the day because a month ago he filled the office of Prime Minister?—a post which he unfortunately was obliged to resign. I am glad to observe that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) has returned to his place, and I will take the liberty of repeating what I was saying in his absence—that it is neither courteous nor customary, when a noble Lord has attacked a Minister, to leave the House without awaiting the reply he may have to offer. My noble Friend the noble Earl (Earl Granville) who has also returned, was obliged, I am afraid, to leave his place by indisposition; but I must say he always carries on a debate with a courtesy and good humour, which the noble Duke does not exercise. The noble Earl complained that some spy appeared to have been placed before Mr. Gladstone's house for the purpose of ascertaining who were the persons that passed in and out. Now, I confess that no one is more alarmed than I am by Mr. Gladstone's proceedings of every description; but what alarms me the more upon this subject is that within two doors of Mr. Gladstone's house there resides a friend of mine whom I am in the habit of visiting once or twice every week, and I now fear that if I were recognized passing Mr. Gladstone's door I might be put down for a mouchard watching his movements and those of his visitors. As I understand the noble Earl (Earl Russell) admitted, at the end of his speech, the principle which my noble Friend the Earl of Derby has laid down as to the difference between action upon Resolutions and action upon a Bill; and that is the whole point under discussion. If you arrest the Queen's Prerogative upon Resolutions you arrest it indefinitely, and it is impossible to know when it may be again exercised. I will take the liberty of putting a question to the noble Lords opposite, and I will ask them whether they intend to bring in a Bill? Nothing of the kind has as yet been done; and all that has taken place upon that matter is to move a series of Resolutions, which have no greater Parliamentary value than an abstract Resolution about the moon. It has never been stated by the Mover of the Resolutions that he would bring in a Bill, and yet they would have the face to ask Her Majesty to suspend her Prerogative without any pledge being given that a Bill would be introduced. The Prerogative might thus be suspended for three, four, or five months. Indeed, we know that it must be suspended until January, for with all the activity of Mr. Gladstone and his party I defy them to disestablish the Irish Church before that period. But it might be January, 1870, before any measure for that purpose could become law, and yet, according to the Resolutions, the Queen is not in the meantime to appoint to any Bishopric or other preferment in the Irish Church. I understand the noble Earl (Earl Russell) to take the same view as my noble Friend on that point, and to say that he should not expect Her Majesty's Government to advise Her Majesty to take such a course. In conclusion, I have only again to protest against the statement of the noble Duke that an Independent Peer, because he has resigned high office, ought not to come down to that House at a critical and important period and give us the benefit of his experience, which is greater than that of any other Member of the House.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, he was not in any way responsible for the Resolutions in the other House; but he must say that the noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Malmesbury) had entirely misrepresented—unintentionally no doubt—what had fallen from the noble Duke and the noble Earl who had left the House (Earl Russell). The distinction between the present case and the precedent of 1833 was this. In 1833 a measure was proposed by the Government and the assent of the Crown was given to it on their recommendation. But in the present case it was not the Government but the House of Commons that took the initiative, and, in the most respectful way, asked the Crown to do that which in 1833 the Government advised the Crown to do. The distinction was obvious. In 1833 a Bill was introduced on the subject of the Irish Church temporalities, and the Government of the day recommended the Crown to place at the disposal of Parliament its interest in the appointment of Bishops and Archbishops. Mr. Gladstone now moved an Address asking the Crown to do the same thing. If it was not open to a Member of the House of Commons to make such a proposal, it must be a perfect estoppel to that House interfering with what they might consider a great grievance, because the Government might advise the Crown not to put its interests at the disposal of Parliament. In 1833 the statement made by Lord Althorpe was this—he signified to the House that His Majesty had been graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament his interest in the temporalities of the several Bishops and Archbishops of Ireland. That was a formal proceeding without which the House of Commons could not have proceeded. It did not pledge the Queen as to the ultimate measure, but unless her formal assent was signified it was a perfect estoppel on the proceedings of the Commons.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was not difficult to see the difference between the two cases that had been mentioned. In the year 1833 the Crown was advised to place its patronage at the disposal of Parliament, in order that it might be dealt with by a Bill which had been introduced for the purpose; but in the present case it was proposed that the Crown should be asked to suspend the exercise of its Prerogative on a Resolution of the House of Commons. The second Resolution prayed the Crown not to make any new appointments to any vacancies that might occur—any Bishopric, deanery, rectory, or preferment of any sort—so as to prevent the creation of new personal interests. That was a thing that had never before been asked of the Sovereign. But Her Majesty was bound by her duty to the Church to exercise her Prerogative in appointing to vacancies as they occurred; and the Crown was now to be asked, “for the purposes aforesaid,” to make no new appointments, in order that no new personal interests might be created to be compensated for on the principle proposed by the Mover. The effect would be that till such time as, in the conflict of parties, the Bill might be introduced and passed no appointment by the Crown would be made. [The Duke of ARGYLL: No!] All he could say was, if that was not the meaning of these Resolutions the sooner the language in which they were framed was altered the better. It was utterly impossible that any other interpretation should be placed on them.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX had already stated that he was in no way responsible for the Resolutions; but the noble Earl who had sat near him (Earl Russell) had distinctly stated what indeed must be obvious to everyone, that no addresses could interfere with the action of the Sovereign, so as to suspend making any appointments, in the exercise of the Queen's patronage, which it was her duty to fill up.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, the question was not what was the intention of the Mover of the Resolutions, but what was the meaning which the words themselves bore. He did not see how it was possible to put upon the Resolutions any other interpretation than that they were to have some immediate effect.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The Resolutions were framed for the purpose of placing the patronage of the Crown at the disposal—not of the House of Commons—but of Parliament.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: The Resolutions, if they were carried into effect, would prevent the creation of any new interest in the temporalities of the Irish Church. The position of the Crown in that case was one of a very peculiar character. It might be that the Crown might give leave to Parliament to discuss a Bill prepared on the subject; but at the present moment there was no Bill in existence; and it would be a most painful thing for the Sovereign, who was sworn to maintain the Irish Church, to be over-ruled, not by a legislative Act, but by a Resolution of the House of Commons calling upon the Crown to allow that body to deal as it pleased with the Irish Church. Such a course of proceeding would not be consistent with the duty with which the Crown was invested in the character of its head and protector.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

BURIALS (IRELAND) BILL— MR. MONSELL AND THE DEAN OF CORK.

EXPLANATION.

MR. MONSELL said, he would ask permission of the House to allow him to speak for a few moments on a matter personal to himself. He found that Dr. Magee, the Protestant Dean of Cork, had complained of a statement attributed to him (Mr. Monsell) with regard to the burial-ground of Enniskillen. He begged to state that he made no statement with regard to the Enniskillen burial-ground, but to a place called Pubble. The facts were—that the graveyard of Pubble was about a mile from the Protestant Church; that for the last twenty-six years the burial service of the Established Church had not been celebrated therein more than five times; that Roman Catholics had no other available burying-place than that of Pubble within a circuit of not less than ten miles; that, notwithstanding, the Rev. T. C. Maude, rector of the parish in 1848, prohibited the Roman Catholic priests from officiating at Pubble graveyard; that the Rev. Dr. Magee, who succeeded Mr Maude as rector, was requested by a lay Roman Catholic parishioner to remove the veto of his predecessor, and permit the Roman Catholic parishioners to have the privilege of Christian interment. This request Dr. Magee held under consideration for some time, but ultimately refused to communicate further on the subject with the applicant. Dr. Magee had also impugned the statement which he had made in a recent debate on the Irish Burials Bill, to the effect that the very rev. gentleman had declined to allow Roman Catholics to be buried in a graveyard at Enniskillen according to the rites of their religion. He begged to say that he had made the statement on the authority of a petition, to which he called the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Mallow (Mr. Sullivan), in order that, if there was anything erroneous in it, he might contradict it.

GRIEVANCES OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Commission appointed by the Treasury to inquire into the grievances of Customs Officers in London has made its Report; and, if it is intended to extend the investigation to the outports, when the inquiry may be expected to commence?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the Commission referred to had not yet made its Report. It was originally the intention to extend the inquiry to the outports; but it was doubtful how soon this would be done.

ARMY—WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PACK BERESFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the manufacture and repair of machinery in use in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich has not hitherto been executed in the Royal Gun Factory, under the immediate superintendence of the officers connected with that Department; and, whether any change has been made recently in this system, or if any change is contemplated; and, if so, to what effect?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that the original custom was as stated by the hon. and gallant Member. Latterly it had been decided to manufacture and repair the machinery by contract, but it was now under consideration whether it would not be wiser to revert to the former practice.

DEVIZES GAOL.—QUESTION.

MR. MARSH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the fact of the Wiltshire Magistrates having decided to make Devizes Gaol the only gaol in the county; whether he is aware that malignant typhus exists in that gaol; and, whether he will send down an Inspector of the Board of Health to report whether Devizes Gaol is fit to be the only gaol in the county?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in

reply, that nothing was known at the Home Office of typhus fever having prevailed in Devizes Gaol, nor would such a fact come before him officially, unless the visiting Justices applied to Government to send down an Inspector. It was for the local Magistrates to decide whether Devizes should be the only gaol for the county; and, as long as they complied with the Prison Act Regulations, they could place it where they pleased, and the Home Office had no power to interfere.

ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the following announcement, which appeared in The Times of the 2nd of April instant, is correct:—

“ Sir John Pakington, as Secretary of State for War, has nominated the following gentlemen to act as a Committee to inquire into the character and construction of our Coast Defences, whether of iron, masonry, or earthwork, as recommended by the Royal Commission on National Defences:—Admiral the Hon. Sir F. G. Grey, G.C.B., chairman; Major General Collingwood Dickson, C.B., Royal Artillery; Major General Simmonds, C.B., Royal Engineers; Major General Harnes, C.B., Royal Engineers; and Mr. Hawkshaw, Civil Engineer; ” and, if that announcement be correct, whether he will state to the House the nature and extent of the instructions under which the Members of that Commission are to act, what powers have been given to them, whether they are authorized to examine witnesses, and whether he will place a Copy of the Commission, and of the instructions upon the Table, for the information of the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in reply, said, he would not commit himself to the exact expressions used in the paragraph the hon. Member had quoted from The Times, but it was quite true he had appointed a Committee of the character described in it. Allegations had been frequently made in the House that the large expenditure on our fortifications and arsenal defences had been to a great extent thrown away. It had been stated that the foundations were in some cases giving way, that in others the walls were cracked, and in others the roofs were falling in; and when he asked on what authority such allegations were made, it proved to be newspaper articles and anonymous letters. It therefore appeared to him desirable to get some authentic information on the subject, and he accordingly appointed the Committee.

He selected Sir F. G. Grey to preside over it because of his known ability and high character, and also because he held the office of President of the Fortifications Committee, and because he had nothing to do with either the designing or construction of the works he would survey. He had associated with Sir F. G. Grey the officers whose names the hon. Member had read, and every one would agree that it was impossible to nominate a Committee of higher reputation. He had no objection to lay the instructions given to the Committee on the table; they were of the simplest kind; both in them and in his private communications with Sir F. G. Grey, the only point he had insisted on was, that in the Report of this body of gentlemen, whose honour and competence were above all suspicion, the whole truth should be made known for the information of the House and the country.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask, Whether Mr. Hawkshaw was included in the Committee?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was.

QUESTION.

MR. PIM said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he expects to introduce the Bill for the extension to Ireland of the facilities which are afforded to England and Scotland by the Local Government (England) Act, 1858, and the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, the Bill referred to by the hon. Member was ready but; it wholly depended on the course of business whether he should feel it his duty to introduce it or not.

CASE OF MR. COBLE.—QUESTION.

MR. BAGNALL said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the dismissal of Mr. Coble from his office as Collector of Customs at Whitby; and, whether the Treasury is prepared to reconsider the case?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, in reply, that, after full consideration of the further representations made by Mr. Coble, and looking to the length of time which had elapsed since the inquiry took place, the Treasury had come to the conclusion that no sufficient reasons had been adduced to re-open the case. He would, however, say that, although the irregularities of which Mr. Coble was convicted rendered his discharge necessary for the discipline of the service, he was inclined to think his misconduct might be attributed mainly to want of judgment and discretion, and that he was not guilty of any intentional dishonesty or moral offence.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD BULLER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, When he proposes to introduce the Bill for the amendment of the Law relating to the Registration of Electors in Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales?

MR. DISRAELI replied that he regretted he had neglected to communicate privately with the hon. Baronet, as it had been his intention to ask him for some explanation of his Question. He was not under any obligation that he could recall to introduce a Bill relating to the Registration of Electors in England and Wales; and he believed that if the Boundary Bill were passed at the period he at present thought quite practicable, all that was requisite for the proper registration of electors in England and Wales would be provided for in that measure and the Bill of last year. He did not attach any definite idea to the Question of the hon. Baronet; he must, therefore, excuse him from answering, and not set it down to any want of courtesy.

SIR EDWARD BULLER said, he had certainly been under the impression that a Bill was to have been introduced for the express purpose of calling upon certain officers in parishes and boroughs to put upon the registration those persons who, in their lists, stood entitled to the possession of the franchise.

INDIA—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.—QUESTION.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in the present unsatisfactory state of Telegraphic Communication with the East, steps are being taken to ascertain the soundings between the English Channel and Gibraltar, and along the Mediterranean to Alexandria, as also from entrance of the Red Sea to Bombay, for the purpose of facilitating and encouraging the early establishment of an independent and more efficient and economical Telegraphic Communication with India than now exists?

MR. CORRY replied, that deep sea soundings between England and Gibraltar, and along the Mediterranean to Alexandria, and through the Red Sea, were specially obtained by the Admiralty between 1857 and 1859, with a view to laying a submarine telegraph communication, and the line of the soundings had recently been successfully completed between Aden and Bombay. As far, therefore, as the soundings were concerned, there was no impediment to the establishment of telegraphic communication between India and England.

IRELAND—THE LAND QUESTION. QUESTION.

MR. PIM said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When he intends to introduce his measures respecting the Land Question in Ireland; and when he expects that the "Electoral Statistics" for Ireland, ordered on Monday, 23rd March, will be laid upon the Table?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that the electoral statistics would be laid on the table to-morrow. The Land Bill had been ready for some time; but it would be useless for him to introduce it unless he could see that there was a prospect of securing a full discussion for the measure, and that there was a chance of passing it this Session. Should he see a likelihood of this being the case, he would introduce the Bill, and explain its provisions to the House.

IRELAND—MURDER OF MR. FEATHERSTONHAUGH.—QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in consequence of the barbarous murder that recently took place in the county of Westmeath, to apply to Parliament for extension of their powers under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, so as to enable them to adopt against Ribbonism and Agrarian Outrage, the same course that has been so successfully adopted for the suppression of Fenianism in Ireland?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, he could sympathize with the motive which induced the hon. Member to ask this Question, knowing, as he did, that the hon. Member had spent a portion of this year in the district where this frightful outrage had been committed. Everyone must feel that a great stain had been inflicted upon Ireland by the perpetration of this terrible murder; but, at the same time, he must remind the House, that such crimes have latterly greatly diminished. He did not, therefore, think that the general state of the country would justify the Government in proposing to extend the provisions of the Act, to which the hon. Member referred, to any other description of offences than that to which it was now applied—namely, to the suppression of Fenianism.

Mr. Dyce Nicol

INDIA—CIVILIAN JUDGES (BOMBAY). QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in the temporary absence of the Chief Justice of Bombay, a civilian member of the Court has been appointed to fill his place; if so, whether any special reasons exist for the preference of a civilian to a Barrister Judge; and, whether any Despatches have been sent by the India Board to the Government of Bombay on this subject; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay those Despatches upon the Table of the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, the Chief Justice of Bombay had taken a short leave of absence; and upon the occasion of his absents himself the post of Acting Chief Justice was, in the first instance, offered to the senior Barrister Judge, Sir Joseph Arnold, by whom it was declined. It was then offered to the next senior Judge, Mr. Newton, who, he believed, was a very competent person, and accepted. He was not aware of the reasons for appointing a civilian to the post, except that he was next in seniority. He had no objection to the production of the Papers asked for, and would produce also a despatch written some years ago, on a similar occasion, by Sir Charles Wood.

ARMY—THE 86th REGIMENT AT THE MAURITIUS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, What measures have been taken for the removal of the 86th Regiment from the Mauritius, and within what period it may be expected that the Regiment will, by this or other means, be rescued from its present perilous condition; and, with reference to the General commanding in the Mauritius and the Colonel of the Regiment, whether any steps have been taken, or are intended to fix upon those officers respectively the responsibility for the disastrous results of their having landed the said Regiment, in disregard of instructions and in defiance of the express warning of the local authorities?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied that he could only repeat the Answer which he had given to a similar Question some time ago, as far as the first part of the hon. Member's Question was concerned. He had taken no measures for the removal of the 86th Regiment from the Mauritius beyond those which he had already communicated to the House—namely, that he had given authority to the officer in command in the Mauritius to remove the troops whenever the state of the health in the island might render such a course advisable, a question upon which he could not of course at such a distance give any decision. The instructions sent out referred also to others, for the 32nd Regiment and other troops were also stationed there. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had sent out instructions that a strict investigation should be made into the reasons for permitting the troops to land, in disregard of the warning of the local authorities, and as the hon. Member would see, he could not give any further answer to the Question until that Report had been made.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, he would beg to ask, How many men of the 86th had died?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that only one death had occurred among the men of the 86th Regiment, although there had been a great deal of sickness.

MR. WHALLEY: Have not the women and children suffered more?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I cannot tell exactly the number of women and children that have suffered. The last account is that the women and children have suffered more than the men; I will be prepared to give a more exact Answer on Thursday.

TURNPIKE TOLLS.—QUESTION.

MR. MORE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can state when it is his intention to introduce his Bill with reference to the subject of Turnpike Tolls?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he had not promised to bring in a Bill on the subject, but only to consider whether he should do so. The Bill was in the hands of the draughtsman; but he was not prepared to say at present whether he would introduce it.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. VERNER said, that having heard a rumour that there was a wish to close the debate that night, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any opportunity would be afforded to Members of northern constituencies in Ireland to express not only their own opinions, but also the opinions of their constituents?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, one of the most difficult duties devolving upon an individual occupying the office I have the honour to hold is to attempt to regulate the conduct of a debate in a manner which will give satisfaction to both sides of the House. With regard to the present Question, first of all it presents itself to me as affecting the feeling of the Government, and then as regards the sentiments of the House. The Government have obtained what they wanted—that the opinion of the House should be taken upon a distinct issue; and we shall offer no obstacle to the conclusion of the debate. At the same time, it should be recollected that it is a question of great constitutional importance, upon which Gentlemen on both sides of the House—especially if there be a prospect of its being submitted to the consideration of the people generally—reasonably wish to express their opinions. I therefore have to consider the reasonable requirements of both sides, and have no other wish than to adopt a fair conclusion, and it remains for the House to express to me their general view of the subject. I regretted last night to see that reference was made to the circumstance that the debate was chiefly maintained by Gentlemen who generally do not take part in discussions. Although it is a necessary consequence of our Parliamentary constitution, and the mode in which business in this House must be carried on, that generally discussion must be confined to a few what are called leading Members, yet there are questions which sometimes arise, like the present, on which it is not fair that the discussion should be confined to those Gentlemen only. I am most anxious that Gentlemen on both sides should feel their interests have been as fairly consulted as is possible. I shall be happy to have an understanding on both sides of the House that Independent Members shall have an opportunity of expressing their opinions, and that the debate should not be continued on one side or discouraged on the other more than would be advantageous to the reputation of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it will, doubtless, be for the convenience of hon. Members that they should have some idea as to what is likely to be proposed in the course of the evening; and therefore, as I may consider that the Question of the hon. Member for Lisburn (Mr. Verner) has some reference to what fell from me last night, I beg to assure the hon. Gentleman that there is nothing further from the intentions of those on this side of the House—though we are desirous of allowing the other Public Business to go forward as soon and with as little embarrassment as possible—than to force any decision upon a question of this kind. In what I said last night I was governed a great deal by the observation I then made, that, although we heard many very interesting and important speeches, yet they turned more upon the conduct of the Government, of the Liberal party, and of myself than upon the character and case of the Irish Church. I hope that in the discussions that are to come there will be a disposition to place, on each side of the House, the best construction on the motives and proceedings of the other. And, anxious as we are to have no part in extending the debate, the hon. Member need not be the least afraid that I or any Friend of mine will attempt by a bare majority to suppress the expression of opinion.

IRELAND—REPORT OF THE IRISH RAILWAY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. MONSELL said, he rose to ask, When the Report of the Irish Railway Commission would be laid on the Table of the House?

THE EARL OF MAYO: I saw one of the Commissioners to-day, and learned from him that the Report of the Commissioners will be signed on Thursday, and of course it will be presented as soon as possible after that day.

COLLIERY ACCIDENTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREENE (who had on the Paper a Notice respecting Colliery Accidents and for the appointment of a Royal Commission on the subject) said, he had the right, as his name was first on the Paper, to bring the Motion forward. ["Oh, oh!"] If hon. Members opposite thought that they could put him down he begged to tell them that they would not do it if they tried till six o'clock next morning. ["Oh, oh!"] If the interruptions were continued he would persevere with his Motion. ["Oh, oh!"] He was in earnest about it. He felt very strongly on the subject; and if it were not that he thought he should be doing the cause an injury by now pressing the Motion he certainly should not be inclined to withdraw it. He believed it to be as much more important than the Irish question as the Abyssinian war was to a street row. ["Oh, oh!"] He desired to remind hon. Members that 2,468 men were killed in coal mines in the short space of two years. If any hon. Gentleman opposite did not think that that was important, perhaps he would get up and say so. ["Oh, oh!"] He desired to say that if hon. Members thought they could ever stop him, they were mistaken. They had taken the wrong man in hand; but at the same time he did not intend to press the Motion. He withdrew it at the wish of the Government; but he hoped that they would give him some other day for bringing it forward.

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—RESOLUTION.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st April].

"That the Resolution of the House of the 9th day of February 1858, relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply,—That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment,—be rescinded."—(Mr. Ayton.)

Question again proposed, "That the said Resolution be rescinded."

Debate resumed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving an Amendment in the standing Resolutions having reference to proceedings in Committee of Supply, said his object was to meet the objections pointed out a few evenings ago by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). In the 4th Resolution there were the words "without amendment," which he believed had been inserted after the Resolutions came down from the Select Committee. He would propose that those words should be left out and that this Resolution should be adopted—

"That after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for a reduction of the whole Vote, no Motion shall be made for omitting or reducing any item."

He hoped there would be an understanding that if a Motion to omit an item had failed, and that subsequently there was a reduction of the Vote as a whole, the hands of the Government would not be tied in respect of the mode in which the reduction was to be carried out; but that they would be at liberty to make it on the particular item which had been affirmed in Committee, or on any other portion of the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by proposing his Amendment and the new Resolution.

MR. GLADSTONE: If I understand the Resolution, it is likely to place the matter upon a very reasonable footing, so as at once to secure the order of our proceedings, and at the same time to give to all Members of the House the fullest scope. Any proposal for a Vote in Supply must divide itself into two branches—first, the general structure of the Vote, and, secondly, the particular items of which it is composed. In future we shall consider, in the first instance, the particular items of the Vote; and, after that, it will be open to any hon. Member to raise the general question of the structure of the Vote, and its general fitness for the purpose for which it is intended. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, on the part of the Government, proposes that in cases where particular items may have been confirmed by Vote of the Committee, if subsequently there should be a reduction of the aggregate amount of Vote, a difficulty might arise in the mind of the Government whether they would be acting in accordance with the intention of the House if they reduced any particular item. Well, Sir, I think it is obvious that if the Committee confirm an item in a Vote it must be understood to do it with reference to the general amount. I must be understood to mean that the amount put down for this particular item is not unreasonable.

MR. GOLDNEY said, it appeared to him that if there were six items in a Vote four of which were unexceptionable, and exceptions were taken to the two remaining items, and on a division on the latter items the Government gained a narrow majority, and if afterwards a reduction of the whole Vote was moved and carried, it would be extremely undesirable that the items which had not been objected to should have to be reduced, while those to which exception had been taken must necessarily be left in their entirety.

MR. AYRTON said, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goldney) had misunderstood the nature of the proposal, which was that if, for instance, one or two items were affirmed and the Vote itself afterwards reduced, the whole of the items would be remitted to the Government for re-consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

1. Resolved, That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

2. Resolved, That after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for a reduction of the whole Vote, no Motion shall be made for omitting or reducing any item.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND). COMMITTEE.

Acts considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

1. Question again proposed,

"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,"—(Sir Frederick Heygate.)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had exercised a very wise discretion

when he advised the House to keep as near as they could to the question of the Irish Church. Other Gentlemen, however, on that side of the House had made use of language which, in his opinion, was out of place in a great debate like this; but he trusted he should not fall into a similar error, although in the course of his remarks he should have to advert to the speech delivered last evening by the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). He should endeavour to establish that it would be an act of gross injustice to the Protestants of Ireland if the Church in that country were wholly disestablished and disendowed. No doubt there were many important measures before the House this Session; but he would ask the Committee whether the question of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Established Church was not the most important of them all? The Opposition and not the Government had brought forward this great question; and if many Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House were, not unnaturally, anxious to address the House on the subject, he was sure there was no desire on their part to delay the division on the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for Stroud distinctly stated that the Committee had to decide between the policy of the Government, which was a policy of upholding the Establishment and levelling upwards, and the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, which was a policy of levelling downwards. Now he, in common with many who sat on that side of the House, did not take that view of the matter, but was perfectly willing to raise a straightforward issue on the question whether the connection between Church and State should be maintained both in this country and in Ireland. If the Irish Church were disestablished and disendowed, the attacks on the English Church would come faster than the right hon. Member for South Lancashire seemed to suppose. The right hon. Gentleman had set the ball rolling, and where it would stop he did not know, nor did he perhaps care. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had on one occasion compared the Members for Stroud and Calne to a Scotch terrier, so covered with hair that one could not tell the head from the tail; but they were quite distinct enough now, and resembled two dogs of a different kind, who barked at every one, and when attacked sought refuge under the skirts of the right hon. Member's (Mr. Gladstone's) coat. The right hon. Member for Stroud, having been Chief Secretary for Ireland, surely ought to have given the House some information about the Irish Church; but in his speech he did not mention a single grievance caused by the existence of that institution. He believed, however, that during the time the right hon. Gentleman was in Ireland he did nothing but amuse himself; and the people, in their generosity, said that "His Honour was a good fellow, for he could ride well across country." For his own part, he believed that the Irish Church had been of great benefit to the country. He had often asked the peasantry, both in the North and South of Ireland, what they thought of the Establishment? and the reply was invariably that they were well treated by the clergy. They professed to have a liking for a gentleman, and he never heard any other remark beyond that in Ireland. He did not say that there were not others who said a great deal against the Establishment; but he denied that the mass of the people were discontented with the Church. At the time of the famine disturbances he was quartered at Cork, and had consigned to him from England various large sums of money for the relief of the existing distress. The money was distributed among the clergy, and he found that at that time there prevailed the greatest unanimity with regard to the acknowledged disposition of England to help them. But were there no other causes that stirred up the people of Ireland against the Irish Church? Had those men who were bound to instruct the people done their duty? He was not going to censure the Irish priests; but he would affirm that if they had instructed the people in that loyalty which it was their bounden duty to inculcate, the result would have been different; but, taught by their priests, they had learnt to keep rankling in their breasts feelings which happily did not possess the peasantry of this country. In the North of Ireland Protestant and Roman Catholic would be found living side by side harmoniously—excepting, perhaps, a fraction, who indulged in Orange displays and other little disturbances occasionally. Otherwise they were perfectly quiet, prosperous, and happy; and he would ask whether the influence of the Protestant Church and people had not had something to do with the state of tranquillity which prevailed in the North? He would ask whether the Protestant people in the North of Ireland had not during the whole of these Fenian disturbances, and on every occasion, done everything in their power to promote between England and Ireland that union which was so essential to the well-being of both countries? Why was there so different a state of things in the South of Ireland? Why was Belfast flourishing and increasing from day to day and from year to year? Why was Cork stationary, if not going backward? Why were there no new buildings to be seen there as in Belfast? Why, but because that life was safer in the North than the South; and because no capital would go there for employment till the people had learned not to take the law into their own hands. It was said, though he did not altogether endorse it, that Ireland laboured under three curses, demagogues, priests, and poverty. As to demagogues, they had always existed, and still existed. As to the priests, history would say whether they had or had not done their duty. He had certainly met many priests who were well-educated and well-affected men; but he had met with others who were disposed towards everything that Englishmen considered wrong with respect to the Union. With regard to poverty, he presumed most hon. Gentlemen would admit that poverty was passing away. Every one acquainted with the country must be familiar with the progress it had made since 1843, as exemplified in the better cultivation of the land, the improvement of the houses, and the increased comfort of the poorer classes. It was obvious that the demagogues had been fostering the discontent which prevailed. But what was the remedy for the grievance complained of? He was sure of this, that if the right hon. Gentleman had taken the vote upon the land question, and not upon the Church question, he would have found a hundred who cared for the former for one who cared a single farthing for the latter. But the right hon. Gentleman had taken up the cry of the Church, because it was popular with hon. Gentlemen on the other side. He (Colonel Bartelott) could perfectly understand such a course on the part of the hon. Member for Birmingham, who had all along avowed himself an advocate of disendowment and equality. They were now about to try their hands upon the Irish Church, and the question arose, Was the Church part of the English Church or not?

No doubt it was, and this was admitted on the opposite side when it suited the purpose of the party to say so. He contended that they were going to perpetrate an act of gross injustice, and to offend the feelings and prejudices of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects; and before taking such a step would it not be well to pause and well consider it? But was that all? The people of the North of Ireland had been accustomed for centuries to pay tithes and receive all the benefits of an Established Church without paying more than their tithes. These people would have a right to complain if that privilege were now taken from them. Was there no other way of getting out of the difficulty than by disestablishment and disendowment? He ventured to think there was—namely, by the removal of anomalies and defects of the Establishment, which he, for one, was not prepared to deny prevailed in certain portions of Ireland. Supposing Parliament were to reduce the Bishops and deans and clergy who had no cure of souls, that would go a certain way, at all events, to reduce the grievances complained of, without inflicting the gross injustice of severing the Established Church from the State. Would it not be possible to allow the proprietors in Ireland to buy up the tithes at a certain amount, and the funds secured by this means might be applied to some useful purpose, such as the general education of the country, which he thought would be doing no great harm. In conclusion, the proposal before the Committee was one of a ruthless—he would not say dishonest—character, and he was glad to know that Gentlemen on his side of the House would show, as a body, that they were determined to stand by that Church which, whatever faults she might have, had been a great blessing to this glorious and great country.

MR. BUXTON said, nothing had astonished him so much in the debate as the unparalleled weakness of the arguments by which these Resolutions had been encountered. Surely the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government must be ashamed to march through Coventry with such a ragged regiment of reasons as those which had been put forward on his side of the question. First of all, there was what he might call the Lord Plunket argument. They had been deluged with quotations from speeches of Lord Plunket, Lord Ellenborough, and others, as if they at this day were to be deterred from their purpose by the ipse dixit of some of the most arrant Tories of an age that was past and gone. Then there was what might be called the garrison argument—the argument that if they laid their hands on the Irish Church, it would affront those who were the true props and pillars of our dominion over that island, and perhaps they would leave us in the lurch. It was almost inconceivable that any statesman should dare to use such an argument as that. Was it possible to suppose that Her Majesty's Government was to take a partisan side with one of the factions by which Ireland was unhappily rent asunder, with the view of keeping down by their aid the majority of the nation? It was difficult to think of such an argument with patience. Then came the argument, scarcely less preposterous, that they had no right to interfere with the settlement made at the time of the Union, just as if the Parliament of the United Kingdom was to be restrained from doing that which, in its wisdom, it might deem right, just, and politic, because, forsooth, of some imaginary agreement between some unknown parties seventy years ago. Such an argument was not worth wasting one's breath upon; it could only show the barrenness of the cause on behalf of which it was put forward. And yet these three most futile and frivolous objections—for he scorned to touch the one about the Coronation Oath—all but exhausted the list of those that had been alleged on behalf of the Government. There remained, however, one more; the only one that it was possible to treat with the smallest show of respect. That was the argument that, in thus dealing with the Irish Church, they would be setting a precedent that would almost inevitably be followed afterwards on this side of the Channel. He admitted that this argument, and this one alone, had in it some decent respectability. But even to that one there was an obvious, decisive, overwhelming reply. The answer to it was that the disestablishment of the Irish Church was an act of justice to that country; and they could have no right to refuse justice to Ireland, because in doing so they might have to encounter some inconvenience or danger to themselves. They were bound to do to Ireland that which was right and good for her people. They could have no right to perpetuate the infliction of wrong upon them, or to maintain abuses among them, because in tearing them down they might endanger our institutions at home. No one could deny for a moment that were

Ireland an independent and self-governed land the Protestant Establishment would long since have ceased to exist. No one could deny that it was only because Ireland was bound up with Great Britain that the Protestant Establishment had ever lived at all, or had not long ago been swept into the sea. The eyes of the people of this country were at last opened to the iniquity of forcing upon a sister nation a religious system which the vast bulk of them abhorred; and happily they might be sure that England would not be induced to reject the demand for justice to Ireland by the plea—the base and mean plea—that to do so might damage our own interests. So poor, so barren, were the arguments of those who would keep things as they are. But, now, was there more force in what those on his own side had to allege? The right hon. and gallant General opposite (General Peel) put this question to the House—and he read the words themselves, for nothing was so easy as to dispute a general statement as to expressions which had been used. "Upon what grounds," he asked, "are we called upon to sever the connection between Church and State in Ireland?" What was the true answer to the gallant General's question? On what grounds, in very truth, did they demand that severance? They demanded it upon the ground that this Church is alien from the heart and soul of the Irish people. They demanded it upon the ground that she was repudiated by the nation as a nation, and therefore that her position as the so-called national Church was a falsehood and a sham. They demanded it upon the ground that the continuance of her supremacy in connection with the State was a sign of conquest—a reminiscence of oppression—a last remnant of that infamous system that used to glorify itself under the name of Protestant ascendancy. So long as by our superior force we maintained the supremacy of a Protestant Establishment over a Roman Catholic country we were treating the people of that country as a subject people. Let us cut that artificial—that arbitrary bond between the Church and State, and then, indeed, we should give all our Irish Roman Catholic brethren the proof which they had a right to require at our hands, that we regarded them as our equals, our fellow-citizens; that we renounced once and for evermore utterly the idea that formerly gave shape to England's policy towards them, and rendered it the scandal of the world—the idea of treating them as conquered aliens. And was there indeed anything so novel, so strange to our policy in taking such a step as this? Had we not, in Canada, in Australia, in our other colonies, laid down, with the consent of all parties, the principle, and carried it out to the extreme, that there should be no union between Church and State, where it would be opposed to the feeling of the nation? And how could there be anything irreligious, as some seemed to pretend, in abolishing that union? The Church herself might have something in her holy, something divine; but her political position, as a State Church, was wholly the creation of law. It was altogether determined by laws passed by fallible men—possibly, as in the case of Ireland, by men who were known to have been scoundrels—and there could be nothing profane in the repeal of these laws by later legislators. What Ireland really required at our hands was to do justice and mercy. He would fain say a word or two on the personal aspect of the question. Scarcely a single speaker in the whole six nights' debate had refrained from bitter attacks on his opponents; and he must acknowledge that some of the satire that had been heard had been of the most brilliant character. The speeches of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) and of his right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) especially had been exquisite specimens of sword play. But might we not say, Ohe! jam satis est? They were surely weary, or, at any rate, those persons, if such existed, who read their debates must be weary of these interminable vituperations. There was a homely, but sensible saying—" 'Tis an ill bird that fouls its own nest," and he confessed that he had too much esprit de corps, as a Member of that House, and too profound a reverence for Parliamentary self-government, not to perceive with keen regret that, in thus bandying Billingsgate against each other, they were lowering their self-respect, and were injuring at once the reputation of their public men and of Parliament itself. And these recriminations had not, in his opinion, even the poor merit of being true. As regarded, for example, the course taken with regard to the Irish Church by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, how could any man who looked at it not as an advocate, but as an impartial judge, deny for one moment that, in the debates on this topic in the last three years, the right hon. Gentleman and the Liberal party had shown in the plainest way that they were prepared to grapple boldly with the Irish Church as soon as the public mind should be ripe for action? Well, during the last year the Fenian insurrection arose. That woke the English nation from its lethargy; it deeply stirred the heart of this nation; it turned every thinking mind to the question whether, indeed, there did still remain any wrong, any grievance, in the treatment of Ireland by her sister kingdom. It was the almost unanimous reply of the English people that the State supremacy of the Protestant Church was in very truth an insult and an injury to the Roman Catholic people of Ireland. The demand for the reparation of that wrong—for the removal of that injustice—arose from one end to the other of the country. It would have been a dereliction of duty on the part of the right hon. Gentleman as the Leader of the Liberal party; it would have been a declaration of duty on the part of their representatives in this House; it would have shown a feebleness of purpose that certainly was no part of the character of the right hon. Gentleman, had he and they refused to respond to that great call; and he was sure that when the passions of the moment had sunk into rest, every man who was not blinded by partizanship would be ready to admit that the Liberal party had done right to lose not a day in assaulting the stronghold of that monster grievance. On the other hand, might he say one word that might, perhaps, be somewhat unpalatable to his friends on that side of the House? They had been deluged with floods of talk about the inconsistency of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he could not refrain from saying that he, for one, should feel it to be neither grateful nor generous to keep making those interminable taunts against those who had, as they (the Liberal party) believed, conferred a boon of inestimable value on the country. And, more, he was at a loss to conceive how any man who sought truth alone could find the least difficulty in placing himself in the position of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and understanding how men, even of the severest principle, and of the most stainless honour, could well have thought that it was a sacrifice demanded from them by patriotic duty to retire from the ground on which they had formerly made their stand, and avail themselves of the power that had passed into their hands to meet the overwhelming necessity of the time by effecting a settlement the least dangerous and the most lasting that could be devised of the question of Reform. Now, in his opening speech of this debate, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) quoted with regard to the Irish Church the superb lines of Hamlet—

"We do it wrong, being so majestic,
To offer it the show of violence;
For it is, as the air, invulnerable,
And our vain blows malicious mockery."

Now, it appeared to him that this question was one of no ordinary majesty, and that they did it wrong in making it a stalking horse for party vituperation. He was well aware that, in a party sense, it might seem to be in the highest degree imprudent to make any such admission; but he was not afraid to tell the truth, and the whole truth; and, as an individual independent of party considerations, he did not scruple to own his profound conviction that this debate was indeed a momentous epoch in the political career of this country. Depend upon it, they were standing by the meeting of the waters of two mighty streams of human thought. They were witnessing—though as yet in a narrow arena—they were witnessing, they were sharing in the victory of the still young but Herculean principle of religious equality over the principle, hoary with antiquity, crowned with the reverence of a thousand years, now truly in its decay, but fraught in its prime with unnumbered blessings—the principle of the union of Church and State. And if it were not presumptuous in one so humble as himself, he would fain appeal to the men of genius who sat on the right hand and on the left of that House to remember that, in the words of Shakespeare—

"Spirits are not finely touched,
But to fine issues."

and to consider, whether it was indeed worthy of them, in presence of so vast a conflict—should he say between truth and error—should he not rather say between the spirit of the days that were passing from them and the spirit of the days that were to come—whether it was worthy of them to turn aside from the height of that great argument to mean personalities and vindictive recriminations, which, were they false, and still more if they were deserved, must give unmingled pain to every patriotic bosom, to every generous and gentle mind?

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he was glad to see that the hon. Gentleman duly estimated the gravity of the subject; but he complained that there was no measure before the House by which the value of his arguments could be estimated. They had no measure before them upon which they were called upon to express an opinion. As far as the hon. Gentleman had given any grounds for any opinions which he was prepared to support, he (Mr. Adderley) could only trace them through a catalogue of pungent phrases used by men who found declamation easier than practical measures. What he (Mr. Adderley) complained of was this—that the House was now called upon, in the third debate on this subject, to vote upon a general abstraction, without any definite feature upon which the opinion of the House could fairly be taken: just the sort of general proposition which enabled a number of Gentlemen to vote together, who, if there was the slightest appearance of a plan carrying out that proposition, would be dispersed at once to the four winds of Heaven. The author of this Resolution carefully avoided the production of a plan; and when he had once fallen into the error of indicating any definite policy he had been warned by the murmurs around him that he had better avoid treading on dangerous ground. It was said that we had here a basis for legislation; but surely the House was entitled to ask for something like the outline of a measure, some proof that the author of the Resolution had a measure in his own mind upon the subject? We are asked to disestablish the Irish Church by a phrase coined for the purpose, and which the right hon. Gentleman had never attempted to define, and which no two Members would agree in defining. We are called upon to disendow the Irish Church without even a phrase, but merely by inference. There was to be a "due regard to existing interests," and it was reasonable to suppose that when salvage was provided a wreck was implied. He recalled to the recollection of the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), upon the Motion of the Hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) laid down this good rule. He said, on the subject of the Irish Church, that no Minister of the Crown, not even an expectant Minister, would be justified in dealing with so grave a subject unless he could, at least, satisfy the House that he was prepared with a measure. What indication of the sort had he given the Committee? The Resolution was a simple wish. It was a curse upon the Irish Church. Delenda est Ecclesia Hiberniæ. That was all that the majority of 60 had voted. They expressed no opinion upon any mode of effecting that desire, and would be dispersed to the winds at the apparition of any scheme for affecting it. That this anathema should be uttered was the extent of their agreement. It was a declamatory Resolution—a declaration by the Committee that, if it only knew how, it would get rid of the Irish Church Establishment. That seemed to him to militate against the rule which the right hon. Gentleman had laid down for himself, and it was not a decent way of treating one of the gravest subjects which could be thrown into the arena of debate. The right hon. Gentleman had trusted to the eager following of men of ulterior views below the gangway who were enemies to all Church Establishments. There were many honest men who took that view; but in this case, under cover of a vague Motion simply denouncing the Irish Church, the Leader had enlisted partizans of much further design. These were the men who have cheered him, who had been his private counsellors, and had enabled him to carry by so large a majority the first step towards their extreme views. If there was any doubt about the spirit of those who supported the Resolution it was only necessary to refer to the speeches which had been made. It was clear from these that the old champion of Church and State was at the head of a raid against Church Establishments wherever they exist. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) said that, much as he disliked this mode of dealing with the Irish Church, so much was he convinced that all Church Establishments were wrong, that he intended on that ground to support the Resolutions. Not only was the right hon. Gentleman supported by the enemies of Church Establishments in general, but he had himself expressed the belief that the Irish Church would be safer and stronger if it were an unendowed and purely voluntary Church; he had taunted the Government with inconsistency in opposing his Motion at the time it was proposing to disendow the West Indian Church. In the first place, the Government were not proposing to disendow the West Indian Church, but to remove its charge from the English Consolidated Fund, and to throw it, for its greater vigour, upon its own resources. [Opposition Cheers.] In explanation of that cheer he would say that the right

hon. Gentleman knew very well that he had supporters around him who intended to force on that proposition to the extent of appealing to the West Indian Government to disendow their own Churches. That proposition, he believed, was to be submitted to the House by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). If that had been the Government proposition Ministers might with justice have been charged with inconsistency, opposing and advocating the disendowment of Churches at the same time. But all the references of the right hon. Gentleman, throughout those debates, to the colonial Church clearly showed that his standard of a vigorous Church in its best condition, wherever it might be, was a Church stripped of all endowments, and with purely voluntary support. That might be the right view; but, whether it was so or not, the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, illustrated by these speeches and expressions, were clearly intended to strike a blow at all Establishments, and were in effect aimed at the English just as well as the Irish Establishment; and the eagerness of those who supported him was accounted for in their surprise and delight at having such good ground to work from at starting as the anomalous state of the Irish Church, and their extraordinary good fortune in being led by the late champion of Church and State. The last speaker seemed to uphold the colonial Church as the model for the Church at home; the right hon. Gentleman had shown by his cheers that he approved the sentiment, having begun by his attack upon the Irish Church, he would soon, no doubt, become as violent in opposition to the Established Church in the rest of the kingdom. The hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) had taken very much the same line; he had wasted a great deal of time in pointing out what every one knew, that the Church and the Church Establishment were two different things—that the Church was anterior to and independent of the Establishment and its connection with the State. That, no doubt, was perfectly true; but the statement had no relevancy here, except to point out more clearly that, however safe the Church might be, there was, no doubt, that the Resolutions were aimed at Church Establishments. That being the case, what became of the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that his Motion was not aimed at the English Church; and what was the statement of the right hon.

Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) worth, that no attack on the English Establishment could result from the disendowment of the Irish Establishment unless both Churches were in exactly the same position? It was true that the Irish Church was in an anomalous condition which did not attach to the English Church. There was no analogous disease; but the mode of treatment was infectious. No one disputed that fact. Hon. Members opposite had during this debate laboured under two entire delusions. They supposed they had been discussing a measure when they had really no measure before them; and they fancied themselves the only people who saw that a measure was required, whereas everybody had allowed that for years past. The difference between the Opposition and the Government was, not on any question whether there was an anomaly to deal with in the Irish Church, but in the practical and justifiable mode of dealing with it. The treatment proposed would not only shake the institutions of the sister country, but would very possibly render attacks on all our institutions more frequent and more powerful for evil. What needs a remedy is this—that in Ireland the national Church and the nation were not coincident, and that the provision for the religion of the country was unequally and unwisely distributed. That was no discovery; no one had disputed it. If wishes were remedies, then a Resolution that this anomaly should cease would suffice. Then, what was the proper remedy? The most natural would be either to bring the nation to the Church or the Church to the nation. An attempt to bring the nation to the Church might have been made at the time of the Reformation, and the neglect to do so had allowed circumstances and race to make it impossible to-day. The alternative suggestion to bring the Church to the nation by establishing and endowing the Roman Catholic Church was out of the question, because neither Parliament nor the country would permit it, and because the Roman Catholic Church would, so far from preserving the national Church, be less national and more alien than the present Establishment—it would be the Church of Rome in Ireland—and because the Roman Catholics themselves refused to be endowed. The right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lowe) likened the Churches in Ireland to Dives and Lazarus. The proposition was not because Lazarus refused to accept the riches of Dives, the rich man should be stripped, in order to equalize their condition. This is the idea of religious equality. Was such a request ever before made? Not even in the day of bitterest animosity between Roman Catholics and Protestants in Ireland had it been proposed to destroy the disputed Church property; this had been reserved for the right hon. Gentleman. The Roman Catholics shrank from the alienation or secularization of the property of the country which was dedicated to its religion and civilization. Was the right hon. Gentleman sure that the interests of religion and civilization could afford to lose this property? What would be said when applications were made to hon. Members to make good from their private purses this money, which it was proposed recklessly to divert to other purposes? The right hon. Gentleman thought he could trust to the private spirit and religious zeal of the country to supply the deficiency to be occasioned by the dispersion of that property. No doubt, a Free Church when so set up in the first instance in a country, as was the case in some of the colonies, would be capable of raising resources by the zeal of its congregations. A Church which was in rivalry with another, as in the case of the Free Kirk of Scotland, might be able to depend for its support upon the rivalry and emulation of private individuals; but a Church that would, under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman, deliberately throw to the winds the large provision which had been made for it, could scarcely expect to find people willing and ready to supply even for its most needful and beneficial purposes what had been so ruthlessly and recklessly thrown away. And the right hon. Gentleman had propounded no scheme for securing any provision for the Church; and hon. Gentlemen who were inclined to support his Resolutions should remember that, though the right hon. Gentleman had said that three-fifths of the property of the Church would, somehow or other, be saved, the right hon. Gentleman had hitherto failed to give a satisfactory explanation of that statement. There was not one Member in the Committee who could attach any rational meaning to that statement. As far as could be understood from his last explanation, it would appear as if he had capitalized the property of the Church, and had found that the life estates which he was going to save were in value three-fifths of the whole. But was that any consolation to the Church? It was just as much consolation as if he were to tell the tenants in tail of an estate he was about to confiscate that the lives in being before the estate was confiscated were equal to three-fifths of the fee-simple. But the right hon. Gentleman also proposed to give to the Church another boon, as arbitrary, as fatal—the retention of their churches and parsonages. But what advantage would that be to the Irish Church? If the right hon. Gentleman had his property destroyed and his estate confiscated, and Resolutions may come “that certain kinds of property should cease to exist,” what advantage would it be to him to have his country house left to him? It would only give him the appearance of possessing property, and would deprive him of any excuse for appealing for support on the score of destitution. Better be stript altogether than retain a share of property without the means of supporting it, or the alternative of an appeal to charity to other quarters. Not a hint had been given of the rest of the plan. There were two steps in an act of plunder—abstraction and appropriation. They had not any indication as to the second of these steps, unless they were to look upon the hint given to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), that an experiment might be tried in his socialist scheme of re-distributing land out of the plunder of the Church. Cromwell sequestrated a good deal of Irish Church property, and transferred the plunder to his Puritan soldiers; but the right hon. Gentleman improved on Cromwell’s plan, for he threw out indefinite hopes of plunder to be scrambled for among his followers. They were called upon to vote that the Irish Church Establishment should cease to exist; but they had not been, in the least degree, informed as to the mode in which the scheme was to be carried out. It appeared to be something like one of the South Sea bubbles of former days, after faith had ceased in all divulged propositions—a scheme was advertised to be stated after the lots were drawn. The followers of the right hon. Gentleman rejoiced in their double delusion; for they not only boasted of their measure on the Irish Church question, but they also thought that they were the only people who knew that any measure was needful, and what the anomalies were which ought to be redressed. That side of the House as much as the other acknowledged the evils that existed, and the necessity of such a re-distribution of the property of the Irish Church as would make it correspond to the demands of the nation. But they, on his side, proposed to wait for that information which all admitted to be necessary. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were the first to recognize the necessity for further information, and now they were as eager to rush on without it, so confessing their recklessness openly. To deal with so grave a subject without having either the necessary information or a measure in view betrayed the agitator and not the statesman. Indeed, he thought that the function of the Whig party was always to agitate, and not to produce measures. For many a year they had agitated the question of Parliamentary Reform; but, if the present Government had not come into office, would any Parliamentary Reform have been passed? Now, hon. Gentlemen opposite were vexed that the question, of which they claimed a monopoly, had been settled by their opponents, and they were eagerly trying to get up another rallying cry—a further dash at Reform—without waiting for the completion of that Reform for which they professed they were so desirous. The question of the Irish Church stood in the way of Parliamentary Reform, and of Education, and of all the important measures of the Session, merely that the party opposite might recover the lead in agitation which they had lost, and that they might be able to unfurl a fresh Reform flag round which their followers might rally. Everybody knew that no practical measure could follow these Resolutions, and that they were proposed for the sake of agitation only. With a small part—a very small part—of his scheme the right hon. Gentleman said he was prepared, and that was to stop the increase of vested interests in the Irish Church. Was the right hon. Gentleman certain that he could carry even that small part of his plan? If agreed to there, what chance was there of its passing the other House? Nothing could follow from these protracted debates, except mischief from premature and ineffectual agitation. When the right hon. Member for Stroud contrasted the policy of the two parties, he tried to depict us as obstructive, and his friends in the march of Reform. But the summing up of all his oratory on Irish Church Reform was that, “somehow or other,” it must be effected. The real contrast was between the one side rushing in, where the other feared to tread. The sense of responsibility, no doubt, made the difference, and if parties were transposed, Gentlemen opposite would wait for the Report of their own Commission, and for the preparation of some effective measure upon it, before flourishing the abstract cry that the difficulty should cease to exist. The Government should do their utmost that as little mischief as possible may follow this reckless agitation, and be ready, as soon as materials are available, to deal effectively with the question themselves.

Mr. PEASE said, he believed that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House were fully aware of the meaning and purport of these Resolutions. Among the many extraordinary arguments that had been put forward in defence of the Church Establishment in Ireland, none had astonished him more than that which fell from that very good Churchman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Gorst), when he declared that the Church of England held its place in the affections of the people because it was a democratic Church, in which rich and poor worshipped together. But the same argument applied with equal force to every other Christian body in this country. If he were advocating the claims of the Church of England, he should base them on such grounds as those stated by Hampden, who said on his death-bed, that he believed the doctrines of the Church of England were for the most part consonant with the words of Holy Scripture. He was very much surprised to hear it said that, on bringing forward this Resolution, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was acting in a manner inconsistent with his previous character; for though he was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had published a certain book many years ago, he had always understood, and the men of the North of England understood, that when the right hon. Gentleman was turned out of his seat for the University, it was not because he was unsound in regard to the English Church, but because he was considered unsound in regard to the Irish Church, and would reduce the franchise lower than was desired by his then constituents. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) had brought down an old well-thumbed copy of the book of the right hon. Gentleman, and quoted two or three passages; but the hon. Member forgot to remind that House that the book had been reviewed by a most eminent statesman—Lord Macaulay. At the close of that review there was a passage which he (Mr. Pease) begged to read to the House—

“ But if there were in any part of the world a national Church regarded as heretical by four-fifths of the nation committed to its care—a Church established and maintained by the sword—a Church producing twice as many riots as conversions—a Church which, though possessing great wealth and power, and though long backed by persecuting laws, had, in the course of many generations, been found unable to propagate its doctrines, and barely able to maintain its ground—a Church so odious that fraud and violence when used against its clear rights of property were generally regarded as fair play—a Church whose ministers were preaching to desolate walls, and with difficulty obtaining their lawful subsistence by the help of bayonets—such a Church on our principles could not, we must own, be defended. We should say that the State which allied itself with such a Church postponed the primary end of government to the secondary; and that the consequences had been such as any sagacious observer would have predicted. Neither the primary nor the secondary end is attained. The temporal and spiritual interests of the people suffer alike. The minds of men, instead of being drawn to the Church, are alienated from the State.”

The description of the Irish Church in that review held good to the present day. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) had spoken of the friendly feeling of the people of Ireland towards the clergymen of the Established Church; but was not every Englishman who visited Ireland struck by the fact that party spirit entered into everything there? It entered into the municipal elections, into the room of the Boards of Guardians, on to the County Bench, and the Grand Jury room. What was the cause of that? It was because the minority supported by the law were placed in an insulting position in respect of the majority who had not that support. That disintegrated the whole body of society, and instead of finding the judicial axe in Ireland supported by a band of rods firmly bound around it and giving strength to the grasp which held it and adding weight to its fall, it was surrounded by unloosened sticks; in fact, by faggots which blazed into fire and lit up into a blaze when the fire of the incendiary was applied to it. The Protestant Church in Ireland was not a missionary Church, and throughout the world the free Churches had ever been the missionary Churches. In the North of England the free Churches of the Methodists had long been the pioneers of missionary enterprise as compared with the Established Church, which did not, until late years—when urged by the House and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—become a missionary Church. If the Irish Church was planted as a missionary Church to support English influence it had signally failed. If it had been planted to draw the hearts of the Irish people to England it had failed. If it had been planted to take away the hearts of the Irish people from England and from the English people it had succeeded beyond all praise. There was now very little in Ireland that was different from England except this State Church; and as it caused Ireland to be a source of weakness to them instead of a source of strength, it was time for them to deal with it. It had been said that the feelings of all the Protestants of Ireland would be found with the Established Church in this matter; but he found that, at a large meeting in Belfast, that was not the case with the Presbyterians, and he believed that the Presbyterian ministers in synod assembled had pronounced against the injustice of maintaining the Established Church in Ireland. The Coronation Oath and the Act of Union had been several times referred to; but he would remind hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side that in 1833 the present Lord Derby introduced a measure which reduced the number of the Irish Bishops from twenty-two to ten. If it were competent to Parliament to touch one Bishop it might touch any one Bishop, and if any one then every Bishop on the Bench; and if it could touch one of the Bishops it could touch every clergyman of the Established Church in Ireland. There was, therefore, ample precedent for the step before the House. The question had been long a cause of difficulty, and the Resolution before them would enable them to get rid of the difficulty in a satisfactory way. The loyalty of the people of Ireland would be much strengthened by this measure. Feeling that by these Resolutions, if carried, private interests would be preserved, and that they will create peace and harmony, he should cheerfully follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire into the Lobby.

VISCOUNT ROYSTON said, that in addressing the Committee upon this important question, he trusted they would treat him with leniency, considering that he had only once before trespassed upon their attention. Upon so important a question as that before them, he thought the fullest opportunity ought to be afforded to the representatives of the various classes and interests in that House of expressing their own opinions, as well as those of their respective constituencies. From the first moment of the broaching of this proposition by the right hon. Gentleman, he (Viscount Royston) had endeavoured to make himself fully acquainted with all its bearings. He confessed he could not concur with the charges made against the right hon. Gentleman of inconsistency in this matter, nor could he share in the astonishment which they said they felt at the course which he had adopted. Because the very first time he (Viscount Royston) had attempted to address his constituency—a few years ago—he stated in reference to this question that if the Church in Ireland were ever to be seriously attacked, he believed that the right hon. Gentleman opposite would be the man who would be found to submit the proposition to the House of Commons. He was, therefore, not by any means astonished that the right hon. Gentleman should think it right and proper to propose a Resolution for the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland. The Government were now in a somewhat critical condition. But after the efforts which they had made last year to carry out a measure which they believed to be desired by the country, he thought that they deserved a little more gratitude than had been shown them on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was the man for the hour. Now, in respect to the man, he admitted that no one could be better fitted than the right hon. Gentleman to propose a question of this kind. As to the hour, the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme pressed that the only plea the Government could urge against the adoption of the Resolutions was that the time was ill chosen. As regarded the disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Government contended that, even admitting that some improvement in the position of that Church was necessary, the present was not the time for considering so great a measure. The time, however, he believed would come—whether in this or the next Session he knew not; that depended very much upon the conduct of hon. Members opposite—when this question must assume the form of an appeal to the country at large, with the view of ascertaining the opinions of the public generally upon it. He spoke advisedly when he said he believed that there was a strong and growing feeling throughout the United Kingdom in regard to the Irish Church. To any person not biassed by other convictions, he frankly admitted that the Irish Church and its Establishment must appear to be a great and gross anomaly. He believed that the hon. Member for South Durham was a true Christian. Whilst differing from him as to some of his views, he (Viscount Royston), as a Churchman and an ardent supporter of the national faith, believed that the Established Church was a great benefit as regarded the general government of the country. He thought, then, that the best thing that could be done was to maintain the old principle of endowment; and thus enable the clergy to support their social position with that respectability becoming their calling, and to discharge their sacred duties with that zeal and ability which had ever characterized the ministers of the Protestant Church. He did not think it at all fair to make this a party question. He did not think it was a party question. It was one involving deep religious feelings, and therefore, being so, it was not fair for hon. Gentlemen opposite to come down to that House for the purpose of bearing hardly upon the Government, whom they knew were in a minority. They came, as it were, holding a pistol at the heads of the Church party, and saying that they must, at the present moment, take up the question of the Church Establishment in Ireland, without permitting them to submit to the country the force and wisdom of their policy. What the upshot of all this was to be he, of course, could not tell. As to the future, if this proposition was ever carried, he had no doubt that the feelings of the country would go with the right hon. Gentleman; because he did not believe upon such a grave question it would be possible for any Minister, whoever he might be, to pass a measure like this without the concurrence of the public at large. What he meant to say was this—that a measure which touched so acutely the religious feelings of Englishmen could only be carried by the general concurrence of the nation. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman opposite was determined to pursue that policy which he had indicated by his Resolutions, and if there should be an adverse vote—and he (Viscount Royston) sincerely hoped a division would be taken that night—then he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would condescend to inform them what course he would take in regard to the Bill which he supposed would follow. In 1799, on the occasion of the Message from the King in regard to the state of Ireland, Mr. Pitt said he was not content that that country should have

certain benefits as a part of the British Empire; but he proposed that Ireland should partake of all those blessings which England enjoyed. It would be admitted that it was a great blessing to England to have an Established Church. If they wished, then, in Ireland to legislate for the general benefit of the country as united to England, it was a wrong and false proposition to say that it was necessary to have separate legislation as regarded the Church in that country because the bulk of the population did not profess the faith of such Church. They were all trying, though not as yet with much success, to legislate for the benefit of Ireland. He did not think that the disestablishment of the Church in that country would tend to the advantage of Ireland. The very fact of the members of that Church being in a minority in Ireland was, in his judgment, a strong and sound reason for its maintenance. What was the state of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland? Its endowments in 1755 were valued at £68,514 annually, whereas now they amounted to £190,000 a year. He had been recently in Scotland, and had mixed in a society there in which, politically speaking, he ought not to have been found; but from the inquiries he had made, he was satisfied that the State Church of Scotland was the result of a wise and efficient measure. He could understand the feelings of the Roman Catholics towards the Established Church in Ireland; but for the life of him he could not understand how it could be argued that the panacea for all the suffering and discontent of the people of Ireland was the disendowment of the Protestant Church. He, for one, was unwilling to taunt the right hon. Gentleman opposite with the change of his political opinions. Public men changed their opinions sometimes when they felt that they had good reasons for doing so. He did not think that the interests of the country could be damaged by such changes. He looked forward to some years as a Member of that House, and expected to learn wisdom as well as experience from the utterances of great and learned men. He should, therefore, be sorry to bind himself down for ever to certain opinions. For example, some twenty years hence he might be exposed to the remark of a person saying that though he had formerly advocated the continuance of the Church in Ireland, with its establishment and endowments, he was then expressing the opinion that the same Church should be disestablished and disallowed. He could readily imagine that at least twenty-five years would elapse before they saw the Established Church in Ireland done away with. That, at all events, was some consolation for those who thought as he did. There was nothing so likely to give solidity to a great act as great thought. He believed that this question was now only about to be thought about. He believed—nay, he knew—that amongst the Conservatives of the country this question had not been sufficiently thought about. It was a somewhat new question, which had never before been brought into the House of Commons in the manner in which it was then submitted to their consideration by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire, and had never until then been fostered by the cry of men of such distinguished ability as he saw before him. The right hon. Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire held a great position in the country, and consequently everything emanating from him deserved the gravest consideration. Under this aspect they were bound to view this all-absorbing question. How, then, were they to account for the extraordinary apathy which existed amongst the friends and supporters of the Church Establishment? The right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions were supported by large meetings in various parts of the country. They were told that crowded meetings had been held at the Tabernacle of Mr. Spurgeon and at different halls in the kingdom. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was no doubt supported by demagogues and all those who lived by spouting from platforms; but he denied that those meetings represented the opinions of the general population on this subject. He did not not believe that the course of legislation upon this subject could be so rapid as to force them to swallow the bitter pill prepared for them by the right hon. Gentleman opposite before they were able to judge of its effects. It appeared to him that the sooner the question was submitted to the judgment of the public the better, and it was only fair and just that every facility should be given for ascertaining the opinion of the people of the United Kingdom upon this grave and momentous subject. He thought it right that the House of Commons should raise obstacles to the passing of Resolutions such as those before the House. He would say, "Pause in your rapid legislation." The Resolutions were placed on the table at a time when the Government were engaged with Reform Bills and other important measures. Did hon. Gentlemen opposite want to have a hand, after all, in the Reform question? Did they want to settle the Boundary Bill? Did they want to be in power at that critical moment when the dissolution came? He did not join in the accusation that had been so often thrown in their teeth—that they merely wished to displace the present Government. That was a sort of low "chaff" which was unworthy of the House. Last night a right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Horsman) addressed the House at great length; but did he adduce any argument to show the advantage of disendowment? No, he did nothing but make a personal attack upon the Government. He really must quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman for the language he used. Positively he spent an hour and a half in simply trying to irritate the charming good temper of his excellent Friend the Secretary of State for Home affairs. He (Viscount Royston) naturally looked up to Members of such eminence for lessons in Parliamentary decorum; but he was astonished at the language which was used to some extent, he must admit, on both sides of the House, but chiefly on that of the Opposition. The Government were told, forsooth, that they were courting defeat. Well, what else could they do, when they had taken Office with a minority of 60? And yet, by the extraordinary tact, wisdom, and good-nature of the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister, the country had been benefited by a Reform Bill. [Laughter.] That laugh explains more fully than words the feeling of hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the Reform Bill. What was it that the Opposition wanted? He could tell them. They wanted the Conservatives to do their dirty work for them. The Government had carried a measure which the Opposition believed would be a benefit to the country. It was said, indeed, that they had done it only from an interested motive; but such an imputation could only proceed from a mind that he should be sorry to have in his body. The Government had been defeated once, and no doubt would be defeated again. If, however, the House wanted to get rid of them, why not propose a Resolution stating that it had not the smallest confidence in them? That was what the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) said in his Tabernacle speech. He said, "The Government are not worth having—turn them out." Well, turn them out. For his own part, he was not certain that if they were turned out they would not be in a better position. [Laughter.] This question is too grave to be treated by laughter or jest. If they held the Irish Church to be rubbish, it was useless to think of keeping up Church Establishments in England and in Scotland. The Churches might not suffer from the disendowment, but the State might. He said, "Remove anomalies." He said, "Educate freely." But let them not educate with any missionary object—he hated the word missionary. Why take away the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum? He never heard a word against the Church as a spiritual body; and by passing the Resolutions the House would be throwing itself into an abyss, the bottom of which they probably might never reach. [Laughter.] That is perfectly possible—because it may be an abyss so deep, that death might come before the bottom be reached. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman will be content with simply establishing the principle of disendowment this year; for he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman has mercenary views; and those absurd, vague charges made against him by infatuated writers, in even more infatuated portions of the Press—had no foundation. It is likely that, on this question, the Government will again be in a minority; but is that to be accepted as an ignominious defeat? If it means that—he was speaking without knowing what course would be pursued by the Government, and supposed he should not commit himself—but if it means that, we should naturally say, "The only chance we can have as a party is to go to the constituencies." Nothing would give him greater pleasure than to go to his constituents—although certainly his last visit was not quite so pleasant or so cordial as one naturally expects. But he knew what the feeling of his constituents was on this subject, and, in fact, nothing but the pressure of his constituents would have made him speak before the Committee to-night. [Laughter.] The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) seems to be excessively jocular to night. No doubt he is going to occupy the attention of the Committee—and he is always excessively instructive and amusing when he delivers those learned sentences which he knows so well how to command; but he (Viscount Royston) did not see that he had not quite as much right to trouble the Committee as the hon. and learned Gentleman. In this country our Government, our legislation, our constituencies, our Church were all made up of anomalies. Lord Macaulay said that from the pole to the equator such an anomaly as the Irish Church did not exist. But although, as he (Viscount Royston) admitted, the Irish Church was an anomaly, that was no reason why we should do away with it. He said, "Treat the people of Ireland as they treated the people of England and of Scotland," and by such a policy they would promote the interest of good government.

Mr. BAGWELL said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who commenced the debate (Colonel Barttelot) had spoken of himself as having been much in Ireland; but if he had not the fullest reliance on what proceeded from him he should be apt to suppose that his statement was a romance, since the account given by the hon. and gallant Gentleman was so utterly unlike the reality. He (Mr. Bagwell) congratulated the noble Lord (Viscount Royston) on introducing, if not much novelty into the debate, at least a very novel mode of stating things to the House. When tithes were paid in kind, and murders and riots and all kinds of positive conditions of disorganization prevailed, the universal opinion of the people of Ireland was that it was unjust to the people. At this advanced period of the debate it would be very hard to say anything new. Still, he hoped he might be able to say something that might be true. Had any Gentleman on either side of the House ventured to say that if he were establishing a new state of things in Ireland he would establish the Irish Church as it at present existed? No one had ventured to say it, or to write it, aye, or to think it. The great argument in favour of the Irish Church was that it had existed for 300 years. But this was at the same time its strongest condemnation. Tipperary 200 years ago was denuded of its native population, which was entirely Protestant; and in the old leases there was a penalty of five times the rent if any house was inhabited by Papists. He had hundreds of such leases which had once been granted on his estate. Yet what was the case now? Tipperary was the most Catholic part of Ireland, the seat of a cathedral and of a monastic institution. And yet they were told that the Irish Church had spread Protestantism. He spoke as a Protestant when he said that he took issue on that point. It was true that he represented a Catholic constituency ; but they thought no worse of him for being a Protestant. The time had arrived when Protestants must look the question in the face. If the Protestants of Ireland wished to preserve their form of religion, they must do by themselves what the State had hitherto done for them to their detriment ; and he believed that, when placed on an equality with their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, they would be found equally zealous with them in supporting their own religion ; and there would be an end to the acerbity which now existed, and which arose out of the Protestant ascendancy. The only objection he had to the Resolution before the Committee was that it was not the Preamble of a Bill. As the Protestants of Ireland had fully made up their minds to the disendowment and disestablishment of their Church ["No!"]—as they had made up their minds to that which was inevitable—the change would be brought into complete operation soon, so that the system might not be left to die out by slow degrees, as it were by a process of inanition occupying perhaps seventy years. That was a position to which they ought not to be subjected. A plan should be introduced at once, placing them immediately under the voluntary system. Let the members of the Irish Church put their hands in their pockets on behalf of their worship ; let them get rid of the feeling of superiority they entertained towards Dissenters, and work together with them for the Protestant cause ; and he firmly believed that Protestantism in Ireland would prosper. He trusted there would be no attempt to continue small and paltry endowments. The £40,000 annually granted by the State to the Presbyterians was really prejudicial to their religion ; and a Presbyterian minister had told him that the miserable sum of £59 which he received from the Government was a far greater injury to him, even in a pecuniary point of view, than many people could suppose. He thought, however, that the churches—the vast majority of which had been built within the last 100 years, and which were essentially proper places for Protestant worship, being small and otherwise unfit for the use of the Roman Catholics—ought to be left in the hands of the present possessors, as long as they were able to keep them in repair. It would be a great outrage, and it would produce much ill-blood in Ireland, to transfer those buildings to any other body whatever ; and the same remark would apply to the parsonage houses. He did not believe that any portion of the Irish people wished to deprive the Protestants of their churches and houses. What was really required was, perfect equality in religious matters ; and let the Protestants show, by devotion, morality, and loyalty, that they were determined to maintain their position in Ireland ; while at the same time a grievance was removed which had embittered the feelings of the great mass of the people for centuries.

MR. VANCE said, that he had been lately in Ireland, and had studied the current of popular feeling ; and he believed that, though the Roman Catholics would vote for the disestablishment of the Protestant Church, they were really very indifferent as to such a measure, unless it were the pioneer to fixity of tenure and a repeal of the Union. The Protestant population naturally felt aggrieved at the House having taken so hasty a step without awaiting the result of the important inquiry which was now going on. The numerous meetings against disestablishment that had taken place in Ireland were a proof of the dislike entertained for the proposal by the Protestants. The effect of disestablishment and disendowment would be to place the Protestant Church in a position not of equality with the Roman Catholic Church, but of inferiority to it ; for the patronage was now directly or indirectly vested in the Crown, and its supremacy secured uniformity of doctrine and ritual ; whereas if this measure passed there would be nothing to prevent the clergy from drifting into ritualistic or other extremes. The Roman Catholic Church, on the contrary, had a central authority at Rome. The Protestant clergy—2,200 in number, with an average income of £175—were necessarily resident, and formed an invaluable link between the yeomanry and the landowners, the withdrawal of which would greatly intensify the evils of absenteeism. The Protestant population, moreover of the South and West would be unable, scattered as they were, to maintain the fabrics, or support their clergy in a becoming manner. The churches, indeed, had already been claimed for the Roman Catholics by The Freeman's Journal, though some of them had lately been restored or erected by private munificence on the faith of the endowments being retained. As to the Regium Donum, Lord Dufferin had undertaken to pay out of his own pocket the quota received by ministers on his estates; but the Presbyterians were too independent and magnanimous to be pensioners on the landlords and thus to barter their independence. It would be only just and reasonable to double the present grant from the State, trusting to their congregations for the remainder of their stipends; but if State aid were withdrawn, they would wish to rely altogether on the voluntary principle. He denied that Ireland was at present a Roman Catholic country; for, though the majority of the peasants and small farmers were of that faith, this was not the case with other classes; but it would become so if a Bill founded on these Resolutions was passed. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire ought to have given a more definite outline of his plan; but since one section of his supporters favoured a certain amount of endowments, while another section insisted on the voluntary principle, he doubts if it was possible to satisfy both of them. Sons of the first families and some of the most intellectual men in the country now belonged to the Protestant Church, and, through their refinement and unostentatious piety, exercised a most beneficial influence; but he feared that disestablishment would lead to an inferior class of clergy, who, altogether dependent on eleemosynary support, would be obliged to conform to the caprices of their congregations. It could not for a moment be supposed that they could disestablish the Church in Ireland without touching the Churches in England and Scotland. At an influential meeting of Nonconformists at Liverpool it was resolved, if these Resolutions succeeded, to agitate to abolish the Established Church in Wales; and the Nonconformist newspaper said, that the Irish Church question would not be finally disposed of before the public mind would be prepared to entertain proposals with respect to the Scotch Kirk and the Church of England. In the South of Ireland there was a proverb which was as old as the time of the Spanish Armada, and which was in these words—"England's weakness is Ireland's opportunity." In other parts it was couched in this form—

"He who would England win
With Ireland must begin,"

If they disestablished the Church in Ireland they must soon act in England on the principle of leaving all religions to voluntary support. No doubt Parliament was omnipotent. It could break contracts and could violate the rights of property; but there was always a Nemesis for such wrongs. They might begin by sacrificing ecclesiastical property; but they would continue by plundering corporations and trustees, and in the end they would interfere with individual rights. The present vague Resolutions would not avail those who supported them; but if they should pass a Bill carrying them into effect, then he had no hesitation in saying that private property would no longer be secure.

MR. DENMAN: Sir, I am not one of those who, like the noble Lord the Member for Cambridgeshire (Viscount Royston) are "just beginning to think" about the Irish Church. Some thirty years ago I was induced to think of it by hearing its total condemnation from the lips of one from whom all my most cherished political convictions were derived. I soon came to the conclusion, on inquiry and inspection, that the Established Church in Ireland was an institution which ought to have ceased to exist many years ago. The grounds of this conviction were, and are, deep and solid. With me it is no matter of detail. I firmly and sincerely believe that to keep up that Establishment under the circumstances existing in Ireland is a violation of the first principles of justice; that it is a departure from the great commandment of Christianity, which bids us to do to others as we would be done by; that it is a cause of weakness and not of strength to Protestantism, and a stumbling-block in the path of evangelization. This, Sir, being my severe conviction, I own my regret that the arguments which have been brought forward in its favour, and some of those for its disestablishment, instead of being based upon considerations of right, justice, or expediency, have been mainly composed of criminations and recriminations handed about from side to side of the House. Perhaps, Sir, so far as the arguments of our opponents were concerned this was inevitable; for it is indeed difficult to understand how anyone, except under the influence of an intellect obfuscated by the mists of party spirit, can stand up in this House, at this time of day, and assert that the Irish Church as a State-endowed Establishment ought any longer to be maintained. Sir, I cannot boast of that ignorance of Ireland so candidly confessed by the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners). I have travelled and visited to some extent on more than one occasion in Ireland. More than twenty years ago, judging from the evidence of my own senses, I came to the conclusion that it was an incubus upon the Irish people. Am I then, Sir, to be blamed if, when the greatest statesman of his day boldly and honestly comes forward to do that which ought to have been done long ago—am I to be deterred by taunts and recriminations from giving him my hearty support? You ask why, if this question is so important, the party to which I belong has not dealt with it long ago? But you know full well that vested interests, and ignorance and prejudice, and a love of showing the power of your domination, have been too strong for the boldest statesman to grapple with. You know that by these agencies the question has been hopelessly shelved for more than thirty years. Now, at length, the time has happily come when it can be dealt with upon its merits, and according to its merits it shall be dealt with by me. Sir, I maintain that the maintenance of an Established Church consisting of a small minority of the people of Ireland, against the wishes and in spite of the feelings of the majority, is entirely indefensible in principle and pernicious in practice. I might content myself with quoting the words of the noble Lord the Member for Cambridgeshire to-night, who said that, "To an unbiassed mind the Irish Church would appear to be a grave and gross anomaly." But, Sir, I prefer to quote a witness of still greater weight. What said Sir Robert Peel as long ago as 1813? On Mr. Grattan's moving the second reading of a Bill for removing the civil and military disqualifications under which his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects laboured, Mr. Peel said this—

"When Parliament had declared that there was no reason why one religion should have any preference over the other, was it to be supposed that the Catholics of Ireland would consent willingly to maintain the clergy of a religion not professed by more than one-fifth of the inhabitants of that country? How could they—when it was admitted that there were 4,000,000 of Catholics and only 800,000 Protestants—hope to maintain the Protestant ascendancy?"—[1 Hansard, xxvi. 168.]

No doubt Sir Robert Peel was all for maintaining the Protestant ascendancy; but it is clear that he felt that the Established Church could only be maintained as part of that ascendancy, and that it would become entirely indefensible as soon as we should admit our Catholic brethren to a like citizenship with ourselves. But the evidence of Sir Robert Peel does not stop here. Again, in 1817, Mr. Grattan made a Motion on the subject of the Roman Catholic claims. Again Sir Robert Peel

(then Mr. Peel) made a long and eloquent speech; and now hear his view of the justice of the Irish Establishment. The extract is somewhat long; but it is so pertinent that the House will permit me to read it. Mr. Peel said—

"You propose to open to the Catholics Parliament, and to invest them with political power; to make them capable of acting in the highest offices of the State, and of being the responsible advisers of the Crown."—[1 Hansard, xxvi. 418.]

And after speaking of their progress in wealth and education, he proceeds—

"Do you then mean bona fide to give them in Ireland the practical advantages of the eligibility you propose to confer upon them?"

Yes, Sir, he speaks of what follows as the "practical advantages" of emancipation, and immediately goes on to treat, as one of the greatest of those advantages, emancipation from the grievance of the Protestant Established Church. He continues—

"If you do, can you believe that they (the Catholics) will or can remain contented with the limits you assign to them? Do you think that when they constitute, as they must do—not this year or the next, but in the natural and therefore certain order of things—by far the most powerful body in Ireland—the body most controlling and directing the government of it, do you think, I say, that they will view with satisfaction the state of your Church or their own? Do you think that, if they are constituted like other men, if they have organs, senses, affections, passions like yourselves—if they are, as no doubt they are, sincere and zealous professors of that religious faith to which they belong; if they believe your 'intrusive Church' to have usurped the temporalities which it possesses, do you think that they will not aspire to the re-establishment of their own Church in all its ancient splendour? Is it not natural that they should? If I argue even from my own feelings, if I place myself in their situation, I answer that it is natural."

Happily, Sir, there is no question now of the re-establishment of the Roman Catholic Church, but in all other respects this opinion of Mr. Peel must be admitted to be sound and true. Well, Sir, again in 1823 in a debate on the Irish Insurrection Act, I find Sir Robert Peel saying—

"If the Protestant religion was to be maintained in Ireland as the religion of the State, then Catholic emancipation would not be the basis of tranquillity."—[2 Hansard, ix. 236.]

And why, Sir? Obviously because he knew that the Irish are men constituted like other men, that they have organs, senses, affections, and passions like ourselves, and being so constituted, it would be impossible for them to submit without murmur to so monstrous an anomaly as the State-endowed and Established Church of a minority consisting of an eighth part of the nation. Sir, I think I have proved that this Church of Ireland is not founded upon justice. I think I have made out that it is a violation of the great rule of Christian charity. Let me further show that it is not founded on expediency. Again I will call Sir Robert Peel as my witness. Catholic emancipation having been carried in 1829, what said Sir Robert Peel of the Irish Church in 1833? See the testimony he bore to its success! On May 6th in that year, in opposing the second reading of the Church Temporalities Act, he said, "He wanted to see the spreading of the Reformation in Ireland, which he feared as yet had scarcely commenced." Yes, Sir! "scarcely commenced" after—nay, was it not in consequence of—the three centuries of existence of this unwarrantable State Church making Protestantism hateful in the eyes of the people? And since 1833 this Church has made no progress whatever. There is no case for it—no want of it. How many of its churches are mere chapels for some great lord or squire and his servants, who might well be accommodated in the hall or dining rooms of the great man's house? How many of the members of this Church are among the residents of a few great towns? How many of the whole number of our Protestants of Ireland are members of other denominations to whom an Episcopal church is as odious as a Protestant church is to the Catholics? A Church bolstered up with mere money and odious to the great bulk of the population cannot, by the very conditions of its nature, be a missionary Church. I believe, Sir, that far more progress has been made in the evangelization of Ireland by a few clergy lately sent over from this country by voluntary associations, than has ever been effected by the Established Church since the Reformation. So much for the argument that it is a missionary Church. Then, Sir, we are told that this is but a sentimental grievance. Now I look upon this as a cruel and heartless argument. Is a grievance less real because it is sentimental? A gross and malicious libel, social persecution and ostracism are sentimental grievances—but they are as intolerable and may be more unfeeling and unchristian than a blow or any other similar wrong. Some excellent people think that there is something like a treaty in force which we should violate by disestablishing the Irish Church. Sir, there is no treaty but an Act of Parliament passed at a time when the Catholics of England and Ireland were excluded from the Legislature, and there can be no Act of Parliament—as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Karslake) candidly and properly admits—which is not open to repeal. The same is also admitted of the Coronation Oath by him, and by every statesman or lawyer who has ever deeply considered the subject. My hon. Colleague (Mr. Walrond) told us the other night that he would rather adopt the "Pantheistic" system, as it has been called, of the Government than the "atheistic" system proposed by these Resolutions. These are fine words, Sir, but I cannot for the life of me see how it is "atheistic" to resolve that the Church of a minority of the nation is to be no longer endowed or favoured by the State. My hon. Colleague has certainly shown that he knows the difference between "Pan" and "A" and that he understands the force of the alpha privativa which we used to study in our Greek grammar; but his argument seems to me to come to nothing. You do not make a thing "atheistic" by calling it by that name. So far as the "Pantheistic" system has been described in this debate, it appears to me to be one which will meet with no support. In my judgment that which my hon. Colleague calls an "atheistic" measure will give Protestantism a better chance in Ireland than it has ever yet enjoyed. Such are some of the objections made to the passing of this Resolution. There are others in the nature of mere excuses and dilatory pleas. One hon. and gallant Gentleman to-night said that we only proceed with this measure because it is a "popular cry." Sir, it is a popular cry. But why? Because it is one founded on truth and justice, and therefore I heartily hope it may prevail. What matters it to me whether the cry be popular or unpopular? I am here to do my duty, and if a Resolution is founded on high and noble principles, am I to refrain from voting for them by considerations like these? Am I not rather to rejoice that at length I have so good an opportunity of doing that which I believe to be just and good. One more word, Sir. As an attached member of the Church of England I must protest against one main argument of Gentlemen opposite. I rejoice to say they do not all use it, but almost without exception those of them who sit on the Treasury Bench—those Gentlemen who set themselves up as the champions of the Church of England—use this argument. They say, "Do not disestablish the Irish Church, for if you do, down goes the English Church also." Now, Sir, I assert that those who use this argument are the worst traitors to that Establishment which they profess to defend. In order to gain a party object they do not scruple to furnish future arguments for the Liberation Society—a society to which I do not belong, and with which I do not agree. Sir, I repudiate this argument. I think it is reckless and unsound. I believe that the Church of England and the Church of Ireland—or the Church of England in Ireland, if you please to call it so—it is a mere name—stand on totally different foundations. The one is what I have described—the sooner it is abolished the better; the other, with all its faults—and I do not deny that it has faults—is strong in the affections of her people—supported by a majority of the nation—a great and beneficent institution which—when the Church in Ireland is disestablished—will, I hope and believe, flourish among us for many and many a year.

COLONEL HOGG said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the House had described himself as a friend of the Established Church and a friend of the Protestant religion. All he could say was “Save me from having friends.” The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that the Irish Church was a violation of the principles of Christianity, that it was absurd, that it was wretched, and he likewise informed them that what he meant by disestablishment was destruction. At one dash the hon. and learned Gentleman took off 200,000 of the Protestant inhabitants of Ireland and then talked of the remainder. He had treated the House to a disquisition on Greek grammar and the repeal of the Union. He could not argue about Greek grammar, and the repeal of the Union was not before the House. He had in vain waited to hear a case made out for the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. On the previous evening he had expected to hear a good argument for the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland from the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue); but having listened to that hon. Gentleman, with the attention and pleasure which his speeches always gave rise to, he had heard nothing from him but what he must call a wild cry for justice. One might have supposed that the hon. Member came from some land of slaves and not from a country which possessed the same laws as those enjoyed by England. They were told that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a step to conciliation, but the House had a right to ask how many of those steps to conciliation would they be required to take. He was one of those who regarded it as a great misfortune that questions like this should be brought forward in the manner it had been without due inquiry, not upon its merits, but to suit the exigencies of party strife, and for the purpose of uniting the disintegrated fragments of the Liberal party. He regarded as an unhallowed act the attempt which was being made to sever from religious purposes that which had so long been devoted to religion. It had been said that the Irish Church could not be defended on its merits. He was of a different opinion, and was quite prepared to prove she had fulfilled her mission, and could be defended on her merits. To the assertion that the Irish Church was imperfect he would reply there was no earthly institution without blot or stain. The Irish Church was the National Church. It was an integral part of the United Church of England and Ireland. If they destroyed it, were they prepared to set up in its stead a Church acknowledging a foreign potentate as its head? If the Irish Church is once destroyed attacks will be speedily made on the Church in Wales and England, and preparations are now being made for this purpose. As regards the manner the Irish clergy fulfil their duties, their enemies allow that they are zealous and hardworking, beloved by their own flocks, and respected by those of a different faith. The two Churches could exist in harmony were it not for ecclesiastical as well as political fire-brands, who will not allow their fellow-subjects to live in peace and quietness, worshipping God according to the dictates of their conscience. The property of the Irish Church is two-fold, tithe and glebe lands, and her rights to these are founded on 300 years uninterrupted possession, allowed valid by Roman Catholics themselves, and confirmed by the Act of Union, the Act of Emancipation, and by declarations and oaths of the most sacred character. The tithes amount to about £400,000 a year, of which £356,000 was paid by the Protestants, and £45,000 by Roman Catholic landowners; to the latter the payment of this sum can be no grievance, for it is a rent charge to which the land has always been subject, besides, they receive full compensation by the grant to Maynooth. As regards glebe lands three-fourths are situated in Armagh, and were granted to the Irish Church in the 17th century. The peasantry of Ireland did not feel that the Irish Church was any grievance, and if that Church were disendowed to-morrow not one of them would be a whit the better for the change; on the contrary, they would lose many kind friends and considerate neighbours. If there was no necessity for further inquiry with regard to the Irish Church, why had Earl Russell applied for a Commission to inquire into the subject? The proposal to disestablish the Irish Church was brought forward not for the purpose of benefiting that country, but to meet the exigencies of a disunited party. The friends of that Church were willing and even anxious to remedy all its abuses and to adapt it to the spirit of the age, whereas hon. Members on the opposite side of the House desire, not its reform, but its absolute destruction. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire professed to deal with the question in a moderate manner, and no doubt he was quite sincere; but when he advocated that moderation, there was an ominous silence on the Benches below the Gangway. The fear is that he who has been impelled to forsake the cherished convictions of his youth, as well as the opinions of his maturer years, may be propelled to make further sacrifices on Radical altars. The Resolutions before the House would unsettle everything and would settle nothing; and if they were carried the result would be that sees would be left without Bishops, flocks without pastors, the Church would be pulled down without anything being raised in its stead, while there would be a general scramble for its revenues. Was it for such a purpose as this that men like Primates Boulter and Robinson, and many others, left large sums to the Protestant Establishment? Was it for this that in the last ten years private individuals had paid £101,000 for building churches, besides spending large sums on the cathedrals of Armagh, Kilmenny, Tuam, Cork, and Dublin? The Roman Catholics disclaimed an intention to touch any portion of those revenues; but there was great discrepancy between the promises, the pledges, and the oaths made by those who led the Roman Catholic party forty years ago and the proceedings of the present day. Sir Robert Peel—whose authority the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would acknowledge—speaking on the subject of the Irish Church, said—the Established Church in England. If you wish to deal with the endowments of the Irish Church you must enter into a wider field and deal with all the endowments given by the State."

The Duke of Wellington said—

"I entreat you to listen to none of these petitions or speeches which tend to the injury or the destruction of the Church in Ireland. Do what may be necessary; do what it may be proper to do in order to render that Church more beneficial to the people of that country; but I entreat you to adhere strictly, in spirit, and according to the letter to the compact you have made, and not permit it to be supposed in any quarter whatever that you entertain the most distant intention of departing, in the slightest degree, from that arrangement."—[3 Hansard, lxxiii. 1171.]

With such authorities as those to which he had referred to support him, he could not be wrong in asking the House to pause before entering into a reckless career, which must involve the well-being and the stability of this country. In conclusion, he could only add he should feel it his duty on all occasions to vote against the Resolutions, believing them to be inopportune as to time, unjust in their proposals, and certain to prove a brand of discord, instead of a message of peace, to our sister isle. If unhappily they should be passed he believed they would sow the seeds of enmity and ill-will, the bitter fruits of which would be reaped in sorrow by generations yet unborn.

The MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON:

The speeches to which we have listened this evening have, perhaps, touched more nearly the points before the Committee and the Resolutions of my right hon. Friend than those more amusing and exciting speeches which were addressed to us towards the close of last night's debate. Still, the criticisms passed to-night upon the Resolutions did not appear to me to be more relevant to the real question at issue than were the personal discussions of last night. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Adderley) inveighed at great length against the vagueness and indefiniteness of the Resolutions. Is that the ground on which the Members from Ireland oppose the Resolutions? If you tell me that if we will only make the Resolutions definite—if we will only inform the House in what manner and degree we propose to disestablish and disendow the Irish Church, you will be prepared to argue the question as one of detail, the difference between us will not long prevail. If we are agreed that it is not expedient or just that the Establishment of the Protestant episcopal religion should remain the religion of the State, if we are agreed that some great disendowment of the revenues of the Church should take place, the difference between us is small indeed. But while we are taunted with the indefiniteness of our Resolutions, while we are told that they have been framed merely to meet differences of opinion, let me ask, is there no difference of opinion on the other side? Did the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) contain a programme of policy for Ireland? The noble Lord the First Commissioner (Lord John Manners) said the question now was the policy of the Government as opposed to the policy of my right hon. Friend. The Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) entirely threw over the proposals made in the speech of the noble Lord. He admitted that the issue before the House was clear; that it was disestablishment and disendowment as opposed to the existing state of things. We have a right to ask whether the speech of the noble Lord the First Commissioner or the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland contained the programme of the Ministerial policy, or whether the Government entertain the opinions of those who sit behind them, and who oppose the Resolutions on the ground that things should be maintained as they are? Passing from the speeches of to-night, I would refer very shortly to the speech made last night by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel). Although I must admit that the personalities into which we went last night were somewhat irrelevant, yet the blame of beginning the discussion must be attributed to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. From the security of that castle in which he dwells—in which it appears there are so few glass windows that no light has been permitted to enter it, or, if any, only “the light of other days” he contrived to throw stones with considerable force and vigour, and I must admit that the amusement was continued with equal force and vigour by the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). But it is not for the purpose of continuing the personal part of the question that I refer to the speech of my right hon. and gallant Friend. I want to refer to it, because I think he put in the shortest, simplest, and most direct way his argument on this question and the essence of the arguments used by other Members. He said that—

“The disestablishment of the Church is the

severance of all connection between the Church and the State—it is a refusal on the part of the State to recognize the Protestant Church in Ireland.”

And he went on—

“You may dissolve the Union if you please, but as long as that Union exists there is but one Church; and if you dissolve the union between Church and State in Ireland the dissolution of the union between Church and State will follow as a necessary consequence in England also.”—

That was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. That, also, was the argument of the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire and of most hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House. Now, what I want to learn is this. That argument, if sound, appears to lead in the most direct and irresistible manner to a conclusion in favour of the repeal of the Union. You, who use that argument put the strongest argument you can put in the mouths of the Fenians and those who would repeal the Union between the two countries. You do not say that the Established Church of Ireland is good for that country. You say it is good for England and Scotland, and therefore you would not meddle with it, because if you weaken it in Ireland you weaken it in England and Scotland also. If that be so, it would still be so if the Church of Ireland were ten times the grievance it is. To those who advocate repeal—to every Irish patriot who thinks it his first duty to secure the peace and happiness of his fellow-subjects the argument is irresistible—the Established Church in Ireland is a grievance which cannot be removed because Ireland is united to England, and the consequence irresistibly follows that the Union between England and Ireland ought, if possible to be dissolved. But I think the argument is not sound. In my opinion, the connection between the Established Church in England and the Established Church in Ireland is verbal and statutory, not vital. Why should the fall of the Church in Ireland be followed by the fall of the Church in England? Not as a necessary consequence. It can only fall if you betray a consciousness, a doubt, which I think not well founded, of a weakness in your own case. If you refuse to consider the case of the Irish Church, it is because you are afraid of having the same questions put as to the English Church. What strength can the English Establishment desire from the Irish Church? Precisely the same assistance that a healthy tree derives from a rotten branch. The Church of Ireland is said by hon. Gentlemen opposite to be perfectly defensible; but they have not entered into detailed arguments to prove that position. I think it cannot be maintained that the Establishment in Ireland fulfils any of those good purposes for which it was created, and it is liable to all the attacks which can be made on any Establishment. It cannot be said that it does much for the spread of religious truth, or to educate the people, or in providing religious services for the poor. On the other hand, it presents the spectacle of a numerous clergy and empty churches, of a State not only taking on itself to decide what is religious truth, but so deciding in direct opposition to the views and opinions of the great majority of its subjects; it is not only unsympathetic with the body of the people, but it is, in consequence of historical associations, the visible sign and badge of social inferiority. In this state of things the defenders of the Church have exercised a wise discretion in founding their defence chiefly on the difficulties and obstacles that exist in the way of its removal. That such difficulties and obstacles exist I am not prepared to deny—if they did not it would not have existed so long. Such a denial would tend to the condemnation not only of Parliament but of the party of which I am a very humble member. It is, indeed, our main if not our only excuse. The difficulties which stand in the way of removing this institution are our main if not our only excuse for past years of inaction; but believing, as we do now, that public attention has been thoroughly aroused on this subject, believing that the moment is favourable for its settlement, and believing also that the necessity for a settlement of this question is greater and more urgent than it has been at any previous time—[“Oh, oh!”]—I am stating this not as a fact but as a belief—believing, then, in these things, I hope the House will allow me to state why I think some of these difficulties are not so great nor of such importance as is generally attributed to them, and why they ought not to weigh with us to the extent of preventing us from attempting to deal with this question. I did intend to have said something about the difficulty which has been urged in reference to the Act of Union; but I do not think it will be necessary for me to do that, because, as far as I can see, that is a difficulty which has been given up entirely. If technical difficulties do exist, they will be mainly questions for the decision of the lawyers; but I do not believe that even technically any serious difficulties exist. If they do, however, I think we ought to look at the spirit and not at the letter of the Act of Union. I believe that the intention of those who framed the Act of Union between England and Ireland—the intention, also of those statesmen who succeeded them, and the still more earnest intention at the present moment, is that the people of these three kingdoms should indeed and in truth form one kingdom. If it can be shown, as we think it can, that the framers of the Act of Union were not all-wise or far-seeing, and that some provisions in the Act militate against the accomplishment of its main purpose, then it is our duty to attempt to carry out the spirit even if we break the letter of the law. There is another great difficulty which has been urged. It is an argument as to the rights of property, and, as I understand it, two assertions are made by our opponents. It is asserted, in the first place, that we are depriving the members of the Established Church in Ireland of a vested right, by depriving them of the services which they have enjoyed for a great many years of the ministers of their own communion; and, in the second place, it is argued that we are weakening the security of all property by appropriating the estates which belong to the Church. Now, as to the first assertion, I cannot deny that there is a great deal of truth in it. I think it is one which ought to be fairly acknowledged and fairly met. I cannot deny that there is something like that which we are in the habit of calling a vested right; but I think also that there is a very great distinction, which we ought not to overlook, between a right such as this and other rights which we more generally refer to when we speak of vested rights. There is a very great distinction between a vested right such as this, which is a right to something the State has provided for you, and that which you yourselves or your ancestors have provided for you. If a practice and law had been in force in Ireland for 300 years, that the State should build and repair the houses of all the Protestants in that country, I suppose houses would have been bought and property transferred subject to that state of things, and I imagine those who enjoyed that right would have a vested right in its continuance; but I cannot think that in so extreme a case this House would regard it as a right which ought any longer to be maintained, and I doubt very much whether the fact of the owners having had their houses built and repaired for them by the Government during 300 years would be considered to form any ground for their claiming compensation. But it would be a very different thing, and would, in fact, be what we usually mean when we talk of vested rights, if the State were to propose to take away the houses, or in any manner to interfere with private individuals who during that period had themselves built and repaired them. Now, although I admit that there is a vested right of a certain kind involved in this Church question, I think I have shown it is a different kind of right from that which we ordinarily mean when we talk of vested rights, and although this is a consideration which ought not to be overlooked, still in my opinion the question is one of expediency; and it is perfectly competent for the House to consider whether they will allow their respect for a vested right such as this to overweigh and overbalance the great important considerations which lie on the other side. As to the other branch of the argument, that we should weaken the security of property by dealing with the Established Church, I may remark that this is a subject which should be argued and has been argued on both sides of the House by lawyers. On our side of the House there was a very able and convincing argument brought forward on this subject by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge), and I think that as far as the legal part of the question was concerned, that argument almost exhausted the subject. But even if the arguments were less cogent than I conceive them to be, I could not bring myself to look upon even the rights of property as being so sacred that they should be allowed to interfere with the prosperity of the Empire. In my opinion, the true security for property lies in the conviction of the public mind that it is for the interest of the State, and for the good of all classes of the people that that security should in ordinary cases be maintained. If any agitation should ever arise against the rights of property, it would not be any sacredness of these rights which would protect us; but I believe its real security would be in the general and almost universal conviction that the security of the poor man, with the little he has earned, is exactly the same as the security of the rich man; and, that it is for the interests of all, these rights should be maintained. In my opinion, the security of property is increased, and not diminished, when it can be shown that the revenues of property are usefully expended, that the holders of property do their duty, and that there is a social advantage in the presence of those holders in the country. But in the case of the Irish Church I think none of these conditions will be found. Its revenues are not, in my opinion, usefully expended; for they are expended in maintaining the supremacy of a religion which is not the religion of the people, but is hostile to it. I do not think the presence of those who enjoy the revenues of the Church can be considered as a social advantage to the country, because they bring most vividly and forcibly a sense of injustice to the minds of all their neighbours. Now, if this state of things were entirely altered; if the lands of the Church and the tithe rent-charges were sold; if those who lived on the lands should become, instead of a body of clergy, a body of men belonging to the people and having the same interests and objects that they had; and if the revenues produced by such sale were devoted to any useful purpose, such as the education of the people, then, I think, the security of property in Ireland would be increased and not diminished. In my opinion the owners of property in Ireland have a just cause of complaint against the State. The State has given to them what they did not want—namely, a State Church, which is usually a Church for the landowners as distinct from the great body of the people; but it had not provided for them security either for their lives or for the tranquil possession of their property. The State has arrayed against the landowner a hostile, or, at least, an unfriendly body—almost the whole of his fellow-subjects who are not owners of land. Why, I ask, have the lives of landowners and their agents often been endangered in some parts of Ireland? Why have rents been low and badly paid? Why is it difficult to find industrious and improving tenants? I say because the great mass of the people are hostile in spirit to the owners of property, and because the State, with all its power and with all the severity of its enactments, has not been able to protect the landowners in consequence of that hostility. If this were to be the precursor of other measures for procuring peace and justice for Ireland, the landlords more than any other class in that country, would benefit by the change in the increased security of their lives and property. Whether it will prove a benefit will depend on the answer to the question whether it will be a measure of conciliation. Now, whatever may be the answer to that question, our votes on the Resolution should not be doubtful. I look on the adoption of the Resolution as a measure of justice; and if the worst anticipations of its opponents should be realized, and the Roman Catholics remain dissatisfied, and if, unfortunately, it should be necessary to continue to rule Ireland with a heavy hand, still we owe it to ourselves to leave no grievance unredressed. It is because I wish to see a firm administration of law as well as of conciliatory policy in Ireland that I most earnestly desire that we should place the justice of our whole system of government there beyond dispute. Whether the adoption of the Resolution will prove a measure of conciliation depends almost entirely on the manner in which this discussion is conducted in the House and country. If it is argued, as I hope it will be, on the grounds of justice and expediency, I can scarcely believe that it will not be a message of peace to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. I think some weight should be attached to the declarations of Irish Members in this House—and the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) last night proves, if additional proof were wanting—that it must be a measure of conciliation. When our Catholic fellow-subjects in that country see that we are at last earnestly setting to work to redress any real grievance under which they suffer, it is not in the nature of things that our efforts should not be followed by a conciliatory result. We are told that this measure will be irritating and insulting to the Protestants of Ireland. Is it, I ask, an insult to the rich minority to desire them to place themselves in the same position as the poor majority of their fellow subjects? Is it an insult to the Protestants of Ireland to ask them to place themselves in the same position as the Free Kirk Presbyterians of Scotland? I think that there are already signs that this proposal will be received in a far different spirit from that in which it would have been received a few years ago. I think there is reason to hope that the progress of education, of free discussion, and of the principles of religious toleration throughout the country, will do very much to frustrate the efforts of those fanatics who wish to stir up the forgotten embers of religious bigotry and hatred. In my opinion it is no insult to the Protestants of Ireland to ask them at least to discuss this measure with us on the grounds of justice, policy, and expediency. I can admire the strong religious spirit that animates the Protestants of Ireland, and can make allowance for the position in which they are placed; but I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to discuss this question in a fair spirit. Let them fight this battle with the weapons of a civilized age. There are plenty of men among them full well able to wield the weapons of argument, eloquence, and sarcasm, and we ask them not to resort to the mouldy armoury of religious bigotry and make use of the hateful cry of "No Popery!" But if, on the contrary, we are to be told about combinations between High Church Rituals and Romanists; if we are to be frightened by predictions of dangers worse than foreign conquest; if we are to have insinuated and spread over the land libels of every kind respecting the religion, character, and objects of our Leader, then I admit that there may be ill-blood stirred up before this discussion is concluded; but I hope the House and the country will recollect—as no doubt history will record—that it is not we, but others, who have recourse to such unfair weapons.

Mr. MOWBRAY said, that though the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) had congratulated the House that there was less of personalty in the discussion this evening than on the previous night, and that the arguments had been more addressed to the subject-matter of debate, it was to be regretted that the noble Lord had not himself adhered to that course of proceeding. After indulging in some personalities, good-humouredly, no doubt, against the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), the noble Lord, while urging the House to use the weapons of argument, and to cast aside bitterness, had imported into the latter part of his speech the most bitter personality ["No!"] When it was objected that the Resolutions were vague, the noble Lord asked their opponents to meet him in matters of detail. Now he (Mr. Mowbray) was under the impression that objections in detail had been very strongly urged in a previous discussion by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India. The supporters of the Resolution had been met both on the ground of principle and of detail. Those who were opposed to the Resolution maintained that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was one of a momentous character, and that nothing in legislation for the last forty years could be compared to the importance of the issue therein involved. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members cried "Oh!" but he asked had any great party struggle during the last forty years involved such a momentous issue as the disestablishment of the Irish Church? He maintained that the questions relating to the removal of disabilities from Roman Catholics and Dissenters, to the repeal of the Corn Laws, or to the extension of the suffrage of the people, either in 1832 or 1867, were not at all comparable in importance to the subject now under discussion. This great question touched all the institutions of the country. It touched the Monarchy in its vital principles. The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) sneered at the arguments regarding the Coronation Oath; but ever since there had been a Christian Monarchy in this country, there had existed a close and intimate relation between the Church of England and the State of England. The question was not merely what had prevailed for 300 years since the Reformation, but they must go back for centuries far beyond that. It was the Act of Union to which the Protestants of Ireland and the Legislature of England were parties, and the union of the Churches was a fundamental provision of that Union. The defenders of the Establishment did not for a moment deny the power or competence of Parliament to deal with the question now raised; but they contended that in doing so Parliament raised a very great and large question. Further the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Coronation Oath only bound the Sovereign as it stood, but that they could alter it. Of course they could; but they were bound in so doing to defend the property of the Church. If they were to do away with the Established Church of Ireland because that Church was not in accordance with the views of the majority of the people of Ireland, how long would they continue the Act of Settlement? Well, they were touching the Crown, but they were touching another institution—the House of Lords. From the earliest period of its existence that august Assembly had consisted of Lords spiritual and Lords temporal, and yet they were about to oust suddenly from their seats in that House those prelates who had hitherto been sent thither from the Irish part of the kingdom. Was not that a constitutional question they were raising? It was, he believed, admitted on all hands that, to a certain extent, they would, by the proposed step, shake the position of the Church of England. Would the right hon. Gentleman deny that? It was denied by many advocates of the proposals; but what was the language they had heard from Mr. Miall? He had told them that if one Establishment went the others would go also—the Church of Ireland, the Church of Wales, the Church of Scotland. The noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire had said that the union of the English and Irish Churches was verbal and not vital; but he (Mr. Mowbray) contended that the principle of Establishment involved in the connection of the United Church was vital, and that the overthrow of that principle in the case of the Church of Ireland would be ultimately fatal to the vitality of the Church of England. This Resolution, moreover, raised great questions as to the rights of property. True, they proposed to respect the rights of existing incumbents, Bishops, and parochial clergymen; but they did not respect the rights of the generations yet unborn, for whose spiritual education the Irish Church property had been amassed. According to the arguments of the noble Lord, the land was to be taken away from the Church, in order that it might be devoted to some useful purpose. He (Mr. Mowbray) did not know whether the noble Lord would consider the spiritual instruction of the people of Ireland a useful purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was not prepared to go the length of some of his followers. Some of these supporters did not scruple to avow that their intention was to do away with all endowments. Then, again, something had been said by the noble Lord as to the Church being the only badge of conquest remaining in Ireland. But was that really the case? There might be other badges of conquest as well as the Church. There might be castles belonging to noble Dukes, which might remind the Irish people of conquest as much as the Church. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: I did not mention the badge of conquest.] He appealed to the recollection of those around him; but if the noble Lord did not intend use the expression, he would not insist against him on any argument based on it. But again, was the Irish Church to hold the remnant of its property by its old title, or by a new one? If it was to be held by a new title—by a Parliamentary title derived from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—how long would that title be respected? If the Parliament would not respect a title which had endured for 300 years at least, what respect was likely to be accorded to a title from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire? They were to have not only new endowments, but a new Church—a free Church in a free State—all the creation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. But these arguments in detail might be answered by plenty of other arguments in detail respecting the Irish Church. That Church was to be made one with the Church of England—one not tied and fettered by the bonds of an Act of Parliament, but one in full spiritual union and communion with that Church. But what provision would the right hon. Gentleman make to insure identity of doctrine and discipline? Were the Church of England Bishops to be nominated by the Crown, and the Bishops of the Irish Church by a free synod of clergymen and the laity? And what was to become of the Royal supremacy? Was the Queen to be supreme over the Church in England and not supreme in the Protestant Churches in Ireland? Was the Privy Council to be the final Court of Appeal? And what security would the right hon. Gentleman give them that the clergy of the new Church would be equally learned, equally tolerant, and equally accomplished as they were at present? Would they have the same liberty of conscience as they now enjoyed in the Established Church? The colonial Church might be created by the right hon. Gentleman; but was the present position of the Church in the colonies so entirely satisfactory as to be imitated? These were some of the points of detail which suggested themselves for discussion when the question should reach that stage. Again, what was to become of the surplus funds? Was the £40,000 to go to Maynooth? Was it to go to make up the Regium Donum of the Presbyterians? How much was to go to secular education? Some hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would say a large portion; but was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to go to that extent? These details were important. When they came to settle the matter the questions would arise, what they were to do with the property, how they were to appropriate it, and so forth; and then their difficulties would arise—

Attigerint, quantas acies stragemque clebant."

When the right hon. Member for South Lancashire attained the result of his Motion, and had removed himself to the Ministerial side of the House, would he be prepared to bring in Bills which would be necessary to carry out his Resolutions? They would then, probably, hear the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway—Dissenters and Roman Catholics—protesting against the legislation which he proposed. In arguing that the proposed measure would conciliate Ireland, the right hon. Member disregarded the loyal band of men who had been our principal supporters in that country for years past, and depreciated the services of the Irish Church, which, by the piety and exemplary lives of its ministers, had rendered signal service—a fact attested by the present condition of the North of Ireland; and in the South of Ireland its missionaries had met with very great success. As to conciliation, that was difficult; for the views of the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire would offend the supporters of the Church in Ireland. He said the non-adoption of his views would be a strong argument in favour of the repeal of the Union—language held by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), in an address to his constituents at Baster; and from this remarkable coincidence of opinion it was to be inferred that the programme of the Liberal Leaders was this: in the Irish Church failed to resuscitate the Liberal party; if it was found divided when the work of destruction gave place to that of construction, then the repeal of the Union was to be the next rallying cry. He (Mr. Mowbray) would ask the noble Lord how many Bills would be required to carry the right hon. Gentleman's proposition into effect? They were to repeal the fundamental clause of the Act of Union. He would ask any lawyer whether the repeal of that clause would not be virtually a repeal of the Act itself? When the fundamental clause was gone, would it not be necessary to re-enact the Union? The right hon. Gentleman had no doubt a great ecclesiastical knowledge; but where was his alter ego, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), whose learning, ability, devotion, and great knowledge of the law would be necessary in drawing the many Bills that would have to be passed by that House—where was that hon. and learned Gentleman on the two divisions of the 4th April? Where had he been during the whole of this debate? He had been conspicuous by his absence. Would the House not see him on the Benches opposite during this attack upon the Irish Church? But there was another right hon. and learned Gentleman whose official experience would be of great service to the party opposite; he referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey). He would ask whether he was prepared to give the benefit of his great official experience and legal knowledge in the preparation of these Bills, and to assist in carrying a measure, which in 1865, he said could not be carried without a revolution? The noble Lord asked whether things should remain as they were. His answer was that the Government had never said that they should; and they had, at the instance of Earl Russell, issued a Commission to inquire into the Irish Church generally. And when that Commission reported, then some legislation must take place. The Government did not deny the legal right to bring forward those Resolutions; but they denied that the present was the most fitting time for doing so. They appealed from this moribund House to the young and vigorous and more numerous constituency which the Act of last year had created. Hon. Gentlemen opposite felt confident that the verdict would be in their favour; and, if so, they ought to be as anxious to appeal to the country as the Government, although they now rejoiced in their majority of 60. There had been times before now when the Irish Church question had been used as a rallying point for the great Liberal party, and yet that party had been obliged to abandon the question. In 1835, in that House, the present Earl Russell brought forward Resolutions appropriating the Church property, ostensibly to remedy grievances, but really to oust Sir Robert Peel from Office; and he succeeded. But in 1836 the House of Lords had rejected the measure, and the country had supported the House of Lords, and the Liberal party quietly dropped the Appropriation clauses. The victim of 1835 had become the pupil of the noble Lord, his then conqueror, and something more than pupil; for so proficient had he become in the education the noble Lord imparted to him, that he had since February last advanced the education of the noble Lord many degrees, and had enabled him to write a second pamphlet condemnatory of his first. The Government had now to encounter a formidable combination; but, though it was formidable, they did not despair. It appealed from the majority of the House of Commons to the enlightened verdict of the people of England. It did not raise the banner of "No Popery;" but it appealed to the people to stand by the religion they held dear; and it looked forward to the time when, the question having been considered by the Commission, the constituencies would be prepared to sanction legislation more in consonance with our past traditions, and more in harmony with our Constitution than that now proposed.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he expected to hear some arguments in answer to the speech of the noble Marquess the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington); but the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray) had not offered a single argument that was worthy of the House, or of the great question before it. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman resist the partial diversion of the property of the Irish Church by the suggestion that the castle of an individual member might be destroyed? Was there no way of meeting this question but by saying that it touched the Monarchy, the House of Lords, the appellate jurisdiction of the Privy Council, without showing in what manner? The Sovereign was asked to allow the House to discuss a matter essentially necessary before a Bill could be laid on the table of that House. That was the only point in which this Resolution touched the Crown. But what did the right hon. and learned Gentleman think of the Temporalities Act, which swept away several bishoprics? Did not that touch both the Monarchy and the House of Lords? Yet the Act had been for several years on the statute book. If the question was of importance to the Empire, it was of vital moment and interest to Ireland, more especially in the present critical condition of that country, when it was looking to the House of Commons for earnestness and sincerity in its attempts at remedial legislation. The noble Lord the Member for the county of Londonderry (Lord Claud J.

Hamilton) had said that no one stated that this measure would be a message of peace to Ireland. He (Mr. Sullivan) believed and stated that it would be a message of peace to Ireland. Was the present condition of that country one of peace, conciliation, and harmony? Where there not classes widely separated by distrust and aversion, caused by the existence of this Church Establishment? ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen from the North of Ireland might say "No;" but they well knew that Protestants and Catholics were separated by a wide line of demarcation. The Protestants of Ulster had assumed to themselves from the earliest times the character of exclusive loyalty which they had denied to the Catholics. They pretended that they were the loyal garrison in an enemy's country, supporting the Protestant Church which was the citadel. That was the way in which the question was put; but if you once told the Roman Catholic peasant and peer that they were on the same footing ecclesiastically and civilly as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, you would have removed the most jarring source of discord which ever disturbed the country, and which he really believed was at the bottom of all the dissensions from which Ireland had suffered. He had known several measures of concession to the Irish Catholics proposed, and they were invariably opposed by Northern Members, who were so fond of monopolizing the character of loyalty. The people of Ireland would be loyal if they were allowed to be loyal; they had shown within the last few weeks how great their feeling of confidence would be if once there were a prospect of passing the measures that were necessary for that country. The defence offered for the Irish Church was what lawyers called a dilatory plea. We were to wait for the Report of the Commission. He could understand that this Report might be of use on questions of detail; but how would it aid upon the question of disestablishment, which was advocated on the ground that the Irish Church was a political institution. The right hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Adderley) confessed that he thought the attempt to extend the Reformation to Ireland was idle. The fact was that the Irish Church had been established from the first as a political institution, and as such it remained to this day. He denied that any argument had been adduced to show that the Irish Church was a religious institution. It was planted, had been maintained, and stood to this hour as a political institution; and honest and warm-hearted Protestants in the North of Ireland were taught to believe that the Church of the State was the Church of their faith. But there was also a strong Protestant feeling that justice ought to be done on this subject; that no sufficient fruits had followed from the Irish Church, and that it had better be severed from the State. Prescription has been spoken of in the course of this debate; but what, he would ask had prescription to say to the Irish Church? He was as sincere a Protestant as any man who defended the Church Establishment in Ireland; and he could sincerely say he did not believe that the Establishment had done service to the Protestant religion. That Establishment had led to a conflict between classes in Ireland, and he felt that it ought to be swept away. But, if prescription was pleaded in defence of the Irish Church, he would ask, had not the prescription been supported for 300 years by injustice and cruelty? ["No, no!"] It was well known that down to the close of the last century the Roman Catholic religion had been persecuted in Ireland, and the Roman Catholic priests had been proscribed. In the South of Ireland the country was an exception. In towns there lived the rectors of adjoining parishes, in consequence of their having no residences in those parishes; and there were seen constantly clergymen, with no congregations, by the side of Roman Catholic churches turning out their teeming hundreds. Was not this a state of things that ought to rouse the feelings of the people? Yet this was the normal state of things existing in the South of Ireland. But how stood the question of prescription? Mr. Burke said—

"In England it was the struggle of the great body of the people for the establishment of their liberties against the efforts of a small faction; in Ireland it was the establishment of the power of a small faction at the expense of the civil liberties and properties of the majority."

It was said, however, that if they made this concession it would be followed by further demands. That was very likely; but if they showed the Irish people that they were willing to go a certain length in order to do them justice, would not the Irish people be disposed to meet them in a fairer spirit in regard to the questions which might come afterwards? The opinion of the new and reformed constituency had been often referred to in these discussions;

but the Irish people would have great confidence in those new constituencies whenever the appeal might be made to them, and they were asked whether they would not prefer the freely proffered loyalty of a great nation to the sullen, and it might be conditional, loyalty of the few. If the Irish people saw that parliament was really in earnest, and that it meant to remedy the injustice that had long been done them, they would respond with warm and lively gratitude to the kindly advances made towards them. He protested against the insulting assertions that had been made as to conspiracies between "Irish Romanists" and any other classes. He believed that the Irish Romanists, as they were called, were as loyal as any section of that House, and he emphatically repudiated the insinuations that had been thrown out against them. He pointed to the many distinguished Roman Catholics who had appealed to the House for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, who had not claimed it as a sulky demand, but had asked for it—and implored it, if they liked—as an act of justice. Let the House, therefore, not quibble about it or hesitate to concede it. It was said the Fenians did not demand the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Certainly the Fenians did not; for that was perhaps the very last measure which they wished to see adopted, because it would take from them one great cause of sympathy. The farmers of Ireland, said the Chief Secretary, had not yet joined the ranks of Fenianism; but would the noble Lord wait until they had done so before doing an act of justice? If the noble Lord and his Colleagues would cast aside the small faction which arrogated to itself a monopoly of loyalty in Ireland, they would earn the thanks and strengthen the loyalty of the Irish nation. In conclusion, he hoped the Committee would agree to the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken has made one or two assumptions such as, are said, not to be unusual in Irish oratory. He has informed the House that the Irish branch of the United Church does not represent religion. It cannot be denied that the essence of every Protestant establishment is religion. But what is the toleration of this advocate of concession, when he rises and declares that there is no religion in the Irish branch of the English Church? Again, what says this distinguished lawyer? Why he says that prescription gives no title to a corporation. I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he stands to that phrase, that "prescription gives no title to corporate property?" Is this the doctrine we are to learn from the advocates of concession? I ask, whether the owners of corporate property, and those who enjoy the usufruct of corporate property accept this doctrine, that "prescription gives no title to corporate property?" [Mr. E. SULLIVAN: I never said that prescription gives no title to corporate property.] I took a note of what the hon. and learned Member stated, and I understood him to say, that "prescription gives no title to corporate property." If he chooses to retract that opinion well and good. I shall rejoice to find that he does not hold the doctrine; but his having said this shows the excess to which his oratory has carried him. I do not wish to pin the hon. Gentleman to the assertion which he now retracts. I will ask the House to consider in what respect the Irish Church is a corporation entitled to property. The Church is a corporation and holds property. Will any lawyer in the House deny this; why, in every Court it is known that if any question touching this property of the Church arise, the local officer of this corporation, whether he be Bishop, chancellor, surrogate, or a mere incumbent, appears to defend this property, or to answer for the use or abuse of it, not if he be an incumbent, as an ordinary freeholder, but as a freeholder for life under the corporation to which he belongs. I put it to the hon. and learned Gentleman who last addressed the House, whether in every court of the United Kingdom the Church is not held to be a corporation? The substance of these Resolutions has scarcely hitherto been appreciated in this debate. The 1st Resolution which is now before the Committee asks the Crown as the sworn trustee for this property—to abandon that trust. The next Resolution would prevent the creation of any new life interests in this Church property. The 3rd Resolution proposes that this House should, by its majority, present an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she will consent to violate her Coronation Oath. Now I put it to any hon. Member of this House whether there is any parallel to be found in history of any such proposal? I admit that the Irish Church Temporalities Bill was a case somewhat in point; but Parliament eventually decided on not requesting the abandonment but the modification of the trust under which the property of the Irish Church is held by the Crown, and it was on that ground that the Crown assented to the measure. The question now raised is another question as far as the Irish branch of the Church is concerned; you ask the Sovereign to resign the trust she has sworn to maintain, not for the purpose of modifying that trust, not for the purpose of altering the appropriation of the property in the sense of the trust, but that the property of the Church in Ireland, which the Crown holds on trust, shall be placed in our hands for the purpose of total alienation. That is the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. Far be it from me to touch upon the sacred ground of what may be the conscientious feelings of Her Majesty. But the step you are asked to take is unprecedented—unprecedented in the annals of Parliament. Well, Sir, there have been many strange arguments used; and one of them was used to-night by the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman). He said that he was a lawyer, and that there was no Roman Catholic lawyer, that he knew, but was anxious for the alienation of the property that the Church of Ireland possesses. Let me remind the Committee of the opinion in respect to disestablishment of the Irish Church which was expressed by an eminent and Catholic Judge who died lately—a learned person, who once had a seat in this House, and whose attainments were well-known to hon. Members. The extract is from a pamphlet of the late Mr. Justice Shee entitled A Proposal for Religious Equality in Ireland. It was not the expression of opinion in a hasty speech, but a calm and deliberate conclusion. He wrote—

“If my opinion were less decided than it is on the meaning of the Catholic Oath, or I deemed the policy recommended by Mr. Miall more hopeful than I believe it to be, I should still think our adoption of it unwise. The Church by law established in Ireland is the Church of a community everywhere considerable in respect of property, worth, intelligence, and the power of avenging a disgrace on the religion of the Irish people. It is strong in the supposed identity of its interests with those of the Church of England. Nothing short of a convulsion, tearing up both Establishments by the roots, could accomplish its overthrow. Nor is it by any means clear that its overthrow would benefit our religion. With the exception of the zealots who disturb the dioceses of Dublin, Ferns, Cashel, and Tuam, the ‘sapping and mining’ of religious belief has not been thought a worthy occupation by the prelates or clergy of the Establishment. Who shall measure the effects which might be produced upon the half-informed, the irreligious, and the indigent, by the spirit of proselytism which has of late broken loose, if universally quickened in the breasts of unendowed perverters, without standard, articles, or creed, stimulated by the lust of uncertain but indefinite gain.”

Do not tell me, Sir, after that, that no Roman Catholic lawyer has ever and even recently supported the Church in Ireland—or that all Roman Catholic lawyers are actuated by the same intolerant spirit that has been displayed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the House. It seems to me that the Liberals represent the temper of modern Rome, the spirit of Ultramontanism. As an expression of the school of Cardinal Cullen, his speech is intelligible enough. But compare the speech we have just heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman with the extract I have just read to the Committee from the pamphlet of the late Mr. Justice Shee! We can judge from the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and from the temper of it, who are the instructors that are guiding or leading the Liberal party. I have observed, throughout this debate, that the arguments addressed to the Committee by the hon. Gentleman opposite have nearly all been borrowed from the letter addressed by Dr. Manning to Earl Grey. Almost every argument has been reproduced, among others the leading argument that the Church is an injury as well as an insult to the Irish people. That all these arguments are borrowed almost verbatim from the letter to Earl Grey of the prelate who, previous to his elevation, declared that the function of his Church was to subdue or to subjugate this country. That is the temper of modern Rome. That is the temper with which we have to deal. That is the temper in deference to which we find the Leaders of the Liberal party repudiating opinions that they held two or three years ago, or about to join in an attempt, which is illustrated by the declaration that the Protestant Church shall not exist in Ireland. There are some other topics on which I wish to address the Committee. Sir, I observed that the right hon. Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington), and several other hon. Gentlemen opposite, in addressing the House, have said, “Let us not hear in this House expressions of bigotry, in the shape of a ‘No Popery’ cry.” Will he let me ask, what more cogent bigotry could be evinced than that of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the Committee? Has he not declared that the majority of the Irish people are such bigots that they cannot be satisfied as long as the sanction of the Crown is given to the existence of the Protestant Establishment in Ireland? I do not believe that of the Irish people. I have reasons for not believing it. Then it has been said, and repeated several times, that the Irish Church in former days was simply a badge of conquest; that it conferred no benefit upon Ireland; that it was maintained out of vindictive spirit of injustice to that country. Arthur Young was a man of no mean capacity — of world-wide fame, he was the correspondent of the Empress Catherine of Russia, and of Washington; his works were translated by order of the French Directory at the time of the Revolution. He made a tour in Ireland during the time when the Protestant Church is now said to have been maintained merely as an injurious badge of conquest. What was the result of his observations? He visited Armagh, and in his tour he specially remarked the energy of the clergy in public improvements, specially signaling the see of Armagh. A school, a library, a palace, and four churches had been erected by the Bishop. Arthur Young adds—

"His Grace found Armagh a nest of mud cabins, and will leave it, a well-built city of slate and stone. When it is considered that all this has been done in the short space of seven or eight years, I should not be accused of exaggeration if I said that they were noble and spirited works, even if undertaken upon a man's personal estate; but how much more then are they worthy of praise when executed, not for his own posterity, but for the public good."

Here, then, we find drawn by an impartial hand, the character of one of these clergymen who are said to have been sent to Ireland merely as the "type of conquest;" one of those men who, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, represented no religion, and confer no benefits upon their neighbours. Was a more unjust statement ever made in debate? Then, at a later period, I might take the testimony of Major Woodward, who was employed in 1823, to report on the state of Ireland. What did he say of the effects of the Established Church upon the population of that Church, which we have been told over and over again is only to be looked upon as an injury and insult to the people? Major Woodward, after having

"I must, as a public officer, whose duties called him into close contact with the clergy throughout the most remote, and (by all other of the higher classes) deserted parts of the kingdom, declare, in common justice, that were it not for the residence, and merit, and political influence of the parochial clergy, every trace of refinement and civilization would disappear."

Now, I will ask anyone whether the records of the Roman Catholic Church testify to the civilizing properties of that Church? Cast your glance over the map of Europe, the Church of Rome is dominant in Spain, and tell me—has civilization advanced in Spain? Is Spain not one of the most retrograde countries in Europe? Pass on then to Poland—a country which is a conquered country, and in which—thus anticipating the views and policy of many Members of this House—the Emperor of Russia maintained the Roman Catholic Church in all its splendour. I ask, is there on the face of Europe a more degraded country—a country in which the mass of the people were less educated or less civilized? Remember the testimony of Lord Macaulay, your own historian, on this point—

"Go where you will," he said, "the result is the same. Go to the Protestant cantons of Switzerland and you will find them advanced in civilization and wealth, far before the Roman Catholic cantons. Look at Scotland with her barren soil, but her Protestant religion. But go to the South of Ireland, and you will find agriculture in its most primitive state."

["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen may cry "No;" but statistics which have been laid before the House prove it. [A right hon. MEMBER: It is not true.] I say that the figures prove that in the South of Ireland thousands of acres have been converted into pasture land, which were once cultivated. Well, Sir; but then it is said that the Church in Ireland ought to be disestablished, because the numbers of her communionists are comparatively small. Is this the reason, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, why she must be considered to have no religion, and to be unworthy to exist. Sir, I conclude that the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who use this as an argument never attend Divine service in a church which has only a small congregation. If, Sir, the truth and value of religion is to be decided merely by numbers, Christianity is a mistake; for I am sorry to say that Christians are a minority in the world. If the truth of religion is to be decided by numbers, what would have been said of Christianity when it first appeared in the world? On the same supposition the Apostles must have been sent upon a fruitless mission. But now it seems that the Church in Ireland is to be condemned as a Church of no religion, because she does not act in the spirit of offensive proselytism—for avoiding which she was warmly defended by the late Mr. Justice Shee. Your arguments represent but one thing, a foregone conclusion, that for the convenience of party you would destroy an Establishment that has existed for 300 years. There can be no other interpretation than this; it is an interpretation that I am very unwilling to accept: it is that the Liberal party are so alarmed by Fenianism; the right hon. Member for Lancashire's nerves have sustained such a shock, that he can no longer recommend this country to suffer the existence of an Established Church in Ireland. Remember the first speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He referred to four or five periods, concluding with the year 1829. He said, "You have always yielded to terror. There is a dangerous conspiracy now in Ireland; and it is extending into England, yield again;" and the inference from this argument clearly is that as previous Parliaments have yielded to the fear of Irish conspiracies, this Parliament therefore has no alternative but to yield also. I ask hon. Members whether they accept that argument or not? If you accept it, where is such a course to end? If you thus give a premium to conspiracy, you must declare that the executions that have taken place are judicial murders; and you justify the feeling that has prompted these conspiracies. It is a grave matter that the argument of fear should be used successfully in the House of Commons. But I deny that this demand for the disestablishment of the Irish Church is made by the great masses of the Irish people; and I say distinctly that it is made by the Irish hierarchy headed by Dr. Cullen. Upon this matter I will read a declaration which has been read before, and which was made on the part of the Meath Tenant Right Society. I quote from a pamphlet on An Inquiry into the Causes of the Poverty and Discontent in Ireland, page 23—

"The following opinion of the Meath Tenant Right Society is worthy of attention. It was contained in an address to the inhabitants of that county, adopted at a meeting of the society held at Navan on the 26th November, 1865, the very Rev. John Nicolls, P.P., and V.G., in the chair; and the Revs. Thomas Lynch, V.F., and Michael Tommy, C.O., acting as secretaries:—"The one, the great, the sole question for Ireland, is the land question. Other agitations such as that against the Established Church are got up for party purposes; would infuse an element of bigotry into the already sufficiently disturbed relations between landlord and tenant; would effect the ruin of thousands of tenants, and precipitate that social catastrophe which we are anxious to avert."

Are these Roman Catholic priests less Roman Catholic than the Irish people? How come they to preside, as I have shown, at agricultural meetings? Who will tell me that their opinion is not as good an opinion as others that have been quoted? Cardinal Cullen demands the disestablishment of the Irish Church; it is in deference to his demands and to those of the Roman Catholic prelates, and to the persuasions of their colleague, Dr. Manning, that the House of Commons is to enter upon this novel course. I will give you proof of it. The right hon. Baronet who is at the head of the Military Department (Sir John Pakington) spoke in this House in 1865, and said—

"The House will permit me to read a letter which was addressed to by my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) in a former debate. An Association has been formed in Dublin, called the National Association, for particular objects, and with the concurrence, sanction, and support of Archbishop Cullen, of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. The letter in question was written by the Secretary of that Association, and addressed to an Irish journal:—"Sir,—The Irish Times of this day contains an announcement that the Established Church has been withdrawn from the programme of the National Association, and the questions to which it will confine its attention will be Tenant Right and Education. I beg to inform you that there is no foundation for the above statement, and the intentions of the Association in relation to the Irish Church Establishment have undergone no modification, and that the gentlemen with whom rests the direction of the policy of the Association are unanimous in their determination to have no compromise with the Establishment or its advocates, and to spare no effort for its overthrow."—[3 Hansard, cxxx. 1077]

That declaration shows that Cardinal Cullen condemns the opinion of the late Mr. Justice Shee, and is opposed to the opinion, expressed by the members of the Meath Agricultural Society. There cannot be a doubt that hon. Gentlemen opposite have accepted their policy with respect to Ireland from Cardinal Cullen and Dr. Manning, and this brings me to another matter. It is said that the existence of the Irish Church is an insult; and why? Because the Roman Catholic hierarchy object to it. Go back in the history of Ireland and you will find this. Whenever circumstances have occurred, that have tended to abate the division that exists between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, that instant Rome has interfered to aggravate these differences that provoke dissension, in order to produce alienation from and hatred to England. Now, Mr. Whittle, a Roman Catholic barrister, has written a pamphlet to which I have adverted on previous occasions; he is a Roman Catholic of moderate opinions, and he is treated with the utmost contempt by those Ultramontane Roman Catholics. In this pamphlet he complains, exactly as the late Lord Beaumont and the Duke of Norfolk complained, that modern Rome spews moderation out of her mouth. This pamphlet was published only three years ago; it was written by an able barrister, and he says this—that Ultramontanism had but little existence in Ireland previous to 1849, when it was imported by Cardinal Cullen. And why was this course taken? For this reason, that the conduct of the clergy of the Established Church, and of the other Protestants in Ireland during the famine in Ireland in 1847 and 1848; that the conduct of the Protestant community of England towards the Irish when they were in difficulties and distress; and the conduct of the United Parliament was such; that there was a growing feeling of attraction towards England; and of friendship and gratitude to the English people. At that moment Rome sent this firebrand to Ireland to cause division, and I say upon the authority of an educated and intelligent Roman Catholic barrister, that from his advent there sprung up the feeling in Ireland that is embodied in the demand for the disestablishment of the Irish Church; a demand that he was at first to popularize and force upon his clergy. I might say much more upon this subject, but I know that the hour is growing late. Still I wish to enforce upon the House—unwilling as some of the Roman Catholic Members may be to hear it—the fact that they are now doubly servants of the hierarchy. [A laugh.] That hon. Member who is now laughing (Mr. Synan) knows, that at no former period were the Roman Catholic Members of this House so servile in their obedience to the hierarchy of Ireland; and I assert it upon the authority of one whom I knew for years as a Member, a Roman Catholic Member, of this House (Mr. Vincent Scully). Mark this, if a man is disobedient to Cardinal Cullen;

if he does not accept that which has been described as the episcopal policy; if he does not become a candidate for Parliament under the auspices of the hierarchy he is treated with contempt and contumely, whenever his name is mentioned in this House. Many hon. Members of this House will remember Mr. Vincent Scully—[An hon. MEMBER: We shall never forget him.]—and I ask whether they can remember anyone more anxious to promote the welfare of his country. There is a letter that he has published which shows that he was defeated in his attempt to be returned again to this House, because he was not favoured by the Roman Catholic hierarchy, because he had not accepted as fully what is called the Episcopal policy. The letter is dated the 28th February, 1866, and it contains the following extract:—

“Possibly, also, they considered that the result of this ‘episcopal policy’ is that the Irish people (i.e. the occupiers of land in Ireland) are now unrepresented in Parliament; for it is quite apparent that the majority of the Irish county Members are nominated by Tory landlords who personify the British element, and the other county Members are virtually elected by Catholic Bishops who embody the Roman element; while the Irish element is thus practically extinguished and disfranchised. This state of Irish politics may, perhaps, partly account for the Fenian organization with its attendant evils, as well as for other consequences not necessary to specify at present.”

Now, Sir, when I remember the position Mr. Vincent Scully held in this House, and having great respect for his character, I believe his to be a true description of the representation of Ireland. In another part of the same letter he states—

“One of the most strange results of this ‘episcopal policy’ has been that, within a few years, the Irish Members have gradually dwindled from forty-six, at which they stood up to 1857, down to thirty, being their present number. In quality they are even more reduced than in quantity, so far as regards public experience and practical knowledge of Irish matters. For trained Irish veterans are substituted raw Roman recruits and Parliamentary tyros, either Protestant or Catholic.”

Now, this being the state of the representation of Ireland, suddenly the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire comes forward and declares that he is acting upon the opinion of the Irish people, as duly expressed by their nominal representatives—though I have shown that they represent only the opinions of Cardinal Cullen and Dr. Manning—it is impossible to believe that they can ever rest satisfied unless—unless what? Why, not because any pecuniary gain is refused to their own Church; but it is asserted that there shall be no increased prospect of peace—that the spirit of anarchy shall not be allayed, unless this House suddenly vote an Address to Her Majesty, expressing a hope that she will be induced to violate her Coronation Oath, and relieve Ireland from the offence which Cardinal Cullen feels at the presence in that portion of her kingdom of an Established Church. Were it not so late in the night, I could produce further evidence in support of the assertions I have made. I could show, that in former periods, whenever there was a prospect of peace in Ireland, Rome sent agents to this country to break the peace. I could show that the apprehension of a growing union between the English and the Irish people on the part of the Papacy is the secret cause of the policy that is now followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. In all human probability, instead of thus promoting peace in Ireland you will only stimulate to further demands, you will aggravate religious differences; by making these unwise concessions now you will stimulate the hierarchy to make other and still greater demands, which will render it impossible longer to maintain the union between the two countries. Was the late Mr. O'Connell a representative of Irish feeling or not? O'Connell made the same demand that you make now; but then O'Connell was consistent, for he also demanded the absolute repeal of the Union. He held that it was impossible that the British Government should conduct the administration of Ireland on the terms that you propose; and holding that to be an impossibility, being a man of foresight and ability, what did he demand? He demanded the disestablishment of the Church, and at the same time the repeal of the Union. You call attention to what has taken place in Canada and Australia. But O'Connell was wise in feeling that, if Ireland were placed in the position of Canada or Australia, it would be impossible to maintain the Union. I can quite understand Cardinal Cullen's policy. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to disestablish the Church. Why does he at the same time support, why do Cardinal Cullen and Dr. Manning support, the Union? Because the disestablishment of the Protestant Church will strengthen enormously the Papal influence in Ireland; and for this reason—the Catholic Church is organized, is directed in Ireland by a Legate Cardinal from Rome. If you withdraw from the Protestant Church of Ireland the support of the State, what will be the position of the two Churches? Remember that the Roman Catholic Church is supported by a State—by the State of Rome—it has a hierarchy recruited from Rome, increasing in wealth and influence; you withdraw from the Protestant Church of Ireland that support and countenance of the State, which she has heretofore enjoyed. And yet you say that the Union must be maintained. Why? Why does the Cardinal Legate wish to maintain the Union? In order that, by the increased power which would thus be given to him through the Irish representation, he may be able to exercise an increased power over this House. His policy is distinct and clear. How can you expect, if the Protestant Church can with difficulty maintain the contest now, that when the support of the State is removed she will be more adequate to contend with her opponent. You say it is an offence to religion to support the Protestant Establishment on political grounds. I say that as long as the hierarchy of the Romish Church is directly supported by the Court of Rome in Ireland, it would be an act of folly and of cowardice to withdraw the support of the State of England from the United Church in that part of Her Majesty's dominions. Such an act would be most imprudent, it would be impolitic, and if it were adopted it will be difficult to maintain the Union. Hon. Gentlemen talk as if it were the settled opinion of the people of this country that this act of disestablishment would be most statesmanlike. That is not the character that this policy has borne among them for many years past. I know that attempts have been made to beguile Members of this House into favouring this policy; but I also know that the people of this country condemn this proposal as favouring the ambitious policy of Rome directed against England. I attended a meeting at Birmingham the other day where 5,000 people were unanimous in their opposition to this policy. I had the honour to present a petition to this House from Birmingham which was signed by 10,000 people; and I was assured that if only a week would have been allowed the 10,000 would have become 40,000 or 50,000. Let us not, the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has said, resuscitate the old worn-out cry, "No Popery!" Depend upon it, if you pass this measure that cry will gather strength.

At present you feel a little of its force, but wait till your policy begins to work. I have had some experience of the Protestant feeling of my countrymen, I have seen it relax and I have seen it renew its strength; I know that the Protestant feeling of the countrymen is now gathering in strength. I know that the only sound policy on the part of the English Bishops is to come forward and strengthen their brethren of the Irish Church in this their hour of danger; and though Lord Russell has counselled them to abandon the Church of Ireland, I rejoice to see that the Archbishop of Canterbury and other Bishops are about to come forward and identify their cause with that of their brethren in Ireland. In conclusion, I beg to affirm my conviction, that if you adopt the policy which is recommended to you by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, you will adopt a policy that is at variance with the freedom of religion and inconsistent with the tolerant doctrines of Christianity, which are embodied in the formularies and illustrated by the practice of the Church of England.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had supported the former Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire with great reluctance; but he had done so because he considered that Protestantism in Ireland, so far as it was connected with the Church, had altogether failed. Those who conducted the Establishment were either incompetent or were traitors to the trust reposed in them. [“Oh!”] It was on that ground he supported the right hon. Gentleman. He had considered the matter with great anxiety, and he had come to the conclusion that protection in religion should be swept away and free trade established. The Resolutions had, however, been supported upon a wrong principle. It was said that they should make concession to a foul conspiracy. And this was said by a right hon. Gentleman—a neighbour of his in Wales. He did not believe that the Fenian conspirators would accept any such concession. He lived in Wales. It was said that the Dissenters in Ireland were numerous, and that in justice to them the Church should be swept away. But in Wales the Dissenters were two to one as compared with the Church, and if he endeavoured to get up an agitation to sweep away the Church of Wales, he would be regarded as a lunatic. It was shameful that attempts at legislation of this kind should stop the way of measures of pressing importance, and this under the pretence of arresting the progress of Fenianism. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would present some reasons more intelligible than those he had yet given why this Motion should be proposed. He feared that oaths were useless against the power of the Papacy. He wished to see the whole matter left to the decision of the people of England, and all modes of artificial support of religion put out of the way.

MR. REARDEN said, he was surprised that the Prime Minister, who had assisted last year to pass a liberal measure of Reform, should call the Roman Catholics by a disagreeable nickname. [Cries of “What name?”] He called them Romanists. He begged to call attention to the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman several years ago, in which he adverted to the course that should be adopted by an English Minister towards Ireland; and he declared that that speech was contradicted by all they had heard that night from the right hon. Gentleman’s side of the House. The Penal Laws were certainly a good reason for voting for the disendowment of the Established Church.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH moved that the Chairman report Progress.

House resumed :

Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Thursday.

House adjourned at One o’clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Stamford, v. Viscount Cranborne, now Marquess of Salisbury.

SELECT COMMITTEE—On County Financial Arrangements appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* ; Ejectments Suspension (Ireland)*.

First Reading—Non-Traders Bankruptcy (Ireland)* [98] ; Municipal Rate (Edinburgh)* [99] ; Ejectments Suspension (Ireland)* [100].

Second Reading—Church Rates Commutation [10], deferred ; Railway and Joint Stock Companies Accounts [53] ; County Financial Boards (No. 2) [52], negatived.

Considered as amended—Artizans’ and Labourers’ Dwellings [88].

Withdrawn—Peerage (Ireland) [83].

CHURCH RATES COMMUTATION BILL.

(Mr. Newdegate, Colonel Stuart.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. NEWDEGATE, in rising, remarked upon the absence of all the Members of the Government, and said, that the Bill embodied a principle which the House had affirmed. Another measure upon the same subject had been sent up to the House of Lords, and was, it appeared, to be referred to a Select Committee. He should be glad if the House would consent to allow his Bill to go before a similar tribunal, having good reason to think it would bear the examination of a Committee of the House of Lords. In the present state of that House (there were only a few Members present), he thought that the best thing he could do—considering the determination manifested by a majority of the House to disestablish the Church in Ireland, and in other ways to curtail the property of the United Churches of England and Ireland—was simply to move that the Order of the Day for the second reading of his Bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read a second time To-morrow.

(Sir William Hutt, Mr. Ellice.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR WILLIAM HUTT, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he thought it unnecessary to make reference to statistics for the purpose of showing that, in the last few years, the affairs of many railway and joint-stock companies had been in a disastrous position—disastrous not only to the shareholders themselves, but to the country and the general interests of the public. That calamitous state of things had directly resulted from the system of management under which the companies were formed—a system which was vicious in itself and in many cases most disgracefully carried out. It was therefore, he thought, absolutely necessary that Parliament should interpose to prevent, if possible, the recurrences of such evils. The case was one of great urgency. The amount of capital either compromised or lost by the collapse of the companies' system of management was perfectly gigantic. He believed it exceeded the measure of the great monumental debt of this country, and was the largest expression of figures which perhaps the human mind could comprehend. Parliament had of late been much condemned for having abandoned this vast amount of property to the will and pleasure of private individuals, and for having taken no care of the interests of the shareholders. That, however, he thought was not a just statement of the case; for, up to almost the present moment, neither the shareholders nor a large proportion of the public seemed to desire that protection. Since 1845, all the measures on the subject submitted to the House, either by private individuals or by the companies themselves, seemed to have called forth a feeling that any interference on the part of that House with the management of the affairs of such companies would be considered an affront and an injury to the shareholders themselves. He remembered Mr. Hudson, who for some years acted as spokesman in that House for many of those railway companies, declaring that such attempts at legislation were unconstitutional, and that it was the right of Englishmen to manage their own affairs and in their own manner. In consequence of that feeling and such remonstrances, those companies had been left pretty free from any legislative restraint up to a recent period. In the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, and in the Companies Act of 1862, as well as in the Railway Acts Bill of last Session, there were clauses inserted for regulating the management of the financial affairs of the companies; and if the provisions of those Acts had been fully carried out they would have been spared many of the calamities which they had had since to deplore. Those provisions were illusory, and were never enforced, because they took the form of mere mandatory directions, which were generally treated with either neglect or defiance. Parliament should never speak, but to command, and should never command unless it was able to enforce its behests. A very great change had, however, recently come over the public mind, including directors and shareholders. They were now sadder but wiser men; and legislation on the subject was now universally called for. The only question therefore was, what arrangements should be adopted by which malversation in those matters could be for the future prevented; and what should be done to restore to those important companies that confidence under the loss of which they were at present suffering? A Mr. Wrigley, at a recent meeting at Manchester, had proposed a plan by which the directors would be divided into two bodies—one to have the exclusive charge of the capital of the company; the other to be exclusively occupied with the management of the working of the line. But he thought no cutting and shuffling of the pack would alter the tint of the cards. He did not believe that any such plan would be effectual in preventing the directors and some of the shareholders combining together for the purpose of paying dividends to themselves and endeavouring to raise the market value of their property, by representations neither sanctioned by upright dealing nor by correct bookkeeping. It was not his intention to adopt any such plan, nor to advocate another one, which had been put forward also by a high authority—he did not advocate a system of Government audit, as that expression was generally understood. If the guarantee of the State were to be given to all such accounts presented to the Board of Trade, the various other companies engaged in mercantile and industrial pursuits would make similar claims upon the Government; and the consequence would be that the Board of Trade would find itself involved in vast, complicated, and overpowering interests. More than that, he thought it impossible that Government auditors could certify to the correctness of the accounts laid before them without communicating to them the sanction of Government authority, and he was afraid that the effect of such a plan would be to get rid of that individual responsibility which, in matters of this kind, was of much importance. The plan he ventured to propose by the present Bill was one which had been adopted by the Government itself in a measure now before the other branch of the Legislature. His object was to effectually carry out the provisions of the Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, and the Companies Act of 1862, so far as they related to the regulation and exhibition of the accounts. He proposed that the chairman and two directors of each company, together with the accountant, should, upon the occasion of the company's meetings, draw up and sign a full and faithful balance sheet of the assets and liabilities of the company, and that such balance sheet, together with the accounts from which it was deduced, should be filed with the Board of Trade, and with the Registrar of Public Companies; and, in order to render those accounts intelligible, he proposed that, with the accounts, there should be drawn up and filed the report of the engineers of each company as to the condition of the permanent way and the rolling stock of the company. In order to prevent any manipulation or cooking of the accounts, he proposed that they should all be made out according to a particular form prescribed by the Board of Trade. No dividend would be payable until all these requirements were fulfilled. In addition, he proposed to enact that all the officers of the company, signing documents of a deceptive or a fraudulent character, should be liable to fine and imprisonment. Two important objects would be gained by making it compulsory on companies to make out their accounts in a prescribed form. In the first place, there would be no dressing them up in order to make things pleasant, or to suit the interests of the company itself; and, in the next place, there would be no payment out of borrowed money, and no money could be paid without passing through the books of the company. In addition to this, by compelling all companies to adopt the same form of accounts, the public and the shareholders would derive great advantage from being able to form some estimate of the respective value of the shares of the companies. He had now stated the leading features of his Bill which he had taken up at the request of others, and which, if adopted, he believed would go far to prevent a recurrence of those evils under which several companies, as well as the public generally, were suffering, and which had produced so great a depression. He might be wrong in his views, but he had taken every pains by study and inquiry to form a right conclusion upon the subject. He had been desirous to see this measure brought forward with the sanction and authority of the Government; but as his hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Trade had declined to take the conduct of the measure, he felt it his duty to assume the responsibility of submitting it himself to the House. He trusted the House would feel that he had a claim on its support.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Sir William Hutt.)

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, he would offer no objection to the second reading of the Bill, the principle of which was similar to that of the measure introduced into the House last year. The position this year was, however, somewhat different. The Government had, already introduced a Bill into the other House of Parliament for the regulation of railways, and in that Bill they had largely availed themselves of the provisions of his right hon. Friend's measure. There were, however, a few salient points upon which the Government had taken a view different from that of the right hon. Gentleman. One point was, the Government had confined themselves to railway companies exclusively. He thought that in any tentative measure of that kind, it would be wise for the House to try the experiment upon a certain number of companies before embarking in the serious operation of legislating for all the limited companies in the country. There was a difference in principle between railway companies and ordinary limited companies. Very few of the latter had compulsory powers granted them by Parliament—a characteristic which alone would warrant Parliamentary interference in the internal concerns of railway companies. There were many thousands of limited companies in the country, and the form of accounts suitable to one description of company would be quite unsuitable to another, so that it would be next to impossible to prescribe a form that would apply to all. And a variety of other considerations showed how necessary it would be to limit the operation of a Bill like that before the House, at least for the present, and until opinion had been tested by experience. In the Act of 1862 there was a particular form recommended to joint-stock companies. By that Act it was provided that upon a requisition signed by two-fifths of the shareholders of any joint-stock company, an application might be made for a Government inspection of the accounts of the company. But that power had only in one instance been taken advantage of, and in that instance the time for an inspection was past, for the company was being wound up in Chancery. This showed how difficult it was to move shareholders to take advantage of arrangements which the Legislature provided for their protection. It seemed to him that the only perfect measure of the kind which it was possible to bring forward would be one rendering Government audit of railway accounts compulsory; but he had last year stated, in reference to his right hon. Friend's Bill, several objections to such a course. He believed it would paralyse the watchfulness of the individual shareholder, and thus be fatal to the prosperity of joint-stock undertakings; the business of the Legislature was to give every facility to shareholders for protecting themselves, and not to bring about a state of things in which shareholders whenever they met with difficulty would go crying to the Government for assistance. It had been stated over and over again that it was quite impossible to control directors by Acts of Parliament: that, if they were determined to cook the accounts, as it was called, they would do so. And even painful cases of fraud had at times been disclosed, the recurrence of which no foresight on the part of the Legislature could make impossible. But whose fault was that? The Courts of the country were open for the prosecution of persons who were guilty of such crimes. The shareholders individually were to blame in not choosing competent and trustworthy men. Persons were selected for the office of director too carelessly, and, in many cases, on account of their social standing and other circumstances, which in no way necessarily qualified them for their office. Gentlemen were constantly elected to the office of director simply because they were Members of Parliament, and supposed rightly or wrongly to have certain influence, which might on occasion be valuable; and in many respects shareholders permitted their affairs to be managed in a way which would bring a private concern to the verge of bankruptcy in a very short time. Shareholders then would act wisely if they asked the Legislature for no more than perfect freedom of action and perfect publicity with regard to the affairs of the company. Let the accounts be kept in an intelligible way, and the shareholders be afforded every facility for sifting them to the bottom. No form of account was prescribed by the Bill of his right hon. Friend; power only was given to the Board of Trade to prescribe a form. The Government had in the Schedule of their Bill set forth a very carefully prepared form, which might be modified with the consent of a company, to suit particular cases. This, he believed, was more agreeable to the wishes of the railway companies. It was, he believed, sufficiently elastic to meet the varying circumstances of the different railways; and, at the same time, sufficiently precise to enable any shareholder of ordinary intelligence to compare one year's accounts with another year's, and those of one company with those of another. This would prove of the greatest advantage. He should be very loth to allow auditors to interfere with the policy of a company, on which the success of an undertaking really depended. That was a matter purely for the shareholders, who had every facility for controlling it under measures recently passed. The right hon. Member wished the reports of companies to be sent to the Board of Trade; but he did not tell them what the Board of Trade was to do with them. The probability was that those reports would be put into pigeon holes and there they would remain, unless some shareholder should apply to inspect them, which would rarely happen. The Government, on the contrary, thought it would be better to require a printed copy of the report to be furnished to each shareholder on his application, and that he should have the power of inspecting the books of the company at its office. The Bill of last year provided that the accounts should be certified by the auditor, and that unless he did so the dividend could not be paid. He (Mr. Cave) did not, however, agree that the auditor should declare the dividend, that being more or less a matter of policy, and not to be decided merely upon the state of the half-year's accounts. On this point as well as upon some other matters of detail, the two Bills differed. He thought it would be better to postpone the next stage of the Bill until the Government measure came down from the House of Lords in order that they might be both considered at the same time.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he had little confidence in Parliamentary efforts to reform joint-stock company management. Everything that had hitherto been done to provide facilities for the shareholders to detect fraud or irregularity in their companies had been systematically neglected. And this had not arisen so much from want of light or knowledge as from wilful shutting of eyes. The extraordinary fascination of a large rate of interest was stronger than the wisest counsel; and nothing but bitter experience seemed to teach investors the truth of the Duke of Wellington's maxim, that high interest meant bad security. The shareholders might be taken to the salutary springs of economy, but it would be impossible to make them drink. He remembered a paragraph in the money article of The Times in 1863 which, quoting from memory, he believed ran in this way—

“Another ruinous financial collapse is due in the year '67, and we have every reason to believe the preliminaries are already adjusted.”

This prophecy was verified; and he believed persons of sound judgment could always predict with tolerable certainty the consequences of reckless investing. The evil has arisen from the wish of investors “to eat their cake and have their cake.” By their very nature, railways are monopolies; and the best plan would have been to recognize the fact at the beginning, and treat them accordingly. But this has not been done. Still, he approved the proposal to give every possible publicity to companies' accounts, and would not oppose the Bill.

COUNTY FINANCIAL BOARDS (No. 2)

(Mr. Wylde, Mr. Hodgkinson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WYLD, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the subject had occupied the attention of the Legislature during the past thirty years, and had been reported on by Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament, and by Royal Commissions, in every case to the effect that ratepayers should have some control over the expenditure of County Boards. This opinion had been supported by many statesmen of acknowledged wisdom. Sir Robert Peel stated that—

“He should admit, what he was prepared to admit, that the representative system should to a certain extent be adopted in the administration of the county funds.”

The Earl of Derby in 1848, speaking on the Petty Sessions Bill, said—

“In the county with which he was connected the county rate had risen from £77,000 in 1823, to £175,000 in 1848, and it did seem an anomaly that such a sum should be assessed by the local magistrates without the control of the ratepayers.”

If this were his Lordship's opinion in 1848, with a county revenue of £175,000, how much more strong should it be now, when, in 1865, the expenditure had increased to £251,754, and when the valuation had increased from £6,000,000 to £10,000,000? Sir James Graham had expressed his opinion—

"That some check founded on popular election, and consisting of ratepayers acting with the magistrates, was now necessary and ought to be established."

And the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley)—

"Wished it to be understood that he had never expressed an opinion against the ratepayers having a control over the expenditure, if a right system could be chalked out."

And upon another occasion—

"He begged to state that he did not object to the principle of establishing popular control over county expenditure."

The present Secretary of State for War did not object to this principle, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had upon more than one occasion promised to support it. Lord Palmerston, when First Minister of the Crown, had promised—

"That, at the beginning of the next Session, Her Majesty's Government would propose to Parliament such measures as they might think fit, founded on the principle of popular representation as regards the administration of county affairs."

But Lord Palmerston's promise is unfulfilled, and the county rate is the only tax of all our fiscal arrangements which is levied and expended without the consent of the ratepayer or his representative. And the anomaly was sufficiently apparent to all who had studied the question to render further argument or illustration unnecessary. It had been said that the landowners paid the county rate, though indirectly, and that the magistrates being large landowners had the sole right to control its expenditure. Sir James Graham in 1856 demolished the fallacy; his words are—

"It was said in reference to this measure, that the magistrates of England, who exercised this irresponsible power were the great proprietors, and had the greatest interest in the expenditure of the county rate; and that, therefore, it was perfectly safe to allow them to regulate that expenditure to which they themselves most largely contributed, without the check of popular representation. That seemed to him to be a very odd argument to use in the House of Commons. Why, on the very same ground, they might entrust the taxation of the whole country to the House of Lords without any interference from the representatives of the people. The House of Lords consisted generally of the large landed proprietors of the country. They, therefore, it might be said, had an interest in keeping down taxation—yet was it found necessary to have the check and control of this elective assembly."—[3 Hansard, cix. 826.]

The large landowner may be represented by the justices at quarter sessions, but the small freeholders are not in the commission of the peace; they are a numerous class, and freehold land and building societies have added to their number. The properties they possess may in the aggregate be equal to the properties of the justices, and yet they have no voice in the levying and expenditure of the county rate. What has raised the assessment for the county rates from £65,000,000 in 1860, to £77,000,000 in 1868, but the improvement and increase of the smaller properties? Then there is the tenant occupier. It is said the landlord pays the rate; that when the tenant takes the farm or the house, he knows the amount of the rate, and pays a rent minus the rate. This proposition might have some force if the rate was invariable, but it changes from year to year. In Cornwall the amount levied for the county rate was—

These examples show that the rate increases, and in some few counties diminishes. Does the landlord deduct the increase of rating or charge the diminution of rate to the tenant? If not, then he can pay indirectly only a portion of the rate, and the tenant is entitled to some control over the portion of the rate he pays. Where the tenant has taken a lease, he must, from the annual increase in the rate, be a direct contributor to the county rate, and yet as the law now stands he has no share in its management. The remedy he proposed was simply that suggested by a Select Committee, which had reported on the subject. His Bill would be permissive. The majority of the Boards of Guardians in a county would, under his

Bill, in the first place, decide whether they would prefer that the Act should take effect in their county, and when a majority of the parishes had concluded in favour of it the county magistrates would be required to endorse their decision. The Boards of Guardians would then proceed each to elect a representative from among their number, and the justices would elect a like number from among themselves. The assembly thus consisting of one-half of county magistrates and one-half of elected members from the Boards of Guardians, would form the County Financial Board. The qualification for a seat would be a fixed £50 occupation, either in ownership or tenancy, and it would not be necessary that the representative should be a justice. Its members to go out of office annually, but capable of re-election. The duties of the Board to be strictly financial, not judicial, and consist in controlling the county finance; it would regulate the charges for the police of the county; the raising of rates to defray the expenses of building, hiring of stations, lock-up-houses, and would have the power, with the concurrence of the county magistrates, of suggesting to the Secretary of State an increase or diminution in the number of the police in each county; and the chief constable of the county to attend its meetings. It would have power to determine the salaries and superannuations of the officers of gaols, and of all questions arising as to the structure, but would have no control over the internal arrangements of the prison; but its members would have power to visit the gaols. In case of difference arising between the Board and the county magistrates in the matter of salaries, the appeal to lie to the Secretary of State. With regard to lunatic asylums the Board to have the control of all expenses attending the structure, but all power as to the internal regulations to remain with the county magistrates and the committee of visitors; its members to have the power of visiting the asylum, except in cases where it would be detrimental to a lunatic, and in case of disagreement appeal to the Secretary of State; and all powers given to the justices by the 15 & 16 Vict., c. 81, would be given to the County Financial Boards constituted under the Bill; and an audit on the principle suggested by the Select Committee would be held under it. He fully believed that the county funds were generally administered by the magistrates with great care and judgment; but the system failed to give satisfaction to the great body of the ratepayers, who very naturally thought they were entitled to some control over this expenditure. The question was the more important on account of the increasing amount raised annually by county rates. In 1793 that amount was only £184,000, whereas in 1866 it had reached £2,415,000. The proposal to associate persons elected by the Boards of Guardians with the justices might, perhaps, encounter objection; but it should be remembered that those Boards already exercised important functions with regard to county rates. Whatever views might be held as to the machinery he proposed, the present irresponsible administration was an admitted anomaly, and he believed the adoption of the principle of representation would be hailed with great satisfaction by the ratepayers. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wyld.)

MR. KENDALL, in seconding the Motion, said, he hoped the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee. His own experience led him to believe that much discontent existed with regard to the manner in which county matters were managed; not that blame was imputed to the justices, but that the system was held to be faulty. Nine-tenths of the ratepayers had no control over the application of the rates. It sometimes happened that after a farmer had taken a lease at a certain rental, extraordinary outlay on prisons, lunatic asylums, or police stations led to a serious increase in the county rate, and the farmer was thus saddled with much heavier burdens than he had calculated upon. He did not say that such outlay was unwisely incurred; but when it was sanctioned by an irresponsible body complaints naturally arose. Very large powers were possessed by the visiting justices of lunatic asylums; they could double the staff or the salaries, and even the magistrates in Quarter Sessions often could not interfere. For his own part, he devoted much labour and care to county expenditure, and he believed his fellow-justices did the same; but it was impossible to convince the ratepayers that they were not entitled to a voice in that expenditure. While approving the principle of the Bill, and thanking the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) for having introduced it, he thought it would require considerable revision; and in case it were referred to a Select Committee, he hoped some Irish Members would be placed upon the Committee, for they would be able to give valuable information as to the grand jury system, which was far superior to any machinery existing in this country.

Lord HENLEY said, he did not deny the right of ratepayers to some control over county expenditure; but he thought it was not correct to say that, at present, they had no control whatever. The items, though not the details, of that expenditure were fixed by Acts of Parliament, and in the passing of those Acts the ratepayers had a voice. The county rate in his own county for current expenditure was only 4d. in the pound on the rateable value, and he believed that, when some Returns which had been moved for were presented, it would be found that whereas the poor rates reached from 3s. to 6s., and the highway rates 1s. 10d. or 2s., county rates did not often exceed 6d. in the pound. The amount being thus small, and no fault being found with the working of the present system, he doubted whether it was desirable to take action further than by referring the Bill to a Select Committee. In its present shape, it would lead to constant collisions between the Financial Boards and the Finance Committees of the Quarter Sessions, for it appeared to place the Financial Boards in a position superior to that of the Quarter Sessions. It transferred the constabulary powers to the Boards, and it required the chief constables to attend their meetings. Being accustomed to attend certain committee meetings of the justices, they would be puzzled to know which masters to obey. Moreover, the salaries of prison officers were to be fixed by the justices and Boards, and, in the case of disagreements, by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Such disagreements would be very unfortunate. The Bill, too, omitted to provide for representative powers in other than financial matters. Now, on such questions as the adoption of the Highway Act, which was carried in his own county, notwithstanding that seventy petitioners out of seventy four objected to it, representative powers were as much required as with regard to financial matters.

Mr. PERCY WYNDHAM said, that

if the present system were changed he should prefer a purely elective Board to one of a hybrid character, composed partly of justices and partly of Poor Law Guardians. As ex officio members, magistrates would have less influence at the Board than if they were elected by the ratepayers. The management of gaols and asylums by the justices was efficient, and, considering the results, economical, whereas the administration of the Poor Laws by guardians was infamous and costly, and this did not offer much encouragement for making the change proposed. As to the transfer of the police management to the Financial Boards, in his county it had recently been thought advisable, on account of the number of Fenians employed in mines, to enlarge the constabulary force in as quiet a manner as possible; but Boards would be tempted to pay exclusive regard to economy, to the neglect of other considerations. He believed the present system, though an anomalous one, worked well. The Bill, if it became law, would introduce far greater anomalies.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, that, while of opinion that much of the feeling which had been shown of late years on this subject was due to misconception, he admitted that that feeling was entitled to consideration. As had been already pointed out, a great number of items of county expenditure depended on Acts of Parliament, the justices having control only over the details. The expenditure on gaols, lunatic asylums, and police, for instance, was imposed by statute, and the only question was, whether in any case magistrates sanctioned excessive expenditure. Now, he believed that, in the main, great judgment and economy were displayed, and in the county with which he was acquainted the Finance Committee devoted an enormous amount of labour and time to their task, checking the expenditure as efficiently as any other machinery which could be devised. He could see no advantage in referring the present Bill to a Select Committee. In the first place, it was a permissive one, and he thought such legislation should be discouraged. That House was at least as capable, as were the guardians of the poor, of arriving at a conclusion as to whether any change ought to be introduced into the system of managing the affairs of counties; and if such a change was to be made it was, in his opinion, desirable that it should be introduced by the direct authority of that House. Moreover, the Bill was what he might term a Japanese, or dual one, for the clauses relating to gaols, asylums, and police would bring about an immediate dead-lock between the justices and the Board. It was true that the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) did not propose that the Financial Board should interfere with the officers of gaols or of the police in the discharge of their duties; but those officers would be dependent upon the Boards for their salaries; and it was impossible that those who had the control of the purse-strings should not interfere with and exercise an influence over the officials. Upon the whole, he was convinced that the Bill in its present shape would not be productive of benefit to the counties, nor would it carry out the purpose of the hon. Member for Bodmin. He believed there had been no inquiry into the subject since 1853, when a Bill brought in by the right hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. Milner Gibson) was referred to a Committee. That fifteen years should have elapsed without any measure having been introduced, or, at all events, without any discussion on the question, seemed to show that the conclusions of that Committee had not commended themselves to the acceptance of Parliament. During the last two years, Chambers of Agriculture had been established in various parts of the country, and had shown considerable interest in the question. In the interests, therefore, of the county magistrates, who were to a certain extent attacked, he thought an inquiry should be made. He objected, however, to referring to a Committee a Bill which required entire re-modelling in order to make it acceptable, and which proposed a Board not constituted in accordance with any recognized principle, its members being chosen, not by the ratepayers, but by guardians who had been elected for another purpose, and it being left to the majority of Boards of Guardians to decide whether they adopted the change or not. The hon. Member for Cornwall (Mr. Kendall) had suggested that Irish Members should be placed on the Committee; but Irish and Scotch Members would be only embarrassed by the details of the present Bill; and the Committee would be better able to decide whether the complaints which were commonly preferred were well founded — whether much would be gained by a considerable change, and whether that change should be in the direction of the Irish or Scotch system, if no particular measure were before them. He should be prepared to move as an Amendment to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or in the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted.”

He should prefer, therefore, the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the whole question, so that their Report might lay down principles on which any Government might frame a measure more consonant with the interests of the ratepayers and more acceptable to the House. Another reason for this course was the fact that the hon. Member for Thirsk (Sir William Gallwey) had given notice of a second Bill on this subject.

MR. BRUCE said, he had understood the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Wyld) to desire the adoption of the representative principle, the machinery by which it was effected being a matter of detail. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) had pointed out weighty objections to the machinery of this Bill; and he doubted whether it would be possible to reconcile the functions of the justices and those of the proposed Board. He thought it would be much better to send the whole question to a Select Committee than to have a Select Committee on the Bill itself. The result of sending this Bill, with its 140 clauses, to a Select Committee would be that all legislation on the matter would be postponed till another Bill was framed; because he thought the opinion of the Committee would be that the measure now before the House was impracticable. It might be said that it was important to have the principle of the Bill affirmed by reading it a second time. He doubted, however, whether one word would be said against the principle of the Bill. On the contrary, he believed that the tone of the discussion on the second reading would be equivalent to an affirmation of the principle of the Bill. Under these circumstances, he would recommend his hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin to accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He was afraid that, at present, the finance business of counties was got through in a rather hurried manner at Quarter Sessions; and, as it could no longer be said that the rate was levied on land exclusively—far the larger portion being raised from non-agricultural property, such as mines, docks, houses, railways, &c., which were frequently unrepresented by the justices—the time had come when a change should be made. The best manner of effecting this change would be a proper subject of inquiry before a Select Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, the feeling out-of-doors was strongly in favour of inquiry into this subject, as the number of petitions presented every year in reference to it proved. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken in thinking that it might be more satisfactory to the body of the ratepayers to give them a direct representation in the body to which the county finances were intrusted; but there were difficulties in the matter which this Bill did not meet, while it would give rise to other difficulties. He thought that under this Bill they would not get responsible persons to be visitors of gaols and lunatic asylums. It certainly seemed to have been drawn with great care; but how could the prisons and lunatic asylums be managed by persons not conversant with those places? [A laugh.] He did not mean persons who had been confined in prisons or lunatic asylums, but persons like himself, who, as county magistrates, had been in the habit of visiting such institutions. Those who had been members of the visiting Boards knew how often it occurred that strange things arose which required action on the moment. The manner in which the Bill proposed to limit the powers of the visitors of lunatic asylums to an expenditure of £10, under extraordinary circumstances, showed how difficult it was to deal with their management in a Bill. The great principle of the Bill was to create a dual government; but it was already seen that such a government might come to a dead lock; and if it did there would be a reference to the Secretary of State, and that would be a most expensive matter. He did not think that the finances of counties would, under this Bill, be more economically managed than at present; and he believed that the proposal of his right hon. Friend ought to be adopted if they desired to arrive at a proper conclusion upon the matter.

MR. REHOW said, he wished to point out that assessment committees in counties were most useful bodies; and that under the Bill there would be great difficulty in obtaining the assistance of practical men on those committees. He did not object to the principle of the Bill, but he thought that the course suggested by the Secretary of State was the one to be pursued.

MR. BARROW said, he took a very strong interest in this subject, because he felt that taxation and representation ought to go together. He brought this subject before the House some fifteen years ago, and it was not well received. Since that time it had slept, but it now found general approval. The best mode of procedure would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, for nobody disputed the principle of it.

MR. CLIVE said, he thought that County Boards should be elective, but that they should consist of few members, as that would be more conducive to economy—the great object of the Bill. He differed from his right hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Bruce). He thought that, as a rule, the finance business of counties was not conducted in a hurried manner. But he believed the difference could be accounted for in this way, that his right hon. Friend was chiefly connected with a manufacturing county, while the county with which he (Mr. Clive) was connected was purely agricultural. He objected to many of the details of the Bill, and he believed one advantage in sending it to a Select Committee would be, that it would be rendered much shorter.

MR. READ said, he was glad that so much unanimity was shown in the House in favour of the old constitutional principle that taxation and representation should go together. Allowing the Courts of Quarter Sessions to levy a rate was as objectionable in principle, as it would be to allow the House of Lords to tax the country. As to the dual principle, he would state, as far as his own experience went, that the magistrates and elected members worked very harmoniously together. They were told, as an argument against his Bill, that the landlord paid all the rates. That might be very good in theory, but it certainly was not entirely so in practice; for if 50 per cent were deducted from the poor rates the landlords might soon come to claim the advantage of it; yet if 1*d.* or 2*d.* were saved upon the county rate it would assuredly go into the tenants' own pocket. At the same time, he did not doubt but that the magistrates very generally managed the county expenditure with great economy; he knew they did so in Norfolk, and he believed their management would contrast favourably with that of town councils and other borough expenditure. But, on principle, the elective system ought to be introduced. Believing that permissive legislation was the worst of legislation, he objected to the Bill because it was permissive. Some of the details of the Bill were objectionable, and a few of them were actually mischievous. He therefore thought the hon. Member for Bodmin would do well to act on the suggestion of the Home Secretary; and in the name of the farmers of England he thanked the hon. Gentleman for introducing the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he also was glad to see so decided an agreement in the principle of the Bill. He hoped his hon. Friend would accept the offer made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He knew that in doing so his hon. Friend would be making a great sacrifice, now that a general assent was given to the principle of his Bill. But he hoped his hon. Friend would see that in this way he was more likely to attain the object he had in view; for it was now plain that no Bill would pass through Parliament this year; and if the question were ever to be properly settled it must be taken up by the Government of the country. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Clive), though he (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not represent an agricultural constituency, he represented a borough which, not having a separate Quarter Sessions, was rated by the county magistrates; and he was of opinion that the time had come when they must apply self-government, as regarded local affairs, to counties as well as to boroughs. For his part, he would rather deal even with the mistakes of elected bodies than with the most common-sense arrangements issued from the Home Office; because in the former case the feelings of the people would be with the Board. He trusted the result of this debate would be, not only to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, but that various other questions in connection with it would receive full consideration. He did not believe that, by any change that might be made, they would get a better or more economical expenditure than they had from the county magistrates. He believed that under an elective system they would have the same men to regulate these affairs, but with more power

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that so far as his own experience or observation went, the privilege of county magistrates to look after the county expenditure might be looked upon in the light of a damnosa hereditas. The duty was troublesome and onerous. As to the complaints made against the system, he agreed with those who represented it as a sentimental grievance. The noble Lord (Lord Henley) had stated the case with great clearness and fairness. The difficulty experienced was not that the magistrates spent too much, but rather that they could not be induced to spend what they ought to do, especially in the matter of prosecutions. Besides, most of the county expenditure was statutory, and not in the control of the magistrates; and he believed the utmost saving that could be effected would not amount to more than 2*d.* in the pound. The whole question was one of the administration of details. What was wanted was to satisfy any feeling existing in the country on the subject, and at the same time to preserve an effective machinery for business. He would recommend that a limited number of elected members should be added to the board of magistrates, where their advice and assistance would be given with great advantage. This Bill, containing 140 clauses, was not calculated, in his opinion, to effect the object in view. He hoped the hon. Member who introduced the Bill would be satisfied with the expression of opinion which had been evoked, and would act in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State. There was no desire on the part of the magistrates of this country to conceal anything from the ratepayers, their only wish being to secure celerity in the transaction of public business.

MR. WHALLEY said, he understood that the last Speaker was opposed to the principle of the Bill. [Mr. SCOURFIELD: No.] The recommendation of the Secretary of State, that the general subject should be investigated by a Select Committee, was but a courteous way of shelving the Bill altogether. No question had ever been so frequently discussed, and under so many forms, as the present. The grievance had been spoken of as a sentimental one, but he was sure it was a practical grievance as well. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the matter, and allow this Bill to go before a Select Committee.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE approving the principle of the Bill, and not desiring the subject to be shelved, hoped the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his bill and that the House would unanimously assent to the proposal of the Government. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bruce), that the business at Quarter Sessions was usually transacted hurriedly. In the county with which he was connected, at all events, the greatest possible attention was paid to the county business and expenditure. He was likewise unable to concur in the remark of the right hon. Gentleman, that other property than land paid the greater portion of the rates. He hoped, indeed, that such a state of things would soon exist, but he feared that it did not at present. "The wish was father to the thought." In the counties with which he was acquainted the land and houses bore all the large and daily increasing burdens borne by parochial and county rates. It had been said by the hon. Member for East Norfolk (Mr. Read), that the dual principle had been found to work well wherever it was applied. But though it might do so in the case of Boards of Guardians, Cattle Plague Boards, Highway Boards and the like, it might not do so in the case to which it was now sought to apply it. It must be remembered that while the ratepayers were for the most part irresponsible persons, the magistrates were responsible for the peace of the county, for the safe custody of prisoners, and for the care of lunatics, as well as for the buildings; and they must see that the proper amount of money was spent for those purposes.

MR. THOMAS PAGET said, there were two points which he considered to be highly objectionable in the Bill. The first was the permissive clause, and the second was the placing the representation in the hands of those who were themselves representatives of others. The elections, he thought, ought in every case to be directly made by those who were interested in the question. He therefore thought it wiser that the hon. Member should withdraw his Bill on the understanding that the whole subject should be taken up by a Committee. But he should feel bound to support the hon. Member if he proceeded to a division.

MAJOR PARKER said, he did not deny the expediency of forming Financial Boards, but he wished to say that, whether the power of arranging county finances remained, as at present, in the hands of the magistrates, or whether a large ratepaying element were introduced, the influence and power of the local authorities would be exercised to little purpose so long as the Government were permitted to interfere with the magistrates, as in the case of the inspection of gaols. He had been led to make these observations in consequence of a very objectionable course which was taken in the western district of Suffolk, which he had the honour to represent, and which course had led to a lengthened memorial from the magistrates to the Home Secretary. That memorial might perhaps be under the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman at the present moment. He ventured to hope that the remarks which had fallen from several hon. Members in the course of this discussion might have some influence in inducing the right hon. Gentleman to weigh the matter well before he came to any decision upon it.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, that though he gave his assent to the proposal before the House, he did so most unwillingly, and he regretted the course that had been taken. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had informed him the other day that he could not consent to refer his Bill to a Select Committee, because it had not been printed. He (Sir William Gallwey) could not disguise from himself the fact that the House might almost be said to be a body of magistrates, and they seemed to think that a question affecting the interests of ratepayers might be postponed for any length of time. There was a strong feeling out of doors, among those who were deeply interested in the matter, that it ought to be dealt with as soon as possible. He was unable to discern any reason why the Select Committee should not make his and his hon. Friend's Bill the basis of its investigations.

MR. SPEAKER interposed, and remarked that this was not the time for the hon. Member to discuss the question of the Bill going to a Select Committee. That could only be considered when the Bill had been read a second time.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said that was undoubtedly so, but the Secretary of State for the Home Department had already stated the course he meant to take with regard to his Motion when it came forward. However, for the purpose of the present argument, he would simply assume that the Secretary of State might decide that the principle of a Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. Now, what valid reasons would there be against adopting such a course? If the Committee had something substantial to consider there would be a much greater chance of attaining the objects in view than if it had merely to decide upon an abstract question of principle, which, indeed, had been already discussed before more than one Committee. It had been asserted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that the landlords, either themselves or by their tenants, contributed very largely to the rates of the county; but he entirely denied that landlords paid anything vicariously by their tenants. Would any man say that the rents of farms had been lowered in consequence of the payment of rates by the tenants under the Union Chargeability Act? Indeed, if the tenants did not pay rates, why were they called upon to fill the office of guardian?

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Wyld) was entitled to have the principle of the Bill verified in the ordinary way. If that were done it might then be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would divide the House, in which event he should certainly follow him into the Lobby. It appeared to him that the Government were simply trifling with the question. The Leaders on either side of the House were wont to give advice to independent Members, and why should not the latter occasionally give advice to their Leaders? For his own part, he did not care either for his Leader or his party. He had independent opinions of his own, and always expressed them; and in the present instance he clearly thought the House ought to divide on the second reading. He had never been a magistrate, and had no desire to be one as long as magistrates were unpaid. The magistrates might generally do their business pretty well; though he confessed that, looking at certain recent appointments, they were not exactly the sort of persons he should like to trust. At all events, the ratepayers naturally wished to have some control over the application of their own money. What was the use of introducing Bills if those who had charge of them did not divide upon them. He should support the second reading, if it were only to show the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench that they should not take everything into their hands. They wished to take everything and to give nothing. Adverting to the useless debates which had lately consumed the time of the House, the hon. and learned Member remarked that, unless they made more rapid progress with the business, it would be impossible to have a dissolution for two or three years.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, he hoped the House would not attribute any weight whatever to the remarks just made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had but just entered the House, and, consequently, had not heard the discussion.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE remarked, that he had been in the House for an hour and a quarter.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT said, he thought it an unfortunate thing that the unanimity of the House should be disturbed by remarks like those which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was agreed on all hands that the Bill was good in principle, but that it was not in working trim, and therefore the proposition made by the Government had been almost unanimously acceded to.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that in order to give his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State an opportunity of again addressing the House, he would formally move for the appointment of a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted,"—(The Judge Advocate,)

—instead thereof.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that in 1853 a Bill, similar to the present, was referred to a Select Committee, but nothing resulted from it. He now proposed that an inquiry should be made into the whole subject, in order that the Government might have the information necessary to enable them to bring forward a satisfactory measure.

MR. WYLD said, there had been a unanimous expression of opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill, though several Members had pointed out that some of the details were faulty—an objection always made when a measure was introduced by a private Member. He was quite willing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, in order that the details might be amended. He confessed, that the proposal of the Secretary of State was somewhat disappointing to him. He was, however, willing to assent to the proposition of the Government if it was to be understood that, on the Resolutions of the Committee being reported to the House, the Government would undertake the duty of bringing in a Bill. He added that the question was one which the Government ought to take in hand; it affected most important interests; and the present state of things was felt by a large, wealthy, and influential body to be a grievance. A measure of this kind ought never to be in the hands of a private Member. The promoters of this Bill would be delighted to afford the Government every assistance.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not possibly pledge himself and the Government as to what should be done. He presumed the Committee would inquire into the subject, and, when they had reported, the Government would be able to consider the question thoroughly. The views of the Committee and those of the Government might not be in accordance, or the Committee might be in direct opposition to the hon. Member.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE was dissatisfied with the answer of the Home Secretary, and insisted upon a division.

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 154: Majority 108.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted.—(The Judge Advocate.)

PEERAGE (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 83.]

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, he wished to state its provisions and to explain the principles on which it was based. Many persons had asked, "What has the House of Commons to do with the Irish Peerage?" forgetting that it was constituted and regulated by an Act of which they had heard much during the last few weeks—namely, the Act of Union; and no alteration of the existing arrangements could be made without an Act of Parliament. There was nothing in the objection that this Bill ought to have been introduced into the House of Lords in the first instance. The Act of Union was brought forward first in the Houses of Commons of England and Ireland, and passed through them before it went to the Upper Houses. The first object of the Bill was to prevent the creation of any more Irish Peers. At the time of the Union the Irish Peerage was placed in the same position as the Scotch Peerage at the time of the Union in this respect, that instead of all Irish Peers having seats in the other House, it was arranged that the Irish Peerage should be represented by the election of a number of Peers. There was, however, this difference—that at the time of the Union with Scotland, the creation of any more Scotch Peers was prevented, while at the time of the Union with Ireland the right to create Irish Peers was preserved to a certain limited extent. The power of the Crown to create Irish Peers was forced upon the Irish House of Lords by the Duke of Portland. The objections urged against this power by the then Irish Peers were so strong that Lord Cornwallis wrote to the Duke of Portland expressing fears lest the Act of Union should be imperilled, and suggesting the compromise which was ultimately adopted. That was that the Crown should be at liberty to create one Peer for every three Peerages that might become extinct, and that when the number of Peers was reduced to 100, the Crown might create as many as it pleased to keep the number up at 100. It was popularly believed that the number must be kept up at 100; but the maintenance of that number was discretionary, and not compulsory. He hoped the Peerages of Scotland and Ireland would ultimately be united with the Peerage of England. At the time of the Union with Scotland there were 154 Peers of Scotland. Since then 76 Peerages had expired, and, deducting those that had been made British Peerages, there remained 36 Scotch Peers, of whom 16 were representative Peers, leaving only a small residue without seats in the Upper House.

At the time of the Union with Ireland there were 228 Irish Peerages, of which 60 had become extinct, leaving a remainder of 168, of which about 80 had been made British Peerages. He believed there were now 111 pure Peers of Ireland, and only 28 being representative Peers, 83 had no seats. Since the Act of Union 18 Peers had been created. To prevent any further creations was the first object of the Bill. If any Irishman was worthy of being created a Peer, he was worthy of the full rights of the Peerage and of a seat in the House of Lords. The Irish Peer occupied an extraordinary position. He had only the right of voting for one of the 23 representative Peers, and he was deprived of the ordinary privileges of citizenship, because he could not take part in the financial business of his country, and he could not be a Member of the House of Commons for any place in Ireland, though he might represent an English constituency. Therefore, unless he could secure election in England it was impossible for him to discharge any of the ordinary duties of his position. For these reasons the Irish Peerage ought not to be maintained, and to limit its continuance he proposed to prevent any new creations. He did not propose to interfere with promotion in the Irish Peerage, but he did propose to make some alterations in the present system of representative Peers. The representative Irish Peers were at present elected for life; but in Scotland the representative Peers were elected for one Parliament. Although an Irish representative Peer might succeed to a British Peerage, he still remained a representative Peer; and a case had occurred in which a representative Peer was for nearly two years in a lunatic asylum, there being no power to elect another until his death. No Scotch Peer who succeeded to a British Peerage could remain a representative Peer. If a representative Peerage of Ireland were to remain, as it must until the whole Irish Peerage became extinct or was absorbed in the British Peerage, it ought to be made truly representative as it was in Scotland; and he, therefore, proposed, without interfering with the existing rights of life Peers, that all elections after the passing of the Bill should be for a Parliament only; that any representative Peer becoming a British Peer by creation or succession, should, ipso facto, cease to be a representative Peer; and that if any representative Peer become mentally incapacitated, his seat should be declared vacant. He also proposed that a representative Peer might resign his position if he chose to do so. At present an elected Peer could not resign, but must hold office for life, even although he might be elected against his will. He further proposed that in the election of representative Peers cumulative voting should be introduced, so as to secure the representation of the minority. He would enable any Peer to give to one candidate as many votes as there were vacancies. At present the minority was wholly unrepresented, and it was impossible that that injustice could be remedied, as it was said to be in the House of Commons, by the Member for one constituency representing the minority in another. At present, he believed the election to the Irish Peerage was a mere matter of nomination, and the late Prime Minister appointed all the Irish Peers. [The Earl of Mayo: No.] Whether that were so or not, no one could be elected unless he professed those extreme Radical opinions which found favour on the Treasury Bench, and a moderate Conservative like those that sat at this side of the House had not the slightest chance of being elected. If this proposal of cumulative voting were adopted with respect to the Irish Peerage, he hoped it would be applied to the Scotch Peerage. A Scotch Peer could not sit for any place in England, Scotland, or Ireland; and if he did not belong to the dominant party he had no chance of being elected a representative Peer. The noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland (the Earl of Mayo) could hardly favour the continued creation of Irish Peers, which was only forced upon the Irish Peers at the time of the Union, that the Crown might have an additional means of conferring favour upon English supporters; for if the noble Earl could not find a seat in England or Scotland he would be excluded from public life, could take no part in the public business of his country, and would be compelled to vegetate upon his property. Prevent the further creation of Peers and in time the Irish Peerage would become extinct, naturally, as well as by the creation of British Peers, and in this way the Peerages of the three kingdoms would become amalgamated. Even if the House of Lords were increased by the number of the Scotch and Irish Peers (which he did not propose by this Bill) it would not be a large body compared with others. There were 466

Peers, including the recent creations; deducting Irish and Scotch representative Peers, Peers of the blood Royal, and Bishops, the whole British Peerage consisted of 385 persons; and the House of Commons consisted of 658 Members, whom it was proposed to increase to 666. It was a curious fact that there remained only 97 Peerages that were created before the accession of George III. Even if a large addition were made to the House of Lords, it was unlikely that it would be cumbersome or too large for the transaction of public business. The number of representative Peers ought to be increased, and if the Bill reached the House of Lords, it would be competent for their Lordships to introduce a clause increasing their number, and he hoped they would.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

COLONEL FRENCH opposed the Motion. The Bill was an attempt to interfere with Her Majesty's Prerogative, and a violation of the agreement made between the two countries at the time of the Union. The same proposal was made by his hon. and learned Friend last Session, though then in the form of a Resolution instead of a Bill. He had not heard from his hon. and learned Friend—either on that occasion or on this—any sufficient reason for the change. His hon. and learned Friend proposed to amalgamate the English and Irish Peerages, but the two Peerages were totally distinct. Many of the Irish Peers owned no land in this country, and had no ties connecting them with England; and he did not see why they should become English Peers. On the other hand, there were many distinguished Irishmen who had a claim to the Peerage of their own country, but none whatever to the Peerage of this country. Though some of the objections urged by the hon. and learned Baronet to the present state of things with regard to the Irish Peerage were sound and ought to be considered by the Government, he (Colonel French) did not think that this endeavour to abolish the Irish Peerage would meet with approval in Ireland, and he was surprised to find an Irishman proposing such a measure. He hoped the Government would give no support or encouragement to the Bill, and he moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel French.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the House ought to hear from the Speaker whether a Bill of this sort, which directly limited the Prerogative of the Crown, could be entertained without the assent of the Crown.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was about to ask the same question. He believed that the practice was settled, and that, though this Bill might go up to the last stage without receiving the Royal assent, it could not go beyond that stage. He did not think it was a measure that was at all pressing in its character; and could not undertake to advise Her Majesty's assent to its progress. Considering, therefore, the great pressure of other and more important business, he appealed to the hon. and learned Baronet not to proceed with it.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER rose to order—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct in stating that, according to the practice of Parliament, a measure to limit the Prerogative of the Crown could not pass a third reading, unless the consent of the Crown had first been obtained.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that if the Government had determined not to advise Her Majesty to assent to this measure, it was useless to proceed to a division. He had been more anxious to bring the matter forward than to press the second reading; and, hoping that in the new Parliament it would meet with more success, he would for the present withdraw it.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL.—[BILL 68.]

(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved the insertion of a clause providing that the Act should not apply to cases in which the freeholder had successfully instituted proceedings and carried out necessary repairs. He believed that the Bill required far greater consideration by competent persons than it had yet received, and that in its present form it would not work.

New Clause (Act not to apply to cases in which freeholder has successfully instituted proceedings and carries out necessary repairs,)—(Sir Francis Goldsmid,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. AYRTON said, that when the Bill was last before the House, the Government promised to examine its provisions and satisfy themselves whether it would work satisfactorily. He would be glad to know from the Attorney General, whether that examination had been made, and if so, what was the result?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that having spent some time in the examination of the Bill, he had come to the conclusion that its provisions were unworkable. The hon. and learned Gentleman was proceeding to explain, by reference to the interpretation clause and other clauses, the difficulties which would arise with regard to the terms "lessee" and "owner" when—

MR. SPEAKER ruled, that the question at present being, whether this particular clause should pass, a general argument could hardly be allowed upon that question.

MR. AYRTON moved the adjournment of the debate in order that the preliminary question might be considered, whether in its present form this Bill should be allowed to pass? There was an understanding when the Bill was last before the House, that the Government would make inquiry and satisfy themselves whether the Bill would work. The Attorney General ought to be put in order, for the purpose of making that explanation.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS seconded the Motion for adjourning the debate. He thought it a loss of time to discuss the Bill as it stood.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, referring to the clause moved by the hon. Baronet, said, that in the present state of the Bill it only made the confusion in the Bill worse confounded.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, this Bill had passed through a Select Committee, and on two occasions had occupied the attention of the House at great length. During the whole of this time not the slightest intimation was given that there would by-and-by be such an explosion of legal difficulties. At this stage of the Bill he thought it would be idle to revise and re-consider the whole scope of the clauses. Therefore having done all in his power to carry the Bill, he must now lay upon the Government the responsibility of rejecting it. The Bill had been before the House for weeks, and he must ask the Government to consider, whether it was to the interest of the community that a large portion of the Session should have been wasted upon the measure, in consequence of their Legal Advisers discovering, at the last moment, invincible objections to it. He was astonished at this sudden change of tactics on the part of the Government; but if the Attorney General would confer with the framers of the Bill, the legal and technical objections which he had raised might yet be overcome.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that when this Bill was last discussed the understanding on the part of the Government was that the Law Advisers of the Crown should be requested to consider the particular question then raised. The Attorney General had endeavoured to state the result of that consideration to-day. The pledge given by the Government had therefore been strictly carried out. The Government were really anxious that a Bill of this public importance should pass into law; but of course it could only be on the understanding that it was properly framed to effect the object it had in view. He would suggest that the debate should be adjourned, not with the object of defeating a Bill in which the Government felt an interest, but in order that the Attorney General might confer with the framers of the measure and try to amend it.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, the Bill was a hastily drawn one, which would be likely to do harm instead of good. He begged leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. POWELL said, that in justice to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he must state it was an entire misconception to suppose that he was hostile to the Bill. At a late hour last night he had had a conference with his hon. and learned Friend, who expressed himself friendly to the general principle of the measure, but raised considerable objections to points of detail. If anyone imagined that it was possible to accomplish the object in view by the use of language which was not legally and technically correct he would find himself very much mistaken. He had said on many occasions that there were objections of a very grave nature to be overcome. Some of those objections had been removed, but others still remained. He thought that the originators of the Bill were under an obligation to the First Law Officer of the Crown for the attention he had given to the subject, because the result would be that a more perfect measure would be passed. He hoped that some delay might be allowed in order that the efforts of those who had interested themselves in the measure might not be attended with disappointment.

MR. CANDLISH said, his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) had misapprehended the object of the Attorney General, who did not wish to defeat the Bill, but only took exception to its machinery. It was most important for the proper working of the measure that its machinery should be as perfect as possible.

MR. AYRTON said, he would beg to remind the House that, very early in the discussions on the Bill, he had pointed out that it was full of technical obscurities affecting the rights of real property, and that it would be absolutely necessary that the clauses which dealt with that subject should be very carefully revised by some competent conveyancer. He thought the Government had only done their duty in the course which they had taken.

MR. BRUCE said, he had no doubt that the noble Lord the Chief Commissioner of Works had strictly redeemed his pledge, and that the Attorney General had correctly stated the defects of the Bill as regarded freeholders and successive leaseholders. He hoped that in any conference which might take place something more than the strict law of the question would be considered, and that policy would be also taken into account. His own opinion was that persons who had allowed their property to get into a state which was detrimental to the health of the population were not entitled to the same consideration as those who had not been guilty of such laches.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the difficulties connected with the question were so great that if attention was confined to technicalities it would be impossible to pass any Bill at all on the subject. The measure was one to which the people of the country were looking forward with great interest.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that whatever the views of the Government were, the metropolis was, in the main, opposed to the Bill. Not that any indifference was felt to the improvement of the dwellings of artizans, but it was thought that this Bill would not effect the object in view. The parishes had no confidence in the Metropolitan Board of Works, which was charged with carrying out the Bill, and they did not see why the City of London should be excepted from its operation. He could tell the House that, at the present moment, there was a notorious bill discounter who was buying up, on speculation, those houses with which the Bill would have to deal, in order to sell them again. Unless not only legal but substantial alterations were made in the Bill he should vote against it.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought it unfortunate that the objections now raised by the Attorney General had not been made at an earlier period, before so much time was bestowed on the consideration of the details of the Bill. He felt bound to say in defence of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) that he was over-ruled in Committee on the point of allowing the parishes to carry out the Bill. The reason why the City was excepted was because in the City the works required had been done, and no less than £84,000 had been spent on the dwellings of the poor. He challenged the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Labouchere) to point out any district in the metropolis which had done the same. He would say boldly that the parishes were not as competent to deal with the subject as the City; for the parish authorities had been only ten years in existence, while the City authorities had existed for hundreds of years. He hoped if the Bill was to be re-considered its principle would be taken as settled.

MR. GREENE said, he agreed with those who thought that the policy of the Bill should be assumed. The main object was the improvement of the sanitary condition of the poor, and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Merthyr Tydfil (Mr. Bruce) in thinking that men who had neglected their property to the injury of the public health were not deserving of the consideration to which others were entitled. He had observed that though the hon. Members for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis) and the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had never directly opposed the Bill, they had taken every opportunity of throwing cold water upon it. [Mr. HARVEY LEWIS: No, no!]

MR. AYRTON denied that the hon. Gentleman was justified in saying that he had thrown cold water on the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN entreated hon. Gentlemen to enter into this question in a large and conciliatory spirit. The town clerk of Liverpool, who had been examined before the Select Committee, had stated that the Bill would be of inestimable advantage to that great city. He knew several other great towns to which it would be of the greatest benefit.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the recommendation that more time should be given for the consideration of one or two clauses was very reasonable. The hon. Member who had brought in the Bill knew that he (Mr. Henley) had done what he could to get the measure through. But the subject was very difficult, and it must be recollected that this year the Bill had not met with any unreasonable delay, but had gone through its stages very quickly. It should also be borne in mind that, with any measure which touched property, it was far better to take time so as to put the clauses into shape than to run the risk of the Bill foundering in "another place" on a matter of that kind. The hon. Gentleman knew what trouble the Select Committee had with the subject, and how one scheme after another was put by; and he would be well advised to allow these clauses to be well considered, so that there might be no difficulty afterwards in the working of the Bill. It would be ten times more likely to do good if they did not offend the prejudices of people who might be affected by the measure. It was easier to lead people than to drive them; and if they saw that their interests had not been neglected they would be much more likely to give their assistance in carrying out the Bill.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

MUNICIPAL RATE (EDINBURGH) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. M'LAREN, Bill to amend the Act of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of the reign of Her Majesty, chapter fifty, by abolishing a rate imposed by the said Act on all occupiers of premises within the extended municipal boundaries of the city of Edinburgh, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'LAREN, Mr. DUNLOP, and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 99.]

COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

(The Earl Russell.)

(NO. 55.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

EARL RUSSELL said, he had already intimated that, although he should have preferred that the Bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole House, he should not object to the Amendment of which the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal had given notice to refer it to a Select Committee. He did so, of course, on the understanding that the declaration made by the noble Earl, and also by the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury), as well as by the Lord Chancellor, that the principle of the Bill would be adhered to, and that the Amendments proposed would be in the spirit of carrying out that declaration, so that the Bill might become an Act of Parliament, and were not to be made with the view of destroying the Bill altogether. It was on that understanding only that he agreed to the Amendment of the noble Earl. He would only further say that two points seemed absolutely essential—the one was that the compulsory power for collecting church rates should be abolished, and the other was that the Church of England should have the most convenient means which legislation could afford for collecting the funds necessary for those objects to which church rates were devoted. These were the objects of the Bill, and he hoped they would be carried out by the Bill as it came from the hands of the Select Committee.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."
—(Earl Russell.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that he was obliged to the noble Earl for assenting to the House going into Committee upstairs; because he was quite sure that they would be more likely to arrive at the object sought on both sides by that means; and that they would thus be able to make a comparatively good measure of it much more easily than could be done in a Committee of the whole House.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he regretted extremely that his noble Friend (Earl Russell) had assented to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee; for he was quite sure that the measure could be properly discussed in a Committee of the Whole House, and indeed that it was necessary for the public excitement that there should be such a discussion. The matter was of great public interest, and there was no subject that would have given the country a more favourable opportunity of judging how their Lordships perform their public duties than this question of church rates. Some of the speeches made on the second reading showed how admirably their Lordships were qualified to discuss such a question; and besides, in the House they had the assistance of all the right rev. Prelates, whilst in a Select Committee they would have but three or four of them. He ventured to say that the course which he suggested to their Lordships in 1860 was the one which it would be most proper to pursue on this subject; and that was to put an end to compulsory church rates—which was the object of this measure—and afterwards to introduce a Bill to regulate such voluntary assessments as should be made in lieu of church rates—that was a matter to which neither the Dissenters nor anybody else could object;

but he thought that it would be much better to enact these regulations by a separate Bill. The main object of the present Bill was the abolition of church rates; and he was glad to see that upon the right rev. Bench there was an altered tone to that which prevailed there in 1860. He himself had always thought that for the sake of the Church, church rates should be abolished. There was no proper objection to the majority taxing the minority—the real objection was on religious grounds; and he thought that the Church had done quite right in consenting to abolish church rates now; for he believed that every contest about church rates made an additional number of Dissenters. The objection on the score of religious feeling once put aside, it would be perfectly easy to make satisfactory regulations for voluntary assessment. But this Bill did not contain clauses such as he should like to see passed upon that subject. He thought there was some confusion which would require to be carefully adjusted. He hoped that it was not intended to take evidence before the Committee, but merely to consider the clauses. The Bill had been called a compromise, but it was really no compromise at all; it was a concession made by the Church to the religious feeling of the country. It was much more likely that it was a compromise in the Cabinet. Lord Stanley had declared his opinion against the levying of church rates, in writing and in speaking, and it might be that the Bill was to be referred to a Select Committee to get out of any difficulty upon that head. He feared that the delay arising from having a Select Committee might end in the rejection of the Bill—a result which would produce great danger to the Church. It was most desirable that the public should know that there would be no evasion, and that their Lordships would follow the lead of the other House and settle this question at once and for ever.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he could not but think that the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) would have been much more appropriate if made on the second reading of the Bill. The noble Lord could not forego the opportunity of drawing a comparison between the Bill which he had himself introduced some years ago—and to which, no doubt, he had a laudable partiality—and the measure now under discussion. But he (the Duke of Richmond) had no doubt the Bill now to be referred to a Select Committee would be found, when it came out of Committee, a better measure than that which the noble Lord introduced on a former occasion. The noble Lord had stated, as a reason why this Bill was assented to by the Government, that it was a sort of compromise among the Members of the Cabinet. Unfortunately for the Cabinet, they had not the benefit of having the noble Lord among them. If they had that advantage, the noble Lord would be able to state his opinion to the Cabinet; until, however, he favoured them by belonging to that body, he could not be accepted in that House as the organ of Her Majesty's Ministers. But the noble Lord regretted that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and said that the public out-of-doors would think their Lordships incapable of dealing with a measure of this description, because it was so referred; but only two sentences after the noble Lord contradicted himself, because he said it had been ably discussed by the most rev. Prelate and those who followed him. He also gave the most conclusive reasons why the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, because he said there was great confusion in its various clauses, that would require great care in their adjustment. He (the Duke of Richmond) agreed with the noble Lord that there was some confusion in regard to particular clauses; for instance, the second clause, according to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, was such as no one could well understand; and the Bill dealt with a great number of local Acts, the operation of which a Select Committee, constituted as, no doubt, this would be, was a much better tribunal for discussing than a Committee of the Whole House. The purpose for which it was proposed to send the Bill to a Select Committee was in order that all those parts of the Bill which were at present obscure might be made clear, and in adopting that mode of proceeding there was not the least intention to smother the Bill. It was with these views that he was glad the House had acceded to the proposition for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought it should be clearly understood for what purpose the Bill was sent to a Select Committee. In his opinion, the object of referring the Bill to a Select Committee was not for the purpose of taking evidence, as the general principle of the Bill was well understood; but for the purpose of arranging and perfecting those clauses which provided for the voluntary collection of church rates, and of examining and considering those other clauses which affected local Acts, so that nothing might be done indirectly which was not intended to be done directly.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that, as the Bill was not a Government measure, it was not for him to state what course the investigation in the Committee might take; but it might be necessary for the Committee, without going into the general question as to whether church rates should be voluntary or not, to take evidence in reference to the effect of the Bill on local Acts.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

And, on Friday, May 1, the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

Ld. Chancellor	E. Beauchamp
L. Abp. York	E. Russell
Ld. Privy Seal	E. Kimberley
D. Somerset	V. Halifax
D. Richmond	L. Bp. London
D. Buckingham and Chandos	L. Bp. Oxford
E. Shaftesbury	L. Bp. Carlisle
E. Carnarvon	L. Delamere
E. Romney	L. Stanley of Alderley
	L. Westbury.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

PASSENGER ACTS.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAVES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he is aware that large numbers of passengers embark on board certain Foreign Transatlantic Steamers at Southampton without their being subjected to the provisions of the Passenger Acts; and, if there are any reasons why the provisions of those Acts should not be put in force with regard to such steamers in the same way in every respect as that in which such provisions are put in force in regard to British vessels?

Mr. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, he had taken pains to ascertain from the Mayor of Southampton what was the state of the case. He found that no British subjects were taken on board foreign transatlantic steamers at Southampton; but foreigners did come by small steamers to Southampton, from Havre and other continental ports, for the purpose of taking ship to America. The question of the applicability of the Passenger Acts was submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown in 1857, and an elaborate Opinion was obtained from them to the effect that those Acts did not apply to passengers shipped in transitu. The vessels in question, however, were overhauled on reaching the American port, and the Government of the United States had applied to Her Majesty's Government to make the terms of our Passenger Acts, which were less rigorous than theirs, more strict.

COAL FOR THE NAVY.—QUESTION.

Mr. HEADLAM said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is correct that in the Form of Tender issued by the Admiralty for Coals to be supplied to Her Majesty's Dockyards for the year commencing May 1868, for the use of the Steam Vessels in the Navy, the only Coals named therein are those from Wales; if so, why, after the Reports made at Devonport, and the recommendations contained therein, as to the use of North Country Coals in Her Majesty's ships of war, these have been excluded?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is quite correct in his statement; the Admiralty have this year reverted to the policy of supplying nothing but smokeless coal to steam vessels in the navy. This decision was arrived at in consequence of the strong representations received by them from the Commanders in Chief of the foreign squadrons, setting forth the great advantages possessed by the smokeless coals for all purposes of steam navigation: I may tell the right hon. Gentleman that bituminous coal is still on the Admiralty list, and is largely used for dockyard purposes.

VICTORIA—CASE OF THE CONVICT MILLAR.—QUESTION.

Mr. HURST said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any Report has yet been received from the Governor of Victoria on the case of George Millar, a prisoner at Melbourne under a sentence which is alleged to be illegal; if such Report has been received, what is the nature of it, and whether there is any objection to lay it upon the Table; and, if no Report has yet been received, when it may be expected?

Mr. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that a Report on the subject of Millar's sentence had been received in this country, in the May of last year. It stated that the Attorney General of the Colony of Victoria had consulted the Judges before whom Millar was tried, and agreed with them that the sentence should not be commuted. The Government in this country, thinking the question rather doubtful, referred it to the Law Officers of the Crown, who reported that, though there was doubt on the question, they considered the punishment excessive; the question being whether, on an indictment for fraudulent insolvency, the terms of punishment could be made cumulative on each of the four counts. The punishment awarded by the Statute was fifteen years' transportation or three years' imprisonment, whereas the sentence was six years' imprisonment. The Government had therefore referred to the Governor and Judges of Victoria for the purpose of taking the best course in the circumstances, and to remit any excess in the length of the sentence.

INDIA—FURLOUGHS.—QUESTION.

Mr. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any alterations in the Indian Furlough System are contemplated; and, if so, when the Plan of the Government will be communicated to the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reply, said, it had been felt for some time that the Furlough Regulations for the Indian Service had become obsolete and required revision. In the early part of last autumn he had communicated with Sir John Lawrence on the subject, and also referred it to a Committee of the Council of India. But before that Committee had made much progress news came from Sir John Lawrence that he had appointed a similar Committee in India, which, in due time, sent home a very elaborate set of Rules. These were carefully considered by the Committee of the Indian Council; their principle was entirely approved, but alterations in points of detail were recommended. A Despatch setting forth these recommendations had been forwarded to the Governor General, who was authorized to publish the Rules, with such amendment as the Government might think necessary after taking the recommendations into consideration. Probably the new Rules as finally framed would shortly be received in this Country.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RIVER THAMES. QUESTIONS.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether there is any probability that the unsightly groups of piling which obstruct the River between Westminster Bridge and Hungerford will be removed; and, if so, when; and, whether he can state with whom the responsibility rests?

LORD OTHO FITZGERALD said, he also wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, with reference to the "Piling Obstructions in the River" mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's, If he would reply to the same query with reference to a much more formidable obstruction of the same nature that reaches full half-way across the River opposite Battersea Park, and has there existed for a much longer period?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE stated, in reply, that the piles alluded to by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's were erected by the Waterloo and Whitehall Railway Company under their Act of 1865. The works had been at a stand-still since October, 1866, and the Directors had stated at general meetings that they were without funds. Their powers expired in July, 1870. They had brought in a Bill for extension of time this Session, which the Thames Conservators had opposed, and the Company had agreed to a provision that all the works on the river should be completed by July, 1870. After that date the Board of Trade or the Conservators might remove the obstructions. With regard to the Question of the noble Lord the Member for Kildare, the obstruction off Battersea Park was the temporary staging of the Albert Bridge. The Act was passed in 1864, and the powers expired in 1869, when the obstruction might be removed in a similar manner. He was afraid the responsibility rested in both instances with the Committees of Parliament which passed the Bills.

SLAVE TRADE, ZANZIBAR.

QUESTION.

SIR FOWELL BUXTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Sultan of Zanzibar has lately offered to make any arrangements for the suppression of the Slave Trade between that island and the mainland; if any conditions were attached to his offer; and, if it has or has not been accepted by Her Majesty's Government; and, if not, for what reasons?

LORD STANLEY said, in reply, that if the hon. Member would refer to the State Papers published this year, pp. 112-114, he would find a full statement of the offer which had been made by the Sultan of Zanzibar, and of the conditions that accompanied them. Those proposals were still under consideration. Her Majesty's Government were fully aware of the desirableness of that offer, having in view the suppression of the Slave Trade. There were several questions, partly of policy and partly of good faith, to which it was impossible to shut their eyes, and which would, therefore, receive due attention at the India Office. A reference had been made of the whole question to the Government in India, but no answer had yet been received.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

MR. READ said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, When the final Report on the Cattle Plague, ordered by the Lords of the Council to be prepared by the Veterinary Department will be completed; and, if it is the intention of the Privy Council to place that Report upon the Table of the House?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU replied, that the Report was being prepared with as little delay as possible. The hon. Member was, perhaps, aware that all the compensation claims had not yet been decided, which delayed the completion of the statistical portion of the Report. He trusted, however, that the Report would be completed and laid upon the table before the end of the Session.

THE CONVICT BARRETT.—QUESTION.

MR. REARDEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to recommend to the Crown the respiting of the prisoner Michael Barrett, against whom a verdict of guilty was returned by the jury, and sentence of death passed by the Judge on his trial at the Old Bailey on the 27th instant, notwithstanding the sworn testimony of six witnesses, who proved that the prisoner was not in England at the time the crime was committed for which he has been found guilty, in order to afford the prisoner an opportunity of producing further evidence to establish his innocence?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I regret, Sir, that an hon. Member of this House should think it his duty to put such a Question to me. Under the circumstances, I think it my duty to decline to answer it.

MR. REARDEN announced his intention of calling the attention of the House to the subject.

ARMY—PROMOTIONS IN THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Why the promotions in the Coldstream Guards in succession to Captain and Lieutenant Colonel Clive have been delayed since the 14th of March; whether it is proposed that the present number of Lieutenants and Captains in that Regiment be reduced; and, if not, why has the Regiment been kept short of its proper complement of officers; and, whether there are in the Coldstream or other Regiments of Guards officers qualified by service to fill such vacancy?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the vacancy caused by the promotion of Captain and Lieutenant Colonel Clive has not been filled up; but there is no intention whatever to reduce the number of officers in that Regiment. When the vacancy occurred it was discovered that a very unusual state of affairs existed in the Regiment—one nearly without precedent; the six senior Ensigns of the Coldstream Guards were not qualified by service for their promotion, while of the whole sixteen Ensigns only two were so qualified—one of them standing seventh upon the list, and the other being, as it happened, the junior Ensign of the Regiment. The question then arose whether these two officers were entitled to have their claims to promotion over the heads of all their fellows recognized, the principle if noted upon in the case of the officer who stood seventh being, of course, binding on the other case also. Now the junior Ensign is an officer who has lately left the Rifle Brigade, and if he were to be promoted, he would be passed over the heads of sixty-seven officers of his late Regiment, the Rifle Brigade, and fourteen other officers in the Coldstream Guards, so that altogether he would have attained the rank of Captain in the Army over the heads of no less than eighty-one other officers. It was considered very undesirable that the course of promotion should be thus interfered with; and as only a few weeks will elapse before the senior Ensign will be qualified, it was thought better to wait before making the appointment.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it be true that the Royal Academy has nearly completed its premises at the back of Burlington House, and that they will be ready for the annual Exhibition of 1869, but that the Royal Academy will be unable to take possession of them until the Library of the Royal Society has been removed from Burlington House; and, whether he will take immediate steps to find proper accommodation for that Library, so that the Royal Academy may at the earliest period remove from the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square, in order that adequate space may be provided for the exhibition of the National Pictures?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the building for the Royal Academy behind Burlington House was being proceeded with very rapidly; but whether it would be ready in time for holding the Exhibition of 1869, owing to the shortness of the notice, he had not been able to ascertain. With regard to the very large Library belonging to the Royal Society, which consisted of something like 100,000 volumes, it was obvious that to ask the Royal Society to remove twice over so large and valuable a collection of books would be a course that could not be taken without grave necessity. If it were found impossible to complete the building in time for the Exhibition of 1869, he still hoped that some temporary arrangement might be made; and he could assure the hon.

IRELAND—PRESBYTERY OF ANTRIM. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES LANYON said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, Whether, when he presented a Petition on the 27th instant from the Presbytery of Antrim, in favour of his Resolutions, and against the further grant of the Regium Donum, he was aware that the said Presbytery is altogether unconnected with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, and that the said Presbytery is altogether an Unitarian body and does not represent the feeling of the Presbyterians of the General Assembly of Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I confess—I am stating my own opinion—it appears to me that a Question of this kind is well fitted for the hon. Gentleman if he pleases to produce it in a speech, but wholly unfitted to be directed to me. I may have been aware of these things. [“Oh, oh!”] I shall only say that I do not think it would be convenient for me to set the example of saying whether I was aware of that or not. It is enough for me to say that I believe I described that body with perfect accuracy as the non-subscribing Presbytery of Antrim, recipients of the Regium Donum. And I own I should have thought that the very words I used, “the non-subscribing Presbytery of Antrim,” would have conveyed to the mind of the hon. Member, and to the minds of other hon. Members, that that Presbytery did not belong to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which is, I believe, a subscribing Church.

SIR THOMAS BATESON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, If he is aware that the petition was signed only by the Moderator and the Clerk of the Presbytery; that those gentlemen did not appear on the face of the document to have had any authority to represent the Presbytery; and that the petition did not purport to have emanated from the general body?

MR. GLADSTONE: I own that I am quite at a loss to say anything of the courtesy of the hon. Gentleman in putting to me this Question without giving me notice. I am quite at a loss to comprehend its meaning. The Presbytery of Antrim,

I apprehend, is a body known to the law, and I can conceive nothing more regular than that the Presbytery should petition by means of a petition signed by the Moderator and Clerk of the Presbytery.

ROMAN CATHOLIC OATH. MOTION.

MR. FREVILLE SURTEES moved, “That the Oath taken by Roman Catholic Members previous to the alteration of the Oath on the 30th of April, 1866, be read by the Clerk at the Table.”

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the Motion.

MR. BOUVERIE: I rise to order. I am not about to speak upon the question my right hon. Friend has raised; but I apprehend that the practice of the House is clear. Any portion of an Act of Parliament that is in existence the Clerk may be called upon to read, provided that it be relevant to the subject-matter of debate. But something which has been repealed by Parliament, and which has no existence whatever on the statute book, he can be no more called upon to read than to read a passage from Hume's History of England, or any other book.

MR. SPEAKER: The only argument that could be urged for the Motion would be that there are some Members in the House who took the Oath in its original form.

MR. FREVILLE SURTEES: I apprehend that the Oath taken in 1865 by those Members who did then take it is still binding.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then I oppose the question upon its merits. I was so far sensible of the point raised by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie) that I did intend before proceeding to say anything to satisfy myself by a reference to you, Sir, that I am not interfering with a known and undoubted privilege of Members of this House. But it is the policy of this Motion to which I rise to object. My right hon. Friend has justly stated that this Oath is part of a law not now in force. Under such circumstances, it is enough for me, I think, to say that there is not the presumptive title to the reading of it at the table which there would be if it were a Law actually in force. And if there be no such presumptive title, and I am to ask myself with what object this Motion is made, and what good it can possibly produce if it were read, it appears to me to be only an attempt to stir up the embers of religious animosity, to narrow the privileges of Members of the House, and not only so, but to place what would seem to be the opinion of the House—though it might only be the opinion of the hon. Member himself—between the Roman Catholic Members of the House and the great and solemn duty they are now called upon to perform,—a duty which I trust and believe they will perform, exercising precisely the same powers and rights, and with exactly the same scope and breadth of freedom given to them as appertains to any one.

MR. DISRAELI: I will not attempt, Sir, to argue in favour of the objection raised by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock after your decision. But I confess I entirely sympathized with the objection taken; and I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Freville Surtees) will not persist in his Motion. If he wishes to refer to the historical document he has now asked for, he can do that in his speech. Every one must feel that every Roman Catholic Member is equitably bound to conform to the existing law, and to that alone. But I would remind my hon. Friend that it is in his power if he likes to refer in his speech to the document in question. I hope, therefore, he will not place this House in the position of going to a division in which, no doubt, the great Majority of Members would be upon the one side.

MR. FREVILLE SURTEES: You, Sir, have ruled that the Roman Catholic Members who took the Oath before the 30th of April, 1866, are bound by the Oath taken by Roman Catholic Members previously to that time, I beg to withdraw my Motion. ["No, no!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has misconceived my meaning. I gave no such decision as he apprehends. The House has undertaken to decide the Motion on its merits.

COMMITTEE.

Acts considered in Committee.

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Amendment again proposed,

To leave out from the first word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population,"—(Sir Frederick Heygate.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that even at the risk of wearying the Committee by a reiteration of arguments which had already been used, he should prefer to apply himself to points raised in this debate rather than to rummage volumes of Hansard or files of newspapers in order to establish charges of inconsistency against those who now advocated the destruction of the Irish Church. He did not think that the question before the Committee would be advanced by showing that any Member of that House had changed his opinion. It had been advanced on the Opposition side that those who opposed the Resolutions had not brought forward arguments in support of the existing ecclesiastical arrangements in Ireland. He submitted, however, that those who proposed to make a great change in the relations between Church and State in the United Kingdom were bound to show that such a change was desirable, rather than hon. Gentlemen on his side were bound to prove that the existing state of things could be defended. A state of things being in existence was prima facie an argument for its being continued; unless, indeed, they were to accept the paradox of Mr. Spurgeon, and argue that because the clergymen of the Irish Church were among the best of their order therefore the distinguished favour of disestablishment should be conferred upon them. Therefore, unless a good case were made out for the Resolutions, the Committee ought not to agree to them. In the matter there were two questions—one of establishment, and the other of endowment. Now, it must be remembered that the same reasoning which would justify the disendowment of the Established Church would also justify the disendowment of any other sect or religious body. With regard to these glebe lands of the Irish Church, which were given to it by the State, it might be argued that the State had a right to deal with them; but the main part of the revenue of that Church was derived from tithe, which never belonged to the State except as a fund which might be devoted to religious purposes; and since the payment of tithe was transferred to the landlords in 1834 he could not see that the impost was any grievance to the Roman Catholic people. The tithes formed a fund which had been devoted to religious purposes from the earliest period; and so long as they continued to be so applied neither the State nor the landlords had any right to them. He believed that the decrease of the Church revenues in Ireland, owing to the change made in 1834, had been more than commensurate with the decrease of the Church population in that country. If the revenues of the Church were to be taken by the State, the State ought to show, first, that in being devoted to the Church they are devoted to a bad object; and secondly, that they are capable of being applied to a better object. Now, he was unable to understand how any hon. Gentleman who was a member of the Established Church could consider that the funds of the Church in England were devoted to a good object, and that the revenues of the Church in Ireland were devoted to an object purely bad; although, of course, any one might argue that the revenues of the Church of Ireland were disproportionate, and that that Church ought to be content with less. But how could the surplus revenues be more beneficially expended? To apply them to the diminution of the poor rates would in reality be a benefit to the landlords and not to the people of Ireland. If, as had also been proposed, they were devoted to the purchase of land and the creation of a peasant proprietary, a certain amount of benefit might no doubt be conferred on the persons who were fortunate enough to become purchasers of the land; but would not such a proceeding tend to injure those who depended for their income on their manual labour, and who would have less chance of being employed if a peasant proprietary supplanted the large farmers? As to the suggestion that the Church revenues should be applied to secular education, he did not know of any proposal more calculated to set one class of the people of Ireland against another. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had proposed that something like three-fifths of its revenues should be left to the Church; but, although no doubt the right hon. Gentleman was serious in this intention, it certainly appeared to him to be a bribe for the purpose of keeping the Church dignitaries and clergymen quiet during their lives. It should be remembered, however, that the incomes of the clergy were not like the revenues derived from ordinary freeholds, but were paid for the performance of certain services, and it was from that point of view only that the vested rights of the clergy could be recognized. It was said, however, that the State had power to deal with this property because it frequently dealt with private property. But there was no force in this argument, as the State never interfered with private property without awarding ample compensation, which was not proposed to be given in the present instance. It was true the State had in many cases interfered with corporate property in order to provide for its better management, or to render it more efficient for purposes to which it had hitherto been devoted; and he saw no reason why the revenues of the Irish Church should not be dealt with in like manner, and for a similar object, after the Royal Commission had presented their Report. For his own part he extremely regretted that no action had been taken some three or four years ago by those who were interested in the Irish Church of correcting the anomalies that undoubtedly existed. Since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, the question had been brought forward several times by Members on the opposite side, and more than once he had experienced great difficulty in determining how he should give his vote, on account of his thinking that the present distribution of Church property in Ireland was indefensible. But when the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) brought forward his Motion, and declared himself in favour of disestablishment and disendowment, he felt it his duty to vote against it. The Establishment of the Protestant Church was said to be a relic of ascendancy; but in general there was not much harm in relics, and it would be difficult to show that this particular relic had done any real harm to anybody. The fact of the Church being Established in Ireland gave a right of precedence to the Archbishops and Bishops of that Church; but there was nothing whatever to prevent the Roman Catholic prelates from exercising their functions and assuming what titles they pleased, nor was there anything to prevent them from attending any public ceremonial. He could not see, therefore, how the Roman Catholic prelates were injured by the existence of the Establishment. The special correspondent of The Times stated, that on the occasion of the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to Ireland, the only reason which prevented Archbishop Cullen from being present at the grand ceremony in St. Patrick's Cathedral was the circumstance of St. Patrick's being a Protestant Cathedral. But it would be a far greater spoliation than was proposed or anticipated by the Member for South Lancashire if that cathedral were transferred to the Roman Catholics. The noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) had remarked that a grievance, though a sentimental one, might be a very great one notwithstanding; but surely it could not be said that a grievance existed unless some definite harm was done, and he believed that the Irish Church had not done any harm to a single individual. Now, when it was considered that the Roman Catholics did not contribute a penny to the revenues of that Church, and that that Church did a great deal of good even beyond its own pale, he thought it might be fairly said that a sentimental grievance was the only grievance remaining. If the property of the Church were confiscated, how could it be expected that capitalists would be encouraged to invest their property in Ireland? As to the argument that the disestablishment of the Church would secure peace in Ireland, he would advert to the fact that the discontented portion of the people wished to deal with the land and not with the Church question, which was purely a priestly and not a popular grievance. Those who talked of the Irish grievance should think of the population of Ulster, and of the large proportion of the Roman Catholic laity who did not care in the slightest degree about the disestablishment of the Church. There was no doubt that disestablishment would be a great gain to the Roman Catholic religion, which would be placed in a position of greater power and influence in Ireland. Now, such a result would certainly not be conducive to the material prosperity of that country. It was said that the Irish Roman Catholics must be conciliated; but what was to become of the Irish Protestants? Were the loyal to be punished that the disobedient might be rewarded? The cause of Protestantism in Ireland could not be maintained apart from the Irish Establishment. If the Establishment were abolished in Ireland and the parochial system to be changed to a congregational system the greatest bulwark of Protestantism in the South of Ireland would be at once removed. The few Protestants who now maintained their faith in that part of the country must inevitably succumb and be merged in the Roman Catholic population around them. Those who voted for the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire appeared to be opposed to the principle of the Establishment not only in Ireland, but in England as well. They did not propose to disestablish the Protestant Church in Ireland merely for the sake of placing it on a footing of equality with respect to the Roman Catholic Church in that country, but in order that they might strike a blow at the Established Church in this country. They proposed, in fact, to leave the country without an Establishment at all. Well, that might do in a new country, such as America, where all sorts of novelties prevailed; but it certainly would not suit England, with its ancient Constitution and its traditional social system. The existence of the Established Church was inseparably bound up with the welfare of Ireland. If the course proposed in the Resolution of the right hon. Gentlemen were to be adopted towards Ireland, what course was to be pursued with respect to Wales, where the Dissenters were more than two to one? Not that he would himself argue for an Establishment on the ground of numbers. That might justify the preponderating influence of a sect, but not its monopoly of the favours of a State. He preferred to rest his support of the Established Church on the ground that it was for the interest of the State and for the interest of religion. He supported the Established Church of England because he believed that it embodied the true and tolerant principles of Christianity. It might be thought that this argument was inconsistent with the support of the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum; but he thought those grants might be defended on the ground of expediency, and he would even go so far as to say that in cases where a sect was willing to accept that favour of the State, and which did not amount to establishment and endowment, it would be lawful and right so to help them. He would quote a few words from the right hon. Member for South Lancashire—not for any change of opinion they might indicate, but because they expressed the ground upon which the Established Church ought to be maintained. The right hon. Gentleman had said—

“There was no principle on which the Church Establishment could be maintained or permanently upheld but that it was an Establishment that ought to be. . . . The Government, as a Government, is bound to maintain that form of belief which contains the largest portion of truth and the smallest admixture of error.”

But it was not only on that ground he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) would support the Established Church. It was the greatest possible security we could have for the independence of our clergy. In short, the existence of the Establishment was inseparably bound up with the peace and prosperity of the country. The other night the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) had expressed a hope that the cry of “No Popery” might not be raised. It was not an uncommon thing for the Whigs to discourage “cries” when they were likely to prove injurious to their party interests, though they never scrupled to raise a popular cry when it was to serve their own turn. Without going back to the old cry of “Cheap Bread,” what party was it that the other year got up the cry of “Reform,” a cry that culminated in worse riots, and more dangerous to the Constitution and to the country, than had ever been produced by the cry of “No Popery.” He must say he regretted that, upon that occasion, censure had not been more freely bestowed upon those shameful proceedings from the right hon. Gentleman sitting on the front Opposition Bench. For himself, he was not in favour of extreme cries of any kind; but he believed the people of this country did entertain a dread of the extending power of the Church of Rome. It seemed to him that even in the present Parliament they were likely to ascertain the existence of that feeling. Within the last few days elections had been held in various parts of the kingdom, and in all these elections the Irish Church had been the prominent question. He would not speak of such counties as Radnorshire or South Lincoln, where candidates of the same opinions with the late Members had been returned without opposition, but they had lately seen two boroughs—Cockermouth and Grantham—reject those candidates who were opposed to the Irish Establishment. [Laughter.] They might laugh at Cockermouth; but he would remind them that Cockermouth had always returned, up to this time, a Liberal Member. Look at the great city of Bristol, with its free and important constituency! That chosen resort of eminent Nonconformists had hitherto been a stronghold of the Liberal party, but now an eminent Nonconformist had been defeated there. At the last election the Conservative candidate was defeated by a majority of nearly 1,000 votes, and yesterday the Conservative candidate was returned by a majority of 196. It was useless to attempt to deny the significance of these facts. Next came East Kent, one of the largest and most independent counties in the whole of England. A Conservative Member was returned at the last General Election by a majority of 289, and he was speaking within bounds when he said that, on the present occasion, the Conservative would carry his election by a majority of more than 500. These events foreshadowed still greater changes when the great question before the House should be fairly considered by the country. Whatever might be the result of the divisions upon the Resolutions—whether carried by larger or smaller majorities—no one could say that this question would be finally settled in the present Session of Parliament. The question, he trusted, would be considered in a calm and dispassionate manner, and be thoroughly sifted; and he hoped and believed the result would tend to advance the interests of truth and unity, not only in Ireland, but in every part of the United Kingdom.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that before the Recess two modes of dealing with the Irish Church were suggested; the policy of procrastination recommended by the Government, and the policy of action proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. The latter policy was adopted by a majority unexampled in modern times for numbers and weight; and the right hon. Gentleman now proposed this Resolution not as Leader of the Opposition, but as Leader of the House. The right hon. Gentlemen who occupied the Treasury Bench were in fact not Her Majesty's Government but Her Majesty's Opposition. Whether the position which they occupied was one consistent with their dignity was a point which he would not now touch upon, for probably another opportunity would be afforded of discussing it. With regard to the Resolutions he did not admit that their adoption by the Committee would amount to an act of “foreign conquest;” but he could not deny but that it would be a most important step, more particularly as it would altogether alter the policy hitherto pursued towards Ireland. It was an attempt to do by justice what England had failed to do by arms—namely, to acquire the friendship of the Irish people by laying down the principle that there should be no ascendancy in this land founded upon any particular form of religious belief. He contended that the vote for going into Committee did not, as had been said, involve an uncertain issue; the question raised was really one of Establishment or no Establishment. Nor was the majority an English, a Scotch, or an Irish majority; it was a majority of representatives of the three nations. In a House of nearly 600 Members there voted for going into Committee 240 English Members, and 212 in favour of the Government; of the Scotch Members 37 voted for going into Committee and only 13 in favour of the Government; of the Irish Members, who were more peculiarly interested in the question, 55 voted for the Motion and 45 supported the Government. A majority, therefore, of the Members of the three kingdoms had voted in substance for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Hay) had called the Roman Catholic religion a superstition, and said that the Scotch people would not be “the slaves of a dominant superstition, or the subjects of an infidel State.” Such sentiments as these were certainly not calculated to promote good-feeling throughout the Empire; and he hoped that the example of the hon. Baronet would not be followed. Nearly every Member of the Treasury Bench had now spoken upon this question. Secretary after Secretary, Under Secretary after Under Secretary, Law Officer after Law Officer, had addressed the House, and the other night even the Household had pronounced its opinion; but not one of them had ventured to defend the Irish Church upon its merits, or to maintain that, if it had not existed, it would be for the interest of the country to establish it. If one might judge from the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), he was not strongly in favour of the Irish Church—volo non valeo seemed to represent his mind—and he had no doubt but that the noble Lord would, if he could, have expressed his opinion, in language which the noble Lord would recognize, no doubt, “that the Irish Church was a stain upon the conscience of England and a disgrace to the civilization of the Empire.” Every historian and every politician when not in Office had condemned the Irish Church.

Sir Colman O’Loghlen

Hallam, Macaulay, Lord Lytton, and the present First Lord of the Treasury himself had denounced it. Sidney Smith, a dignitary of the Church, had compared it to the institution of ‘butchers’ shops throughout our Indian Empire; because, although the natives did not want meat, a stray European might pass through the villages and require to be supplied, and had written of it—

“There is no abuse like it in all Europe, in all Asia, in all the discovered parts of Africa, and in all we had heard of Timbuctoo.”

It was, indeed, difficult to conceive upon what grounds the Irish Church should be retained; for it had never fulfilled the first duty of an Establishment—that it should be in accord with the feelings of the Irish people. Ireland had hitherto been governed for the Establishment, not the Establishment maintained for the benefit of Ireland. That was not the case in this country. In England the Establishment was maintained for the benefit of the people, not the people governed for the good of the Establishment. Whenever any measures had been proposed for Ireland, the question always was, not whether they were right, just, and proper, but whether they would be favourable to the Protestant Establishment; and every amelioration was opposed on the ground of the Church in danger. Catholic Emancipation was resisted on that ground, so was the Oaths Bill of last Session; and when he had himself proposed to throw open the office of Lord Lieutenant to Roman Catholics it was opposed, because the Lord Lieutenant had thirty-six chaplains, and if he were a Roman Catholic, what would become of the thirty-six chaplains? The true position of an Established Church was to stand up for the rights and liberties of the people. That the Church Establishment in Ireland had never done. On the contrary, it had always opposed every effort that had been made to emancipate the people, or to extend their liberties, and it kept alive that spirit of bigotry which still existed in Ulster. Although Catholic Emancipation was passed forty years ago it had passed only for three-fourths of Ireland. A Roman Catholic had not the smallest chance of obtaining municipal or other honours in the Northern province. Now, what were the arguments in support of the Establishment? The first was that it was based on the Act of Union. But that argument had been completely answered by his hon. and learned friend, the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge). No lawyer would venture to say, as the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Karlake) admitted the other night, that Parliament was not competent to alter the Act of Union; otherwise it would be held that the living ought to be bound by the dead. Another argument, he was sorry to say, had been made to rest on the Coronation Oath; as if that Oath rendered it impossible that the Church in Ireland could be disestablished. [Colonel STUART KNOX: Hear, hear!] The hon. and gallant Member for Dungannon cried "Hear, hear!" but that was a dangerous argument. It would be in fact placing the Queen in opposition to that House, if it were to go forth that justice was to be denied to the Irish people, forsooth, because of the Oath taken by Her Majesty at her coronation. That argument was one of the strongest that could be used in favour of Fenianism; for he could not imagine any Fenian using a stronger argument than this:—"The disestablishment of the Irish Church has been declared essential by a majority of 60 in the House of Commons, and yet it cannot be done because of the Queen's Coronation Oath—you have no remedy now except to join us." He thought that the argument of the Coronation Oath had been long ago buried in the vaults at Windsor. They all knew how much it had cost the country. The great statesman who had passed the Act of Union had intended really to unite the two countries, by emancipating the Catholics and placing their clergy on something like a footing of equality with those of the Established Church; but he was prevented from carrying out his object by the troubled conscience of George III., owing to his Coronation Oath; and they all knew what misery the obstinacy of that monarch had occasioned to Ireland. Another argument was that the Established Church was only a sentimental grievance. The hon. Baronet who had spoken last (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had adopted that argument, and said that the cry for disestablishment was a mere priestly cry; that the laity did not care about it, and that the only question they cared about was the land question. Well, in that case, he hoped when next the land question was brought forward the hon. Baronet would be found voting with those who represented the opinions of the Irish people on that subject. But what was the fact? The noble Lord near him (Viscount Castlerosse) and the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell)

had set on foot a declaration that the Catholic laity of Ireland regarded the Established Church as a great grievance, and that declaration had been signed by Catholic Peers, Baronets, deputy-lieutenants, magistrates, and all who were entitled to speak for the Catholic laity of Ireland. And then let them look to the meeting of Limerick, one of the greatest and most imposing that had ever been held in Ireland, while in Cork only last week there had been another which was worthy of the county in which it was held. But he utterly denied that it was by mere meetings, but by the votes of the Irish Members that the opinions of the Irish people were to be judged. In the recent division he found that the whole of the 29 Members from Ulster had voted for the policy of the Government, the policy of procrastination. Though times changed those hon. Gentlemen never changed, and no "education" that the First Lord of the Treasury could give would ever alter their views. But as to Leinster he found that 23 Members voted for disestablishment, and only 12 against. Of the Members from Connaught 10 voted for disestablishment, only 3 against; and of the Munster representatives, 22 voted for disestablishment, and only 1 against. Of those three provinces 55 voted for disestablishment, and only 16 the other way. He asked was not that the most constitutional declaration that could be made that the Irish people felt the Established Church a real grievance? Another argument was that the Fenians did not want disestablishment. Very true. If the Fenians were consulted, they would say—"Keep up the Establishment; repeal the Emancipation Act; give us no Reform Bill; keep open all the festering sores of the country; for everything you do to remove grievances only binds the two countries together. We wish to separate them, and to establish a republic in Ireland; and if we had our will we would keep the Established Church as it is." No stronger argument could be used in favour of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. But then it was said, if you disestablish the Church in Ireland, you must also disestablish the Church in England. No argument was more absurd. There is no analogy between the two Churches. A proof that there was no analogy between the two Churches was to be found in the fact that Lord Derby brought in a Bill thirty years ago, abolishing a number of Irish bishoprics, whereas no proposal had been made with regard to English sees except for an increase of them. As to the allegation that disestablishment was a revolutionary policy, he admitted that it was revolutionary, inasmuch as it was counter to old traditional feelings; but it was, nevertheless, a sound policy, and aimed at making the Union of Great Britain and Ireland a union of heart and soul, instead of a mere parchment bond. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury should, moreover, be the last man to object to it on this ground; for he declared, in a speech which had often been referred to that a statesman should govern Ireland in the spirit of revolution. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman had since stated that that was heedless rhetoric; but he (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) preferred the "heedless rhetoric from below the Gangway to the studied platitudes of the Treasury Bench. No one admitted more than he did the genius and ability of the First Lord of the Treasury, and it was therefore with regret he had listened to the speech made by him the night before the Recess. It was a speech which reminded him more of the letters of "Runnymede" than of anything else. The right hon. Gentleman in that speech—a speech which the necessities of party could alone have compelled him to make—said he had lately discovered that a conspiracy existed between the Irish Romanists and the Ritualists of this country to overthrow the Constitution. He might have passed over that observation, if it were merely made in the heat of debate; but the right hon. Gentleman had reiterated the calumny upon the Irish Catholics in a letter which he had deliberately written. That letter was a model letter in style and finish. It was dated "Maundy Thursday, 1868." If he could ascertain it, he should like to know how many of the letters the right hon. Gentleman wrote that day were so dated. He thought there was but one—that written to the High Church correspondent of the right hon. Gentleman. From first to last the letter was in keeping. Beginning with "Maundy Thursday," it ended with "Your faithful Member and Servant." In the letter he spoke of parties in the Church being an advantage. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman founded his opinion upon the existence of parties in his own Cabinet. However that might be, he went on to say—

"I have reason to believe that they (the High Church Ritualists) have been for some time in secret combination, and are now in open confederacy with the Irish Romanists, to destroy the Church of this country."

He would not pause to speak of the good taste of speaking of the Roman Catholic Members of that House as "Irish Romanists." Out of the 658 Members of that House there were only thirty-two Roman Catholics. There were none from Scotland, two from England, and thirty from Ireland; and, this being so, what becomes of the allegation that they were sufficiently strong to overturn the Constitution of this country? The right hon. Gentleman's letter was a most finished composition; and it had taught him (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) to introduce a statement for which no authority could be given by the phrase, "he had reason to believe." If he were asked where the right hon. Gentleman got his information as to the alliance between the "Irish Romanists" and the Ritualists, he could only answer "I have reason to believe he must have got it from Mr. Home." He (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) had reason to believe that the right hon. Gentleman, wanting a policy, consulted Mr. Home, and that during the séances certain loud raps announced the presence of the spirit of Titus Oates, who warned the right hon. Gentleman that the Constitution was endangered by a conspiracy between Ritualists and Romanists, and advised him to consult or take into his Cabinet the hon. Members for Peterborough and North Warwickshire (Mr. Whalley and Mr. Newdegate). This was the source he "had reason to believe" from which the right hon. Gentleman had got his information, and he told it in confidence to the House. The "Maundy Thursday" letter was not the only letter the right hon. Gentleman had written. They had all heard of the Dartmouth letter. It had puzzled many. Lord Salisbury, whose loss to that House every one regretted, had given it one meaning. The hon. and learned Member for Exeter had given it another. Both, it appeared, however, were wrong. When the right hon. Gentlemen came to explain it, he said—"I did not mean to say the Church was in danger. No legislation could endanger it. What I meant to say was that the State was in danger." He (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) could not at first understand the right hon. Gentleman. The State in danger by disestablishing the Church in Ireland! He (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) looked across the broad Atlantic, and he saw Canada, in which an Established Church did not exist, peaceful, prosperous, and loyal. He looked across the Southern Ocean, and he found that, although in their colonies in that quarter of the globe, the Church was separated from the State, yet that the State was not in danger there. He should have been at a loss to know the right hon. Gentleman's meaning if he had not remembered the saying of a celebrated French sovereign—L'état c'est moi. He then felt that the right hon. Gentleman had used allegorical language; and that, when he said "the State was in danger," he had identified himself with the State. The right hon. Gentleman meant, "I am in danger; my party is in danger; therefore, Constitutionalists, rally round me, to preserve the State—that is, to preserve my Government." The right hon. Gentleman had appeared in many characters—having been a novelist, a poet, a biographer, and a statesman—and he had certainly adorned them all. His recent allusions to the conquest of England by the Normans, by Cromwell, and by William of Orange, served to indicate that he was contemplating the preparation of a history of England. Now, in that case, he ought not to omit a chapter on the Caucasian conquest, which was a more extraordinary one than any other. In other conquests, the majority triumphed over the minority; but in this the minority triumphed over the majority; and it had been so far successful that the present Cabinet had for more than two years maintained their present position. The hon. Baronet who last spoke (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) justified the raising of the "No Popery" cry on this question—though it had nothing to do with Roman Catholicism—and affirmed that there was a strong feeling against the extension of the Papal power. He would warn the right hon. Gentleman, however, that such a cry would be a signal failure. It was in vain to attempt to rekindle the flame of expiring bigotry, or to hope to retain power by stigmatizing those who advocated the disestablishment of the Irish Church as Irish Romanists, for the people were now too enlightened to be influenced by such tactics. Public opinion expressed through the Press, was in favour of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire; and he had no doubt, notwithstanding the Conservative victory had at Bristol and at the pocket-borough of Cockermouth, that, when the appeal was made to the new constituencies, the decision pronounced by the House on the eve of the Easter holidays would be ratified by the country.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, that the hon. Baronet who had just sat down had alluded to the effect which the present Motion might be supposed to have on the party sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House. He (Sir William Heathcote) entertained such strong constitutional objections to the continuance of Government by a minority, which amounted in fact to an irresponsible Government from the other side of the House, and his objections were so much exasperated and increased by finding that the opinion which he cherished suffered most by that state of things, that he certainly did not feel excessively sensitive as to the effect of that Motion on the fate of the Ministry. That being his opinion he claimed, so far as a party view of the case was concerned, to be considered impartial if he expressed an adverse opinion as to the manner and the time in which it was brought forward. It appeared to him to be beyond the legitimate use of the weapons of party warfare, to resort to a great constitutional question which by the right hon. Gentleman's own statement, could not be settled in the present Parliament for the purpose of dislodging the Government. He did not dispute the legal competency of the present Parliament to deal with that subject, and he thought that Parliament was morally and intellectually as competent to do so, if it was to be done, as the future one was likely to be. But the point was this—that hon. Gentlemen opposite were raising a great question which they could not settle, and raising it in general terms; whereas the main part of the defence of their case must rest on the manner in which they meant to carry it into execution. Therefore, looking at the manner and the time in which that Motion was brought forward he, he should be disposed to vote against it, even if he had less doubt as to its substance. They were discussing the first Resolution, and therefore he would not enter upon questions of detail; but he might be allowed to refer to the second and third Resolutions as throwing some light upon the first. The third Resolution he regarded as nothing more than a respectful request to the Crown to permit them to discuss a subject which they could not otherwise discuss. But the second Resolution appeared to him to call, in very distinct terms, upon the Queen to anticipate legislation by abstaining from the performance of acts which were not only legitimate but which she was required by law to perform until an Act of Parliament to the contrary was passed. It had been argued that the Coronation Oath affected Her Majesty's legislative capacity. He was not a believer in that doctrine, and thought it would be unfortunate if it were universally accepted. But if there was anything that the Coronation Oath was aimed at by its framers, it was the dispensing power over existing statutes; and, if he understood the second Resolution rightly, it was precisely that power which they would invite Her Majesty to exercise. But, coming to the substance of the first Resolution, the one immediately before them, it in distinct terms affirmed the necessity of disestablishing the Church; and it implied, as they learnt from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, the confiscation of her property, subject to what were called life interests and to the retention of the churches and the parsonages. But it should be remembered that they were not dealing merely with the lives of individuals, the value of which could be calculated by an actuary, but with the life of a nation, and that though they might pay certain sums to clergymen now in the enjoyment of incomes from the Church till their death, that did not provide for the rights of the reversioners, who were the laity. When Henry VIII. confiscated the property of the monasteries, he gave the inmates pensions, which according to the scale of the times were liberal, and which appeared in the main to have been carefully paid; but did anyone hesitate to apply to that transaction the name of confiscation? But the case of the monasteries was far less strong than that of the Church, because those institutions existed chiefly for the benefit of their own inmates, whereas the Church held her property in trust for the laity, who were to derive the advantages arising from it. But the present proposal was defended on the ground of gratifying the Irish people, and, negatively, as not leading to any revolutionary consequences in the rest of the kingdom. He contended that, by that proposal, they would not remove the dissatisfaction of the Irish Roman Catholics, nor on the principles they were laying down, could it be so removed. They told the Irish Roman Catholic they would give him entire religious equality; but when he looked to other parts of the United Kingdom what would he find? The Roman Catholics outnumbered other religionists in Ireland in a much greater proportion than other religionists outnumbered the members of the Established Church of England and in Scotland; and yet it was not proposed to endow the Church of the Roman Catholic, but to leave him to pay his own priest as heretofore. Did they not think his next step would be to say, "Either establish my religion in Ireland, or else proceed to let us have real religious equality all over the United Kingdom by destroying all State Churches?" They were told the Irish Roman Catholics did not desire endowment. That might be the feeling of the higher clergy and the richer Roman Catholics; but it was difficult to believe that the poor man would not wish to have a great part of the burden of maintaining his priest taken off his shoulders and placed on realized property. But even if he did not ask for that, he would at least ask for the other alternative, and when that question was raised again, the Irish Roman Catholic, they might depend upon it, would be a strong ally of the Liberation Society. It might be said that would not affect the Church in England, which stood in a different position from that which it occupied in Ireland. Although the two Churches were united, he did not contend that they were so identical that they might not deal with the temporal accidents of the one without necessarily involving both. He did not approach the subject in the spirit of a partizan; but he believed they were letting out waters which would before long swamp the Church of England, and if they dealt with the question in a reckless manner and in hot haste, instead of correcting anomalies and rendering the Church more useful and acceptable, their legislation would prove most dangerous. Suppose we were going to dethrone the English Church from her position in Ireland and to substitute the Roman Catholic Church for it, whatever other difficulty and objection there might be, there would not be that of discrediting the principle of an Established Church; and practically there would be no more difficulty than there was in arranging the Union with Scotland. But in this case it was proposed to bring about religious equality by the total abolition of the Establishment. In England there was no single religious communion that could claim to be set up as a rival to the Establishment; but the advocates of abolition had always claimed the right—and he did not see how they could avoid granting it—of counting all Dissenters as opponents of Establishment when the question was its maintenance or abolition. The ranks of the abolitionists would be swollen, and their cry made louder by what was now proposed, and Parliament must therefore look at home as well as at Ireland. When he saw the violent inroad which was made on vested rights; such disregard of the rights of the laity as well as of the clergy of Ireland—and that without a question whether a position that had been held 300 years could not be retained on other terms—he saw little reason to expect the pacification of Ireland; and when, above all he saw the danger which the proposal involved to the institutions which pervaded the whole of England, and which formed an integral part of the Government of this country, the rending of which would produce effects to which they now blindly shut their eyes, he felt constrained to give his vote against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. COWPER said, that the hon. Baronet (Sir William Heathcote), notwithstanding his well-known candour, had totally misrepresented the second Resolution, which, however, it was inconvenient to discuss at present. The hon. Gentleman, like other speakers, had appealed to their fears; and, like others, had not shaken the solid foundation upon which the Resolution stood—namely, that the Establishment of the Reformed Church in Ireland was an injustice, and a real ground of offence and discontent to a large portion of the Irish people. Though sympathizing with hon. Members, who felt that it was a strong measure to deprive an ancient Church of the privileges and the emoluments which it had enjoyed for 300 years, yet, he did not share their apprehension that it would affect the safety of private property. The privileges of the Established Church in Ireland, and the tithes, which were the public property of the nation, were to be considered in the light of a public trust; and the question was, had that public trust been exercised rightly, and for the benefit of the people, or had circumstances prevented it being so exercised? It was necessary to look at the origin of the Church Establishment in Ireland. When the Reformed Church was established there, Queen Elizabeth was in hostile relation with the Court of Rome, she having denied the supremacy of the Pope, and the latter her legitimacy and her right to reign. The Irish chieftains, who were at war with the Government, clung to the Pope as an ally, and the people regarded the Establishment of the Reformed Church as a political and diplomatic weapon of attack upon the Papal supremacy, and as a means of exercising the Royal authority over the spiritual affairs of Ireland. Whatever might have been the motive of Queen Elizabeth and her advisers, the Irish people regarded the Church as a political institution. They would not pay obedience to the Bishops, or accept the ministration of the clergy or adopt its Articles of faith; and it became the Church of the governing classes only. It was national only inasmuch as it acknowledged the headship of the Sovereign; but it was not national in the higher sense of being a blessing to the nation at large. Born amidst political strife, the Establishment was nurtured and matured in discord and violence; and whatever may have been the beneficent disposition of its members, it was denied the character of an olive branch of peace, and was received as a brand of discord and a sceptre of ascendancy. It blew the trumpet, but the people would not assemble; it piped, but they would not dance; it preached, but they would not hear. Set up for political ends, it had proved a failure, and it had been really an additional cause of antagonism. Though designed to unite the people of England and the people of Ireland, it had widened the separation between them, and made it more difficult to pass than the Channel which ran between them. If designed to unite together the people of Ireland itself, it had only added a new source of discord and strife to those previously existing; and it had introduced disunion into all the institutions of Ireland municipal, parochial, professional, and political. The very name of Protestant and Catholic had a meaning in Ireland different from that they had in England and America. In Ireland, the terms did not designate mere differences of creed and in modes of worship, but they rather indicated two hostile camps, two rival bodies, contending one for the support and the other for the destruction of ascendancy. The Church had become a fortress to be attacked and defended. Under these circumstances, was it generous or wise to cling desperately to that Establishment, which had failed to become a blessing to the country?—the noblest course for the Church to adopt was to descend voluntarily to a position of equality with the Roman Catholic and Dissenting bodies, and trust to its divine mission. Its high position was considered by its friends a platform of sanctity, and by its opponents a pillory of disgrace; it would be nobly transformed into a scaffold of voluntary martyrdom. He (Mr. Cowper) felt sure that the loss of the Church in temporalities would be a gain in efficiency and vitality. It was not national de facto, and why claim to be so de jure? The Church in Ireland was willing to administer its rites to all the people; but the people would not have them. That had been tried for 300 years—in times of prosperity and of famine, under Penal Laws and under civil equality, and there was no prospect of a change in this feeling. But there might be a change in the external position of the Church; and its present duty appeared to be voluntary abdication. Difficulties had been dwelt upon; but what were difficulties for, except to be overcome? Was the House to be overwhelmed by a difficulty which would attend the transition state of the Church from an established to a disestablished one? Surely the House would have sufficient power, ingenuity, and intellect to overcome any difficulty of the sort which had been suggested. If the Church in Ireland was, as he contended, an injustice, no difficulty should prevent the House from removing it. In Scotland the episcopal Church had been disestablished and disendowed, under circumstances of war, violence, and cruelty; but that Church was now in a position acceptable and satisfactory to the members of it. Its laws were obeyed, its organization was effective, and its offices filled by men of capacity and distinction. In Ireland, the Roman Catholic Church, though not established, had laws and regulations which were observed as punctually and obediently as if it were established. He was persuaded that there existed among the Bishops, the clergy, and the laity of the Established Church in Ireland, sufficient wisdom, moderation, and zeal, to adapt their arrangements to the altered state of things which disestablishment would produce, and to secure everything that could be necessary for the true vitality of a religious body. But the great objection to the proposal was that disestablishment in Ireland would ultimately lead to disestablishment in England. This was an unworthy argument. Irish questions were not to be settled on English grounds. The cases of the two Churches were not similar, and were even diametrically opposed. The English Church was a truly national

Church, and the Irish Church was not. The Establishment of the English Church was the spontaneous growth of the feeling of the country. The Reformation was a national movement; the Sovereigns led, and the people followed. It was not imported from a foreign land, and there was no rival community to dispute its claim. It included within its ranks every class, from the Sovereign on the Throne to the humblest of her subjects. In Ireland, all those conditions were reversed, and the Establishment was the Church of a small minority. But Parliament must deal with the question as one of justice or injustice; and they should remember that if it was an unfortunate circumstance for a civil institution to be based upon injustice, such a foundation was ten-fold worse for a religious association. A Church founded in injustice must also involve hypocrisy, by not acting out the righteousness it taught. In that, as in other matters, they should adhere to the old Norman motto, Fais as que doit advenir que pourra.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said: I will detain the Committee but a very short time, partly because much that I might have urged has already been better said by others, and partly because some of my opinions may appear somewhat old-fashioned and out of date in these days. It is somewhat remarkable that, when this question, or rather a portion of this question, was discussed in 1835, the line of argument which ran through the whole debate was one which has been scarcely used on this occasion. The position then maintained by the various defenders of the Irish Church, including the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), was that the Church of England taught truth, and that the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church was founded on error; and, though I should be sorry to say a word which could give the slightest pain or offence to any Roman Catholic, or imply the smallest disrespect for those who, I am well assured, are as sincere in their opinions as those who do not share them, yet this must necessarily be the creed of every honest Protestant, otherwise he would not be a Protestant at all. If, then, this be so, how can any true Protestant—for I do not speak of those who are indifferent to all forms of religion—assent to the overthrow of what he believes to be the upholder of truth, however conscious he may be that there is much in it requiring reform? Surely on one ground alone—namely, that what may be put in its place will be at least as powerful in upholding the Protestant Faith. The Protestants who vote for the proposed measures will doubtless rely upon the presumption that this will be the result. But, if so, how remarkable that Roman Catholics should be found fighting in the same ranks. No one can doubt that the success of the measure will be hailed as a triumph in every Roman Catholic country in the world. The Tablet, I believe, congratulated its readers the other day that every Roman Catholic Member on both sides of the House voted straight on this question. Did they so vote because they thought the Protestant cause would not suffer anything from disestablishment? The truth is, that this fatal Motion has the peculiar advantage, in a strategical point of view, of enlisting the support of three parties without the slightest cohesion or sympathy — indeed, violently opposed to each other — each of whom sees in it an instrument for furthering its own widely dissimilar objects. Without talking of conspiracies, there can be no doubt of unity of action. The Roman Catholic votes with the honest, and, I may say, the avowed intention of rearing up the Established Church of Rome on the ruins of the Established Church of England. [“No!”] The truth of this allegation time alone can prove. The extreme Ritualist would gladly get rid of that legal restraint which curbs his enthusiasm, and is the only protection of the laity against the wildest extravagance. And I may remark on this point that the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Cowper) has stated that the Episcopal Church in Scotland is in as good a position at present as that which it held during the time that it was established. But the right hon. Gentleman appears to have entirely forgotten that the Scotch Episcopal Church has lost that power of enforcing discipline which is so valuable to the Church of England. The Dissenter is willing to hazard everything in his anxiety to destroy all Establishments, forgetting that the Roman Catholic Church cannot be disestablished because it owes allegiance to a foreign State; and that therefore you would still have an Established Church in Ireland, though of that Church the Queen would not be the supreme head. The Protestant Dissenter thinks it worth some risk to gain such a step in advance as to make a third of Ireland such as he is himself, and he at least honestly and avowedly considers it a prelude to disestablishment in England and in Scotland. A well-known Member of that body, bitterly hostile to the Church of England, said triumphantly the other day that these Resolutions gave them at one stroke what he expected would have required ten years' hard fighting. I cannot but be suspicious of a measure which obtains the support of such conflicting interests on grounds so irreconcilable. But there are others who vote with the right hon. Gentleman, who, like himself, can be influenced by none of these motives. They say they aim at the pacification of Ireland. But does any one believe that the disestablishment of the Church would pacify Ireland? Certainly it would not. Ireland, or rather that portion of Ireland which it is hoped to conciliate by this measure, objects to our civil supremacy quite as much as to our hierarchy. Like the Poles under Russia, the Celtic Irish do not want to be well governed by Great Britain, but to govern themselves, and to get rid of us altogether. I presume, however, that by this time none in the House, and few out of it, are unaware that the real object of these Resolutions is less the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, than the displacement of the Government. It is proverbially easy to quote Scripture for any purpose. I suppose one must not criticize too closely the manoeuvres of party warfare; but I cannot help thinking that, some day or other, there will be many on both sides of the House who will regret that this issue was not fought out on some other battle-ground. Is there any justification in the state of Ireland for this unparalleled proceeding of interposing in hot haste, after years of indifference and while a Commission on the very subject is still sitting, such a Motion between the Reform Bills, the completion of which has been on all sides acknowledged to be the business of the Session? Does anyone imagine that Fenianism has anything to do with the Church question? We have, indeed, been told at the commencement of these debates that there is no Fenianism in those colonies in which the Church is not established. Has not the credibility of that statement been rudely shaken by recent events in Canada, in Australia, and in New Zealand? But, even if it be so, is it wise to exalt those atrocious filibusters into heroic protesters against an alien Church, and to give them throughout the world the prestige of a purpose and a victory which must far transcend their wildest anticipations? Surely it would have been safer and more statesmanlike to do one thing at a time; to copy the policy of Queen Elizabeth in crushing rebellion before inquiring into the causes of grievance, and to wait till the Habeas Corpus Act was again in force, and the last spark of Fenianism extinguished, before bringing forward a measure which might be plausibly represented as a concession wrung from England through apprehensions which that Fenianism had created. I do not myself despair of Protestantism in Ireland, even if the Church were disestablished. [Opposition Cheers.] No; provided it has fair play. [Counter Cheers.] But can any one suppose, notwithstanding the conciliatory tone of the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), that the Roman Catholics would be more tolerant to a Protestant Missionary Church than to a Protestant Established Church, or that every means would not be taken to root it out of the land? Equal moderation of expression has been heard in this House on more than one occasion, and hon. Members know what has followed. The House has been told that the Roman Catholics would be content with toleration; then with the removal of all disabilities. It is now said that equality would satisfy her; but on some future day she may demand supremacy, and, eventually, perhaps, that she may stand alone in the land. No one acquainted with the past history of that Church can say that this is not within the bounds of possibility. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire may except from his measure the glebes and parsonage-houses; but how long will this exception last? At no distant date the traveller may probably be shown in many an Irish village how vain was such a reservation—

"There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose."
